Taft Describes the World Struggle of the Jews to Gain Civil Equality

Race is Unique; Retains Its Unity Despite 1800 Years of Adversity.

AT the suggestion of the Executive Committee of the B'nai B'rith, Colonel I. M. Ullman, of New Haven, called on former President Taft several months ago and appealed to him to write an article descriptive of the struggle of Jews for civil equality.

Later, Brother Samuel Fleischman, of New York City, visited Mr. Taft at New Haven, and there was shown a draft of an address, which Mr. Taft said he intended to send to the National Geographic Society at Washington for publication in the National Geographic Magazine.

Mr. Taft informed Mr. Fleischman further that he had prepared the address with the understanding that the B'nai B'rith News might use it subsequent to its appearance in the other production, The National Geographic Magazine in its July issue.

By W. H. TAFT

WITHIN the limits of this article one can hope to give only the merest sketch of the history which the subject of the Jews involves.

I need not pause to emphasize the remarkable character of the Jewish people. They are unique in that for eighteen hundred years they have had no country, have been dispersed to the four quarters of the globe, and yet have retained their religion, their cohesion, their intellectual capacity, their loyalty to their race, and have, whenever there was any pretense of equality of opportunity for them, forged their way ahead into positions of prominence, influence, and power in business, professions, in philosophy, in art, in literature, and in government.

They have at the same time made loyal subjects or citizens of the countries in which they have lived whenever they have been accorded any reasonable protection of civil rights. No other people has ever been subjected to such continuous persecution in denial of opportunity to make a living and pursuit of happiness, in humiliating restriction upon their liberty, in exclusion from education, and indeed in actual physical cruelty and massacre.

Dispersion of the Jews.

During the three hundred years beforefore Christ, the Jews were under Greek control and influence. Jerusalem was attacked many times and sacked, with the consequent dispersion into other countries of many of its people. They migrated into Syria, into Arabia, into Egypt, and became numerous and prominent in Alexandria. Indeed, there were, it is said, as many as a million Jews in Egypt before the Christian era.

When the Roman and the Parthian empires constituted the world, Jews were to be found in every commercial center, and in each there was a Jewish community and synagogue and a relationship maintained with Jerusalem.

The Jews flocked to Rome. Tiberius issued an order excluding them, but it was only enforced for a short time and they returned in great numbers. Although the Emperor Claudius announced his intention of banishing them again, they were so many that he gave it up.

In the first and second centuries after Christ, Nero, Vespasian, Titus, Trajan, and Hadrian found the Jews of Palestine unruly and undisposed to yield to their authority and campaigns were waged against them. Jerusalem was taken in the year 70 by Titus and the Temple destroyed. In the year 135 it was taken again by Hadrian's generals and the city destroyed.

Hadrian rebuilt the city and substituted a temple to Jupiter in the place of the temple to Jehovah. The Jews were expelled from the city and forbidden to come within sight of its walls. This brought about the great "diaspora," or second dispersion, which sent the people of Israel to the uttermost parts of the earth, some going voluntarily and others taken as prisoners. It is said that 80,000 prisoners were sent to Spain where they found the Jewish communities which had moved on from Rome.

After the expulsion from Jerusalem, the scribes and Pharisees established a school and Sanhedrin at Jamnia, in Palestine, and somewhat later the center of church authority became Tiberias, on the Sea of Galilee, and for two hundred years an autonomous patriarchate under the Roman Empire flourished there. Here were institutions of learning in which the rabbis codified the traditions called the Oral Law into the Palestinian Talmud.

The seat of Jewish ecclesiastical authority then passed from Tiberias, in Palestine, to Babylonia, where great schools were established at Nehardea and Sura. In Babylonia three institutions of learning were conducted by the rabbis, who in the course of two hundred years framed the Babylonion Talmud.

The written law was the law of Moses, contained in the Pentateuch and known as the "Torah." The remainder of the Old Testament was divided into the "Prophets" and the "Writings," so called.

Without Home or Country

In the laws of Moses and the Talmud was to be found a collection of rules of conduct—physical, social, political, religious, moral, and philosophical—a strict and literal compliance with which become the life of the Jews. They offered a field for his study and mental occupation and discussion with his brethren which never ended. His duties thus prescribed were to be performed in the ome and in the synagogue and in the ademy, and these centers supplied to m what the fatherland was to others ore fortunately situated.

The Torah and the Talmud estab- hed a direct relation to God on the rt of each individual and an ac- untability for every minute of his aking hours that absorbed his atten- on and his interest. With no home, country, no kindly sympathy from y one but his own kind, he found his ppiness within his own circle and in e refuge from sorrow which his life ithin the law gave him.

Their great historian says of the ws:

''In the vicissitudes of their fate [illegible] pure [illegible] of [illegible] mption' from utter demoralization and despair.''

FROM Pumbeditha and Sura, in Babylonia, in the eleventh century, the seat of Jewish ecclesiastical authority seems to have passed to Spain, where, under the Saracens in Cordova and Toledo and Granada, the Jews were given full freedom and scope for their activities and for the practice of their religion, and for the further discussion of the Jewish faith and philosophy.

The two Talmuds are very voluminous, and in the centuries after their issue their legal contents were digested and condensed into more usable form for daily consultation and use. From time to time philosophers and leaders of Jewish thought appeared.

Philo of Alexandria, Maimonides of Spain, and Moses Mendelssohn were the three great lights, the first in the beginning of the Christian era, the second in the Middle Ages, and the third in the eighteenth century and late enough to furnish the type to Lessing for that wonderful character of Nathan der Weise.

False Messiahs appeared and misled many to their sorrow. Mysticism played its part and books promoting it were written, causing protest and controversy. Commentaries were published by some Jewish leaders of thought which were pronounced heretical by others. Spinoza, the great philosopher, was excommunicated by the Dutch rabbis.

But in spite of these differences, constantly during the seventeen centuries of gloom and woe, somewhere in the world was a religious center of Jewish authority to which Israel turned for hope and inspiration.

The strictly orthodox Jews have always adhered closely to the rabinical law of the Talmud, but under the influence of Mendelssohn and the leadership of other liberals among his successors, a division occurred, and there arose a liberal and reformed school among them, which grew in number as the conditions for their assimilation with the local enviroament became more favorable and they were relieved from the forced exclusiveness and misery of the Ghetto.

The Two Jewish Tongues.

The speech of the Jews has had an interesting history. Hebrew, Aramaic, Greek, Arabic, and all European languages were from time to time spoken by them. Finally, in their wanderings, there grew up two hybrid mediums—one the Yiddish, or Jargon, and the other the Ladino.

The former, which has an extensive literature, is based on the medieval German, but is written in the Hebrew character and is mixed with Hebrew and influenced by the vernacular. It is used by the Ashkenazim, or German Jews of northern and eastern Europe.

The latter, the Ladino, or Spaniol, is Spanish in its base and mixed with Hebrew and Turkish. It is used by the Sephardim, or the Spanish Jews, and has been carried by them to Africa, Turkey, Bulgaria, Serbia, and Greece.

Recurring now to the history of the race after the second dispersion: In Rome, after the Christian era, Jews and Christians flocked in great numbers. In the chaos of skepticism, religions, and philosophies, there was a cult among some of the Romans that led them to embrace Judaism; but generally the Jews were exclusive, unexpansive, and contemptuous of other religions. They were especially hostile to the Christians, whom they regarded as traitors to their race for failing them in the wars of Vespasian and Titus, and whom they did not hesitate to accuse of many shortcomings in order to stir up Roman [illegible] against them.

The Long, Dark Night.

The Christians differed from the Jews in that they were most active missionaries, and they thus brought down on their heads persecutions which were directed nominally against both Jews and Christians, but the severities of which the Jews were able to escape.

The result of this situation in Rome and elsewhere placed the Jews at a great disadvantage when the Roman Empire became Christian under Constantine, and from that time on, in one form or another, we find constant Christian persecution of the Jews.

In the long, dark Jewish night, after Christianity became the creed of the Roman emperors, down to the nineteenth century, there were only two or three countries and comparatively short periods in which the Jews enjoyed tolerance, prosperity, and power and were able to develop the genius of their race.

In the eighth century Charlemagne, correctly estimating their value as subjects of his empire, granted them tolerance in religion and encouraged them in the development of a trade which greatly helped his empire and made many of them rich merchants. The fact that there were Jewish communities in every great commercial center, even of the most distant parts, gave them a marked facility in conducting international trade. Charlemagne's son and successor, Louis the Pious, continued his father's wise and kindly treatment of them.

Jews Flourished in Spain.

A little earlier than Charlemagne the Moslem invasion of Spain in 711 established the Crescent in the Peninsula Arabian and African Jews, who, after the persecution of them by Mahomet and Omar, had ingratiated themselves with their successors and had been given opportunity for education and development, accompanied the Saracens into Spain and there met their brethren, who had been greatly abused by the Visigoths and who were only too glad to unite in aiding the following of the Prophet to establish a kingdom.

There they developed trade, poetry, philosophy, science, and literature and art. They became ministers of the government and its representatives abroad. The kindly Saracenic soil for their growth gave a full development to the race, and the Spanish, or Sephardic, Jews were fine specimens of physical and intellectual manhood. They became in a way the aristocracy of the house of Israel.

This favorable condition continued until the reconquest of Spain by the Christians began, and lasted in lessening degree to the expulsion of the Moors from Granada, in the fifteenth century.

Meantime every great upheaval seemed to increase Jewish persecution and Jewish misery.

The First Crusade, in 1096, which developed such wonderful religious spirit in the middle and upper classes, led the scum and the rabble to a persecution of the Jews. This recurred in the Second Crusade, in 1146.

Massacres of the Jews.

A cruel massacre of the Jews occurred in 1189 in England, at the time of the coronation of Richard I, although the king favored them and they had acquired a hold in England to such an extent that there had been established a Jewish exchequer, where Jews had to register all their transactions and through which the financial troubles of the Plantagenets were greatly remedied by Jewish gold. They were, however, expelled in 1290 from England by Edward I, it is said at the instance of the Queen Mother Eleanor, whose religious intolerance could not brook their presence.

The Fourth Lateran Council, under Innocent III, among many anti-Jewish measures, required Jews to wear a dress or badge indicating their race. Soon after in all the cities of Europe they were compelled to live in a particular quarter surrounded by walls and were locked in at night. Hemmed in and congested in these ghettos, the Jewry of Europe lived out their painful lives until the middle of the eighteenth century.

St. Louis of France expelled the Jews in 1254, treated them badly, and then invited them back. Philip IV expelled them, and nine years afterwards, in 1315, his successor, Louis X, recalled them. They were finally expelled by Charles VI in 1394.

Accused of Black-Death Sorcery.

In 1348 and 1349 there came the plague of the ''black death'' all over Europe. Probably because of the hygienic effect of the Mosaic and Talmudic law, to which the Jews conformed with rigidity, they escaped the ravages of the epidemic.

This was noted among the people, and at once the report spread that the plague had come from wells poisoned by the Jews, and another series of massacres of these poor people followed everywhere. During the plague, Pope Clement VI issued two bulls in an attempt to protect the Jews.

The Popes in the course of the centuries, however, issued many bulls against the Jews. The bulls were enforced with much greater severity in other countries than by the Popes themselves, who in actual administration often exhibited much leniency toward this unfortunate race. Canon law had forbidden the taking of interest or usury by Christians; but this did not apply to the Jews. and as the Jews had the money, they [illegible] the lending.

They thus b[illegible]ects of interest to the kings [illegible] various countries who had t[illegible] money, and they were mad[illegible] servants of the monarchs, ser[illegible] ue, a position of apparent [illegible] which, however, in the end [illegible]ted the Jews to greater per[illegible]

AN uncertain tolerance was the only relief from constant persecution which was their usual condition after the crusades and the black plague. Every excuse for attacking them was seized. Huss in Bohemia proclaimed his adherence to the teachings of Wycliffe in 1420. He was persecuted by the church—but so, too, were the Jews—for his agitation among Christians, with which they had naught to do.

In 1481 the Inquisition was set on foot in Spain, and in 1492, after Granada fell, the Jews were expelled. They were driven into northern Africa, into Turkey, and into Italy.

Whenever bitterness or prejudice or private motive prompted hostility to the Jews, a common form of accusation was that of murder, and offering of a sacrifice of a Gentile child in their religious ceremonies was charged. A trial was had and, whether conviction followed or not, persecutions ran riot.

This method of attack has, as we know, continued down to the present generation in some countries. Lecky, in his ''History of Morals in Europe,'' points out that this form of charge was made against a great many different sects in pagan Rome—against the Christians as well as others. It has survived only against the Jews.

Poland Once a Refuge.

The effect of the crusades, the black plague, the Inquisition in Spain, the Huss persecutions in Bohemia, and the annual massacres in Austria in the time of Rudolph of Hapsburg, was to drive the Jews to seek refuge in a country where life was possible. The country toward which they turned their eyes was Poland.

Poland was consolidated under Cassimir III, the Great, in the fourteenth century, and was made still greater by the marriage of his grand-niece and heiress to Yaguello, the Grand Duke of Lithuania, who thereupon become the King of Poland and the founder of a dynasty which ruled from the latter part of the fourteenth to the latter part of the sixteenth century.

At the height of its expansion the Polish monarchy reached from the Baltic to the Black Sea and covered an area which down to this day harbors the great bulk of the Jewish population of Europe. If we leave out Prussian Poland and Austrian Galicia, the Russian present Jewish pale of settlement nearly coincides with the boundaries of this ancient Poland.

IN 1334 Cassimir the Great of Poland confirmed a charter of general p ileges to the Jews which had origin been given by a predecessor in 1 The charter insured the economic pr ress of the Jews and gave guaran of their personal and religious security.

They were exempted from the jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical as well as the municipal law courts and a ''Jewish judge,'' so called, was appointed to act in their cases, significant of the abuses to which they had been subjected.

Cassimir's liberality attracted Jews from every quarter of Europe and greatly increased their number in Poland.

After the Yaguello dynasty the power passed from the kings to the Polish nobility, or Shlakta, and the protection to the Jews grew less and less. The burghers were hostile to them because of their competition, and the nobility, while using them as agents to conduct their estates, were arbitrary, cruel, and tyrannical.

Chaos ensued and the condition of the Jews grew worse. They were forbidden to hold land. The nobility manufactured the liquor, and they were willing and anxious to have the Jews sell it, who thus, for lack of other occupation, became the innkeepers, the purveyors in the demoralizing liquor business.

The reduction and elimination of the Polish Kingdom during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries transferred the bulk of the Jews of the world to the jurisdiction of Russia, Germany, and Austria. Poland lost many of its provinces to Russia before the three formal partitions in the eighteenth century.

Except in the part of her Empire which Russia acquired from Poland, Russia never had and has not now but a very few Jews. Her eager acquisition of her large share of Poland, however, placed nearly half of the Jews of the world within her jurisdiction. They had not sought it.

The Flight to Holland.

The adoption of the Inquisition by Spain in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries led many of the Spanish Jews to become baptized into the Catholic Church and to go through the form of Christian worship, retaining secret allegiance to Judaism and observing its law as far as possible. They were called Maranos. This was a notable exception to the usual tenacity of the Jews in not only retaining their faith, but in avowing it under the most terrible ordeals.

The Maranos did not escape persecution by the Inquisition, however, and they fled, many of them, to Holland, where they engaged in trade and where, after a time, they resumed their relations to the synagogue.

Their skill in international trade and familiarity with colonial matters soon gave them wealth and standing among the Dutch. Charles II while in exile dealt with these Jews. At the same time, one of them visited Cromwell in 1655 and pressed upon him the wisdom of allowing the Jews to return to England, whence they had long before been expelled.

Cromwell made no formal agreement, but intimated that he would tolerate their return, and they went back.

Charles found them there when he was restored, and while they were not politically emancipated in England completely until 1850, they suffered no oppression and were able to develop their faculties for business and finance and were well treated and became a strong and loyal supporting element of the British crown.

Find Safety in America.

When the Constitution of the United States was adopted, Jews, of course, were treated on a full political equality. Some of them were of the greatest aid to this country in the Revolution. While there were religious qualifications for suffrage in several of the States, they rapidly disappeared, and in this country, at least since the adoption of the Constitution, in 1789, Jews have had complete emancipation and perfect legal equality of opportunity.

When the French Revolution came on, in 1789, Mirabeau and Abbe Gregoire led the movement for the emancipation of the Jews; and while they met resistance, they were successful.

Napoleon did not disturb this condition. On the contrary, he extended it and gave equality of civil rights to the Jews in many countries over which he exercised power, though he was the author of at least one restrictive ordinance affecting them. France may, therefore, be counted as the next nation after the United States to give the Jews complete legal equality.

Louis XVIII, who succeeded Napoleon, continued this freedom for them, though in actual administration, under the influence of ecclesiastics, there was some discrimination against the Jews. When Louis Philippe succeeded, in 1830, his minister of education proposed a bill which became a law, providing for the same payment of rabbis and for synagogues out of the public treasury as in the case of the Christian clergymen and churches.

In Holland the Jews were given political and civil equality in 1796. In the British colonies they enjoyed it from 1740, much earlier than they did in the mother country.

After the Fall of Napoleon.

In Prussia the Jews had been given greater civil and political rights in 1812, and in Mecklenburg and in Baden. When Prussia united with England, Austria, and Russia to put down Napoleon, the young Jews of Germany played their part with vigor and effect and made a valuable addition to the Prussian and German forces.

After Napoleon was beaten, in 1814, the Holy Alliance, with Hardenberg and Metternich as leaders, met at Vienna, and the Jewish communities from the Hanse towns and Frankfort appealed for relief from their governments. So bitter, however, was the resistance of the free towns and of Frankfort that only a friendly resolution was passed and inserted in the German constitution, but it had no moral binding effect. The Rothschilds were nearly driven from Frankfort because of the bitterness of the Frankfort Senate and their desire not to grant equal rights to the Jews, although the Jews had paid half a million dollars as a consideration for such a grant.

CITIZENS OF PALESTINE

About this time a professor named Ruhs, of the University of Berlin, began propaganda against the Jews and aroused a bitter feeling. The truth is, that Protestant Germany has never been liberal in this regard.

Equality is Virtually Granted

The popular movements all over Europe in 1848, however, on the Continent brought not only equality of opportunity and religious freedom to the Jews, but brought into the various parliaments a number of the leading Jews, and from that time on they have had little real trouble with the law in Austria, Germany, France, Holland, and England.

In Spain the Inquisition was revoked in 1834, and the Jews have since been invited back. By the Congress of Berlin, in 1878, to which I shall refer more in detail later, the Jews secured political and civil equality in Bulgaria and Serbia. Turkey had already granted it to them.

On the whole, then, at the present time, the sons of Israel have little to complain of in statutory law except in Rumania and Russia. This is not to say that they do not encounter social prejudice in all countries, which in some countries has grown into bitter Anti-Semitism and popular agitation against them.

Prejudice cannot be banished by law. It can only fade out as conditions producing it change. It of course affects the happiness and comfort of them against whom it is directed; but it does not limit their useful activities nor the achievements of great success.

Why Are the Jews Persecuted?

What are the reasons for this almost constant persecution of the Jews from the fourth century to the nineteenth? I regret to say that it must be mainly attributed to the religious intolerance of the Christians. Other causes may be pointed out in the characteristics of the race which mistreatment and self-protection either developed or increased and hardened. But, in the last analysis, the initial cause was in religious prejudice.

We find this prejudice in the hostility of Constantine after his conversion; we find it in the bulls of the Popes, beginning in the fourth century and continuing through the Middle Ages to the Council of Trent, in 1563; we find it in the course of St. Louis of France; we find it in the religious frenzy of Queen Eleanor of England, of Elizabeth of Russia, and Maria Theresa of Austria; we find it in the Inquisition in Spain; we find it in the words of Martin Luther against them.

Luther said: "Why should the Jews complain of their captivity among us? We Christians suffered persecution and criticism at their hands for nearly three hundred years, so that we might complain that they took us captives and killed us, and to this very day we know not what devil brought them into our land. We did not bring them from Jerusalem. Besides that, no one keeps them. The country and the roads are open to them. Let them return to their own land. We will gladly give them presents if we can be rid of them, for they are a heavy burdent upon us, a plague, a pestilence, a sore trial."

Forced to Their Exclusiveness.

We find the same spirit of religious persecution in the reintroduction by Pius VII of the Inquisition against the Jews and his ordinance that the Jews should forfeit the freedom enjoyed under the first Napoleon's rule in Rome and forsake their beautiful houses and return to the Ghetto; and we find it today in the attitude of the Russian Greek Church and the severe methods adopted to secure the baptism of the Jews.

The persecutions which this religious prejudice has engendered have stimulated the Jews in self-protection to maintain their exclusiveness, to continue their religious life and rigid adherence to their ceremonials, and to avoid assimilation with such an uncomfortable and hostile environment.

It increased their intense activity, their cunning in business, in order that they might live at all against such opposition, and it produced in them the traits that are now made the basis for denouncing them.

In 1877, Russia declared war against Turkey because of the atrocities committed by the Turks against the Christian peoples in the Balkans, and ultimately won the war. She made the treaty of San Stephano with Turkey, and then the great Powers insisted that there must be a congress to revise that treaty.

Religious and Civil Liberty Urged.

The congress was called at Berlin in 1878 and under it were established the separate governments of Serbia, Bulgaria, and Rumania, who thus really owed their freedom to Russia.

France, England, and Germany insisted that the new governments to be constituted should embody in their constitutions a declaration in favor of religious and civil equality for all domiciled within their jurisdiction.

This was not favored by Russia and was very bitterly opposed by Rumanians. Nevertheless, on the approval of Prince Bismarck, who presided in the congress, the treaty required that, as a condition of recognition by European governments, the constitution of Rumania should contain declarations and guaranties of civil and religious liberty and equality for the Jews, and Russia signed the treaty.

The Rumanian authorities deliberately framed a plan by which to evade the requirement of the treaty. They provided in their constitution, Article VII:

"The difference of religious creeds and conditions does not constitute in Rumania an obstacle to the acquirement of civil and political rights and their exercise."

Evading the Treaty in Rumania.

They then provided for naturalization and enacted that naturalization could only be granted by a law and individually. It was held by their government that Jews were aliens, although they had been living in Rumania for hundreds of years and had been subject to draft into the Rumanian army and had served as soldiers. In this way they avoided the effect of the constitution upon Jews, and their statesmen openly prided themselves on their acuteness.

By adopting the constitution to which I have referred, the Rumanians procured the recognition of European

The Peace Treaty and the Jews

Text of Covenant with Poland Provides Full Religious Liberty and Primary School Instruction Must be Given in Hebrew in Larger Towns

THE Treaty with Poland under Article 93 of the Treaty of Peace with Germany has now been published, with a covering letter addressed to M. Paderewski, signed on behalf of the Supreme Council of the Principal Allied and Associated Powers by M. Clemenceau. The clauses of the Treaty, which especially safeguard Religious Liberty in general in the new State, and particularly refer to Jews, are as follows:

[illegible] State shall ipso facto become Polish nationals.

"Article 7.

"All Polish nationals shall be equal before the law and shall enjoy the same civil and political rights without distinction as to race, language or religion.

"Differences of religion, creed or confession shall not prejudice any Polish national in matters relating to the enjoyment of civil or political rights, as for instance, admission to public employments, functions and honors, or the exercise of professions and industries.

"No restriction shall be imposed on the free use by any Polish national of any language in private intercourse, in commerce, in religion, in the press or in publications of any kind, or at public meetings.

"Notwithstanding any establishment by the Polish Government of an official language, adequate facilities shall be given to Polish nationals of non-Polish speech for the use of their language, either orally or in writing, before the courts.

"Article 8.

"Polish nationals who belong to racial, religious or linguistic minorities shall enjoy the same treatment and security in law and in fact as other Polish nationals. In particular they shall have an equal right to establish, manage and control at their own expense charitable, religious and social institutions, schools and other educational establishments, with the right to use their own language and to exercise their religion freely therein.

"Article 9.

"Poland will provide in the public educational system in towns and districts in which a considerable proportion of Polish nationals of other than Polish speech are residents adequate facilities for ensuring that in the primary schools the instruction shall be given to the children of such Polish nationals through the medium of their own language. This provision shall not prevent the Polish Government from making the teaching of the Polish language obligatory in the said schools.

"In towns and districts where there is a considerable proportion of Polish nationals belonging to racial, religious or linguistic minorities, these minorities shall be assured an equitable share in the enjoyment and application of the sums which may be provided out of public funds under the State, municipal [illegible]r budget, for educational, relig[illegible] charitable purposes.

"The provisions of this Article shall apply to Polish citizens of German speech only in that part of Poland which was German territory in August, 1914.

"Article 10.

"Educational Committees appointed locally by the Jewish Communities of Poland will, subject to the general control of the State, provide for the distribution of the proportional share of public funds allocated to Jewish schools in accordance with Article 9, and for the organization and management of these schools.

"The provisions of Article 9 concerning the use of languages in schools shall apply to these schools.

"Article 11.

"Jews shall not be compelled to perform any act which constitutes a violation of their Sabbath, nor shall they be placed under any disability by reason of their refusal to attend courts of law or to perform any legal business on their Sabbath. This provision, however, shall not exempt Jews from such obligations as shall be imposed upon all other Polish citizens for the necessary purposes of military service, national defence or the preservation of public order.

"Poland declares her intention to refrain from ordering or permitting elections, whether general or local, to be held on a Saturday, nor will registration for electoral or other purposes be compelled to be performed on a Saturday.

"Article 12.

"Poland agrees that the stipulations in the foregoing Articles, so far as they affect persons belonging to racial, religious or linguistic minorities, constitute obligations of international concern and shall be placed under the guarantee of the League of Nations. They shall not be modified without the assent of a majority of the Council of the League of Nations. The United States, the British Empire, France, Italy and Japan, hereby agree not to withhold their assent from any modification in these Articles which is in due form assented to by a majority of the Council of the League of Nations.

"Poland agrees that any member of the Council of the League of Nations shall have the right to bring to the attention of the Council any infraction, or any danger of infraction, of any of these obligations, and that the Council may thereupon take such action and give such direction as it may deem proper and effective in the circumstances.

"Poland further agrees that any difference of opinion as to questions of law or fact arising out of these Articles between the Polish Government and any one of the Principal Allied and Associated Powers or any other Power, a member of the Council of the League of Nations, shall be held to be a dispute of an international character under Article 14 of the Covenant. of the League of Nations. The Polish Government hereby consents that any such dispute shall, if the other party thereto demands, be referred to the Permanent Court of International Justice. The decision of the Permanent Court shall be final and shall have the same force and effect as an award under Article 13 of the Covenant."

The Covering Letter.

In the course of the Covering Letter which M. Clemenceau addressed to M. Paderewski the French Premier wrote:

"I would point out that this Treaty does not constitute any fresh departure. It has for long been the established procedure of the public law of Europe that when a State is created, or even when large accessions of territory are made to an established State, the joint and formal recognition by the Great Powers should be accompanied by the requirement that such State should, in the form of a binding international convention, undertake to comply with certain principles of government.

"This principle, for which there are numerous other precedents, received the most explicit sanction when, at the last great assembly of European Powers—the Congress of Berlin—the sovereignty and independence of Serbia, Montenegro and Rumania were recognized.

"The Principal Allied and Associated Powers are of opinion that they would be false to the responsibility which rests upon them if on this occasion they departed from what has become an established tradition. In this connection I must also recall to your consideration the fact that it is to the endeavors and sacrifices of the Powers in whose name I am addressing you that the Polish nation owes the recovery of its independence.

"It is by their decision that Polish sovereignty is being re-established over the territories in question and that the inhabitants of these territories are being incorporated in the Polish nation. It is on the support which the resources of these Powers will afford to the League of Nations that for the future Poland will to a large extent depend for the secure possession of these territories.

"There rests, therefore, upon these Powers an obligation, which they cannot evade, to secure in the most permanent and solemn form guarantees for certain essential rights which will afford to the inhabitants the necessary protection whatever changes may take place in the internal constitution of the Polish State.

Protection for the Jews.

"Clauses 10 and 12 (sic) deal specifically with the Jewish citizens of Poland. The information at the disposal of the Principal Allied and Associated Powers as to the existing relations between the Jews and the other Polish citizens has led them to the conclusion that, in view of the historical development of the Jewish question and the great animosity aroused by it, special protection is necessary for the Jews in Poland.

"These clauses have been limited to the minimum which seem[illegible] der the circumstances [illegible] day, viz., the mainten[illegible] schools and the protect[illegible] in the religious obser[illegible] their Sabbath. It is believed that [illegible]ulations will not create any obstacle to the political unity of Poland. They do not constitute any recognition of the Jews as a separate political community within the Polish State.

There is nothing inconsistent with the sovereignty of the State in recognizing and supporting schools in which children shall be brought up in the religious influences to which they are accustomed in their home. Ample safeguards against any use of non-Polish languages to encourage a spirit of national separation have been provided in the express acknowledgment that the provisions of this Treaty do not prevent the Polish State from making the Polish language obligatory in all its schools and educational institutions."

Congressman Kahn Clears a Misunderstanding of His Activities

THE following letter, transmitted to the executives of the order by Congressman Julius Kahn, through Brother Simon Wolf, is self-explanatory:

June 19, 1919.

Hon. Simon Wolf,
Washington, D. C.

My Dear Friend:

I have your several letters and also the letter from Brother Kraus. Have carefully noted same. I must apologize for not having answered sooner, but the fact is, that I have simply been overwhelmed with work since my return and I am just now able to give my personal correspondence a little attention.

I regret that there has been any misunderstanding about my activities in Europe. You know me well enough to realize that I never would assume to act in a representative capacity for any organization beyond the scope of my authority. As a matter of fact, I never mentioned the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith in Paris to those persons with whom I spoke. Brother Kraus could easily have found out that so far as speaking for the B'nai B'rith in Zionist matter the Order was never mentioned by mo at any time.

I recognize the fact that we have many members who believe in the principles which the order represents who are Zionists and Anti-Zionists. Each man reserves to himself the right to maintain his own opinions upon that question and there should be no reference to it in connection with a fraternal organization like the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith.

I learned soon after reaching Paris that the matter of a Jewish state was not being considered by the members of the Peace Council. I was so busy during my stay in Europe in studying conditions in which the American people are interested that my stay in Paris was exceedingly limited. Indeod I was moving about practically all of the time while in Europe.

Whilo there I had opportunities to speak with American soldiers of the Jewish Faith and found that they were serving their government in a most creditable manner. I found them in all branches of the service working for American ideals and American rights. I made some inquiries as to the condition of our co-religionists in various parts of Europe. So far as I could gather they were not being discriminated against. Indeed I heard of no complaint whatever in the various sections which I visited.

I regret that Brother Kraus and Mr. Seelenfreund should have had any annoyance over tho credentials sent me, and I assure you that they will have no further trouble on my account at any time.

I have been a member of the Order for upwards of thirty years and hope to continue a member as long as I live. But I am not seeking honors of any kind with the Order and do not want to bring any additional burdens to those who are trying to pilot the organization through safe waters and in the interest of our less fortunate co-religionists.

Believe me,

Very sincerely yours,

JULIUS KAHN.

P. S.—The letter of Brother Kraus is herewith returned.

Herbert Bentwich, Special Delegate of Order to Conference, Reports His Activities; Brought Jewish Factions Together; Analyzes the Proposed Treaty in Detail

By HERBERT BENTWICH

WHEN the Order decided to be represented among the Jewish delegations to the Peace conference in order to secure equal rights and adequate protection to our co-religionists in lands where these were denied to them I readily accepted the invitation to me, on the nomination of the First Lodge of England, to act as delegate of the Order in conjunction with Dr. Adolph Stern of Bucharest, president of the Union of Rumanian Jews.

Onr mandate was fully defined in the resolutions adopted by the American Jewish Congress held at Philadelphia. The situation had been complicated by the irregular presentation by Mr. Lucien Wolf, purporting to act on behalf of the joint committee of the Board of Deputies of British Jews and the Anglo-Jewish Association of memorials submitting drafts of articles to be inserted in the treaty.

These proposals differed in material particulars from the demands of the American Jewish Congress and they fell far short of the requirements of the Jewish delegations already constituted at Paris, who had never been consulted and who objected strongly, also, to the methods adopted for presenting the demand.

Protests against the memorials had been promptly made by the representatives of the East European States, particularly of Rumania, the provision for whose special requirements in the proposed treaty article was entirely inadequate.

Finds Discord at Paris.

On my arrival in Paris on March 27 I found the relations between the delegations and the joint committee (represented by Mr. Wolf) and the Alliance Israelite, with whom they were acting in concert, very embittered by these incidents, and there was a general determination on the part of the delegations to act independently of the joint committee and the Alliance, and to repudiate openly the proposals which had been put forward as satisfying the Jewish claim on the powers.

My co-delegate for the Order, Dr. Adolph Stern, had not been able to get through from Rome (where he was held up during the whole of the subsequent proceedings) but I felt that it would be in accord with the general principle and policy of the Order to make an endeavor to bring about peace between the contending parties, with a view to the presentation of a united front before the conference. I devoted all my efforts to this end, in debates and conferences with the delegations and with the representatives of the joint committee and the Alliance, which extended over several days.

Joint Parley Arranged.

Co-operating in this with Mr. Louis Marshall and Judge Mack, and with the constant support of the whole of the American delegation, we finally sucsucceeded in arranging a joint conference of the two sides where the different points of view on the general Jewish question might be discussed and the ground laid for the presentation of new memorials which might more adequately express the Jewish demands.

At this conference, which was held in the council chamber of the Consistoire on the fifth of April and continued on the following day under the chairmanship of Mr. Marshall, all the delegates in Paris (some fifty or sixty) attended, and there was a full and frank exchange of views in which the following leaders and members of the different delegations and committees took part:

Mack, Marshall, Cutler, Barondess, Syrkin and Cyrus Adler for America; N. Sokoloff, Dr. Thon for Poland; Ussischkin for Ukraine; Dr. Reich, Dr. Ringel, for Galicia; Dr. Schechter, Dr. Braunstein for Rumania; Prof. Colombo for Italy; Yellin for Eretz Israel; Dr. Bergman for Tchecoslovachia; Dr. Haffkine, Tchernoff for the Paris committee of Eastern Jews; Motzkin for the Zionist Organization; Claude Montefiore, J. Prag, Lucien Wolf for the Anglo-Jewish Association; Sir Stuart Samuel for the Board of Deputies; Eugene See, Reinach, Bigart for the Alliance Israelite, and Bentwich for the B'nai B'rith. Prof, Blondhein acted as interpreter throughout the conference.

Committee is Agreed On.

In this discussion the point was clearly made out that the claim for minority rights, or group representation, on a national basis, was essential for the protection of the Jewish populations in the new states, and the safeguarding of any cultural, religious or other privileges which might be granted to them; and although the representatives of the joint committee and the Alliance did not share this view, it was finally resolved that a committee of three from each side should be appointed to settle a basis for a new formula covering the general Jewish demands for submission to the Peace Conference. The work of hammering out the formula was promptly taken up, and on Thursday, the tenth of April, it was announced at a full meeting of the delegations that the following formula had been arrived at:

''Toutes les memorites nationales et religeuse de l'Etat de . . . joueront sur une pied d'egalite, de l'autonomie dans l'administration de leurs institutions nationales, religeuses, educatives et charitables, comme de toutes leurs autres institutions sociales. La langue de l'Etat de . . . fera obligationement partie de 'enseignement dans toutes les ecoles.''

(The words in italics were the adopted variations from the language of the original memorials, and the following additional article was submitted for consideration):

''Pour avoir la jouissance des droits ci-dessus des minorites, les Juifs de . . . qui en ent deja exprime le, desir, ou qui l'experimeront ulterieurement, auront le faculte d'etre traite comme minorite nationale.''

Differences Are Reconciled.

The ground of division between the two sections was thus bridged over, and there appeared to be no further obstacle to the working out of a complete program on this basis, it being agreed also that the Wolf memorials should at the same time be withdrawn from the conference secretariat, through which they had not yet been submitted to the delegates of the powers.

Further steps were temporarily suspended for the Passover; and at this hopeful stage, in common with many other delegates, I felt myself at liberty to return to my home for the Festival, arranging, however, to proceed again to Paris should any difficulty arise in which I could be of assistance.

During my stay in Paris I had visited the British delegation to the Peace Conference and had received the assurance of a sympathetic reception for the proposals of the Jewish delegations, coupled with a strong endorsement of the claim for proportional representation, which had been already recognized in various parts of the British Dominions; and as this was the central feature of the proposals for securing minority rights the success of the Jewish delegations' proposals seemed to be assured.

Peace Pact Broken.

Before leaving Paris I asked to be kept informed of the course of the negotiations, but the communications were defective, and it was not until a month later that I heard that the agreement arrived at during our conferences had been repudiated, first by the Alliance and afterwards by the joint committee, and that relations between these bodies having been completely severed, the delegations were proceeding with the preparation of their own memorials for presentation to the conference.

At the beginning of June I did receive a fresh call from Paris, and at the same time a report appeared in the Jewish Chronicle (June 6) that at a meeting of the council of the Anglo-Jewish Association held on the previous Sunday, the president, Mr. Claude Montefiore, had made an official statement as to the steps taken to safeguard the rights of Jews in the treaties dealing with new territories in Eastern Europe, which he said had already been submitted to the countries concerned.

From this statement it appeared that not only had the claim ror ''national rights'' been given up, but that it had been decided not to press for any special electoral rights to safeguard the representation of the Jews in the legislatures and local governments, and that the question of Sunday trading was still unsettled, though Mr. Montefiore admitted this was ''enormously important to the Jews'', and another of the delegates said they laid great stress on it ''as its prohibition might easily be employed as an instrument in the economic boycot of the Jews.''

Returns to Paris.

It appeared that the only privilege which had been secured for the Jewish population was the control of their own social, religious and charitable institutions, with the right to use their own language in the schools; but this was claimed as ''charter of liberty for Jews'', and this success was attributed to the efforts of Mr. Lucien Wolf, who, it was stated, ''had been very worthily seconded by Mr. Louis Marshall of America . . . whose legal knowledge had stood them in very good stead''.

I traveled to Paris again without any delay, arriving on June 9 and I called at once on Mr. Marshall and informed him of the report made to the Anglo-Jewish Association, which he treated very lightly, stating that whatever had been done would not interfere with the prosecution of the [illegible] of the delegations, which had been formally handed [illegible] to the secretariat of the [illegible] Conference.

He [illegible] to the secretary of the delegation for a copy of the proposals as an authentic statement of the Jewish case to the conference; and on a perusal of this I found that it set out the full Jewish demand, and was accompanied by an ''Expose des Motifs (or Reasons for for the Proposals) which justified in detail the several claims, following in this the memorial which had been previously (March 2) submitted to President Wilson on behalf of the representatives of the American Jewish Congress attending the Peace Conference.

A Discrepancy Revealed.

The memorandum (which was accompanied by a separate memorandum containing a claim for reparation for the victims of the Pogroms in Poland and other states) was put forward as representing the demand of the nine million Jews represented by the delegations (including the B'nai B'rith).

This memorandum varied so entirely from the so-called ''Charter of Liberty'' which Mr. Montefiore had claimed to have been put forward with Mr. Marshall's assistance, for consideration by the countries concerned in the proposed treaties that, failing to see him on a further visit to his hotel, I though it right to call Mr. Marshall's attention more formally to the discrepancy, so that prompt action might be taken to put the matter right. I accordingly wrote to him on the same night (June 10) as follows:

''Dear Mr. Marshall: I came over after dinner to see you as arranged and have stayed on till now (11 p. m.) because I was really anxious to have a talk with you about the situation created by the presentation of the proposals of the delegations, which I have now had the opportunity of reading.

''I should like to congratulate you on them, but am rather deterred by the inconsistency between these proposals and the grounds so strongly urged for their acceptance, which bear your imprimatur, and your alleged attitude towards the main claim of the delegations. The report in the Jewish Chronicle of Mr. Claude Montefiore's statement to his Association, which I brought to show you, evidently does you injustice, and I thought you might like to repudiate the action attributed to you, even telegraphically, so that the libel on your activities for, and at the same time against the proposals of the delegations, should not get too long a start.

''What is happening makes it all the more necessary to consider the question of securing a hearing before the Peace Conference, and I hope you will arrange a meeting of the full committee this week when the matter may be discussed.''

Responds in Person.

No written reply was received to this communication, but Mr. Marshall called on me and stated that he did not propose to correct Mr. Montefiore's statement himself, and that he should deprecate action by anyone else. He resented any interference with his own liberty of action, and he stated that the negotiations which he was still carrying on on some outstanding points in conjunction with Mr. Lucien Wolf would be imperiled by any attempt to take other steps. The proposals of the delegations, he said, had been duly handed in to the secretariat, but he considered them to be only of ''historical interest'', and he had given up all hope, or intention, of pressing them on the conference.

I pressed for a meeting of the delegations to consider the situation which had thus been created, and he promised to attend if a meeting could be arranged, but he warned me of dangers to the Order itself if opposition to his action was seriously pressed.

A meeting of the delegations was accordingly convened and held on Friday, June 13, but there were only fifteen members present, most of the others (including all the American delegates except Dr. Syrkin) having already returned to their homes.

Formula Kept Secret.

Mr. Marshall, who had succeeded Judge Mack as president of the delegates, was in the chair and he reported that he was in communication with the American delegation to the conference on the right of appeal to the League of Nations proposed to be reserved by the treaties, and that two different formulas had been submitted for consideration by the Council of Four, and a separate formula had been submitted for Rumania, which was also under consideration; but, he added, the terms of these formulas could not be disclosed to the delegations and were therefore not open to discussion.

No attempt was made to question this autocratic ruling by any of the other delegates, and it was left to me to raise the issue whether the proposals of the delegations still stood, or whether they had been displaced by other proposals of which the undisclosed formulas formed part; and I referred to the report of Mr. Montefiore's statement which seemed to indicate that a radical change in the situation had taken place.

Gives Pledge to Fight.

Mr. Marshall thereupon declared explicitly that none of the demands of the delegations had been given up, and that he would continue to fight for them, but he objected to any counter statement being issued, even in the Delegations' Weekly Bulletin, repudiating Mr. Montefiore's report of what had taken place. One member, Dr. Motzkin, declared that, whatever might be the result of the negotiations referred to by the chairman, the delegations would continue to work for their full program, but the members generally were unwilling to continue the discussion after the chairman's declaration, and it was resolved to proceed to other business on the agenda.

The result is shown in the treaty arrived at between the Allies and Poland (suggested as the norm for the other Eastern European States) which was signed at Versailles a fortnight later (June 28) and issued with a covering letter from M. Clemenceau, as president of the Peace Conference.

A ''Minimum'' Victory

It is sufficient here to quote the statement in this letter of M. Clemenceau referring to clauses 10 and 11 of the treaty dealing specifically with the Jewish citizens of Poland:

''These clauses have been limited to the minimum which seems necessary under the circumstances of the present day, viz., the maintenance of Jewish schools, and the protection of the Jews in the religious observance of the Sabbath''.

That is the understanding of the president of the Peace Conference of this so-called ''Charter of Jewish Liberties''; and it will without doubt be the understanding on which the treaty will be accepted by the Polish Nationalists who will have to translate the Jewish clauses into practice.

It is to be noted too that the treaty itself provides (Art. 1) that the stipulations contained in Arts. 2 to 8 only are to be recognized as ''fundamental laws of the state'', and that the Jewish clauses (10 and 11) do not come within that category and fail therefore to possess the character originally claimed for them of a ''Bill of Rights''.

The Omissions in Detail.

I refrain from commenting here on these results. It is sufficient to set out shortly the claims made by the joint committee itself, by the American Jewish Congress and by the Jewish delegations which are either ignored or over-ridden by the treaty to appreciate them at their true value and significance:

''I. The Memorial of the Joint Committee:

Par. 5. Subjects and citizens of all the powers ''traders or others'' to be treated on a footing of perfect equality without distinction of creed or race . . . Omitted.

Par. 6. ''Any persons or communities'' who may suffer from non-observance of treaty provisions to have the right to submit complaints to the executive committee of the League of Nations; . . . Right of complaint confined to ''members of the Council''.

''II. Resolutions of the American Jewish Congress:

Par 3. Enjoyment of ''national'' (as well as civil, political and religious) rights . . . Over-ridden.

Par. 4. Provision by law for minority representation . . . Omitted

Par. 7. Prohibition of legislation against Sunday trading . . . Omitted.

''III. Proposals of the Jewish Delegations:

Par. 5. Recognition of the Jews as a national minority; . . . Over-ridden.

Par. 7. Right of proportional representation for Jews in all public bodies . . . No provision.

Par. 9. Prohibition of any legislation against Sunday Trading . . . Omitted.

Par. 11. Right of minorities to bring complaints before the League of Nations . . . Confined to members of the council

Pogrom Victims Ignored.

What the rejection of all these claims means is that there are no effective safeguards even for the rights which are nominally conceded—the internal, or domestic ones are struck out, and the external safeguard (the appeal to the League of Nations) is confined to members of the council. The claim for reparation for sufferers from the Pogroms is also ignored.

It is important to note these results because there is already evident danger of M. Clemenceau's minimum of concessions for the Jews being regarded as a real ''Charter of Jewish Liberties'', and the efforts to secure a full measure of rights, with proper safeguards suitable to the surrounding conditions in the East European States, being relaxed. A victory is being claimed; we all know that there is failure.

If it is permissible to construe Mr. Marshall's declaration at the June meeting of the delegations in that sense, the demands of the delegations have not been abandoned and will continue to be pressed by all the organizations, including those of America.

In any case it is practically certain that whatever other bodies may decide about this the Jewish populations of the East European States will and must continue to fight until these rights have been properly secured. The B'nai B'rith will have to decide for itself whether it will be satisfied with the formal concession of the minimum, or will assist the Jews of Eastern Europe in their further endeavors to secure a genuine charter for their liberties.

$35,000,000 is Sought for Relief of War Sufferers; Other News

THIRTY-FIVE MILLIONS is the aim of the latest drive for the relief of the victims of the war. Judging by the miracles accomplished it seems almost certain that it will be realized.

With all the stress of the war the mere handful of Swiss Jews established a Jewish tuberculosis sanitarium in Davos; an unnamed giver handed to the Jewish congregation of Stuttgart one million of marks for a Jewish hospital, and the estate owner, Friedmann of Breslau, bequeathed 3,000,000 marks for moderate priced dwelling houses. The activity of Nathan Straus in Jerusalem is brought home to our readers by a photograph on the following page, and no one can doubt that if he should actually become mayor of the Holy City, it will become, as Isaiah announced, a city of righteousness.

The war will result in a great shifting of the Jewish population, and this brings home the losses that we suffered. The island of Brabados, in the seventeenth century a promising colony, houses at present no more than two Jews. The synagog and the cemetery will pass into the trusteeship of the Portuguese Congregation of London. The Rev. J. H. Blackstone appeals in Israel's Messenger of Shanghai for the remnant of Israel in Kaifeng-Fu.

From two opposite ends of Europe, from Czecho-Slavakia, probably the section formerly belonging to Hungary, and from Holland, come protests against woman's suffrage in congregational boards. It is the spirit of Moses Sofer, who declared: Every innovation is prohibited by the Torah.

France has a new grandrabbin, Israel Levi, inaugurated July 4. He is the son-in law of the late Zadoc Kahn, and the ninth to hold this office since its creation by Napoleon, but the first representative of Jewish scholarship in the modern sense in his seat.

Death has claimed many prominent Jews. The United States Navy lost July 11 Admiral Adolph Marix, well known through the important part which he took in the investigation of the Maine catastrophe, which brought about the Spanish-American war. The rank of a vice-admiral was held by Isaac Molcho, surgeon of the Turkish Navy, who died in Constantinople at the age of 80.

The world's medical science lost July 10 a celebrity in Abraham Jacobi, one of the last surviving forty-eighters. Herman Oppenheim, a famous neurologist, died in Berlin at the age of sixty-two. Ernest Levy, retired professor of hygiene in the University of Strasburg, died in Frankfort.

Richard Wolfenstein, architect, builder of various monuments, synagogues, succumbed in Berlin. Charles K. Lipman, prominent in mining interests, died in New York July 3.

Elias Greenebaum, a notable in the banking world, and also a pioneer of Chicago's congregational life, died July 25 at the age of ninety-seven. Oscar Hammerstein, the typically American theatrical manager, succumbed in New York Aug. 1.

Special Jewish activities lost the dean of Jewish authors, Albert Harkavy of Petrograd. Joseph Arych Werbelowski, head of the Hebrew Publishing Company, who developed the Hebrew publishing business in America, died in New York June 11. Nathan Bamberger, rabbi of Wuerzburg, the son and successor of the truly noble Seligman Baer Bamberger, died April 28, in his seventy-ninth year.

Liberty—with Unofficial Reservations

Concerning Poles, Pogroms and Other Political Events in Old Nations and New; Mr. Marshall, an Optimist, Thinks Dr. Deutsch, Doubts Jews Security

By Dr. GOTTHARD DEUTSCH

THE Polish legion, fighting under Napoleon in Italy in 1796 is said to have drawn inspiration from the song, ''Poland is not yet lost''; which was an answer to Kosciuszko's famous, by him disavowed, ''Finish Poloniae.''

NATHAN STRAUS
RELIEF STATION

''FIRST AID'' TO A NEW STATE
Relief station, established in Jerusalem by Nathan Straus

The battle hymn of the legionaries of 1796 has become a reality, and to the Jews it is ''Jeszce Polska,'' the same old Poland of the sixteenth century, when the students of the Jesuit colleges celebrated their holidays by murderous attacks on the Jewish quarters, when the nobles amused themselves by setting their hounds on poor Moszko, and when the mobs revenged the outrageous treatment which they suffered at the hand of the nobles by killing and looting their Jewish fellow sufferers.

Jacob Billikopf, who returned from Poland where he superintended the relief work; Shalom Asch, the poet, and Herman Bernstein, the publicist, who investigated conditions on the spot, relate the same story of famine, of economic disorganization, of pogroms and —what is the worst—of constant fear of new attacks, a literal fulfillment of the curse (Deut. 28, 66); ''Thy life shall hang in doubt before thee, and thou shalt fear night and day, and shalt have no assurance of thy life.''

Even the officials of the Polish government abandoned their former policy of declaring the pogroms an invention of Poland's enemies, and The London ''Morning Post,'' whose antisemitic tendency makes it the safest publicity organ for Paderewski's government, admits that the riots in Cracow are a fact.

Members of the American commission in Warsaw had an opportunity to be eye witnesses of assaults on the Jewish population, and the Lithuanian commission in Paris, though a prejudiced source, laid before the Peace Commission facts which are so detailed that they can hardly be doubted.

Sermon on the Mount

It is impossible to enumerate all the facts reported which show how the Poles, who are about to establish a state which will recognize Christianity as the official religion, are enacting the commandment to love their enemies, conceding that Jews are their enemies, which, of course, we are by no means ready to admit.

Karl Kurz, a railroad official, who fled to Vienna from Stanislau where conditions are an actual hell, reports that Jews were requisitioned on the Shabuot festival to work all night at the most repulsive occupations as cleaning sewers, and how Polish soldiers under the direction of a colonel amused themselves by holding up Jews on the street and pulling out their ''Peot'' hair by hair.

An act of incredible brutality which was made the subject of an interpellation in the House of Commons is reported from Kolm, the disputed district of the government of Lublin, where a mob invaded the ritual bath and flogged the women found there. In Bendzin six girls were raped, afterwards killed and their horribly mutilated bodies thrown into the river.

Another case which was the subject of an interpellation in the House of Commons is reported from Slobodka Lesna near Kolomea, where the Baron de Hirsch fund maintains an agricultural school. Polish uhlans entered and without any reason shot at the students, killing two outright and wounding two others who were shot again, while being bandaged, and killed. The case concerns the British government directly, because the Jewish Colonization Association which maintains the school is a British corporation.

So far the reply to the interpellation is that the foreign office possesses no information. In Warsaw, a mob attacked the municipal abattoir on the pretext of punishing profiteers, and killed the Shohet Berish Gruenblatt, a man of 74 years, and hardly responsible for the high price of pork.

In Posen, Rabbi Philip Bloch, a man of 78, a scholar of great merit on Polish Jewish history, who held his office for nearly half a century and was never known to engage in politics, was arrested, and Rabbi Perlmutter of Warsaw, member of the Polish Seym, was attacked in the depot by ruffians who attempted to cut his beard. He was saved at the last moment by the police who probably feared that his appearance in the diet would be too strong evidence against the plea of German inventions.

Paradisus Judaeorum

A papal delegate, visiting Poland in the beginning of the sixteenth century, calls it the hell of the peasants, the heaven of the landed nobility and the paradise of the Jews. If his eminence was not prejudiced, matters have changed considerably. The names of the places which were the seats of pogroms during the last three months would make a long and dreary list. Names, like Kielce, Zyradow, Nowydwor, Rzeszow, Brzeznica and so forth, impose a tough task on English speaking people, and unless we have complete and reliable statistics, the enumeration of the individual facts would serve no purpose.

The pogrom of Wilna in the Passover week still occupies the center of interest. The list of victims in the latest reports has mounted to seventy killed, the number of wounded and the list of the looted houses and shops has not been ascertained. Among the killed are men past seventy, boys and girls below fifteen; 400 were exiled, and the population of the Jewish community was reduced by one-half through a death rate of more than 10 per cent, through flight and all forms of persecution.

The handiest excuse for all manners of persecution, unfortunately not restricted to backward countries, is the charge of Bolshevism. Unlikely as it is that one Mordecai Levinson at the age of 77 was a dangerous revolutionary, we are in no position to bring proof against it. We even have to admit that we do not know his exact age nor even that he ever existed, but we have one interesting proof of the method of gathering evidence.

The Polish publicity bureau which has its central seat in London and enjoys the unlimited confidence of the Associated Press, reported that members of the Danish legation to Russia, who were quoted by name, testified they had seen Jews shooting at Polish soldiers in Wilna. Here the patriotic Popolskis proved too much. An inquiry made by Professor Simonsen of Copenhagen at the foreign office established the fact that the Danish legation had been withdrawn from Russia in December, 1918, while the pogrom in Wilna took place in April, 1919, and the names of the supposed members of the legation were entirely unknown at the foreign office in Copenhagen.

Another amusing instance of finding evidence of Bolshevism in Jewish houses is furnished from Cracow where a pogrom took place June 7 and 8, a proof of the earnest desire of Pan Padereswki's government to stop this disgrace. The police searched the house of Adolph Goldberg, a former inspector of the Austrian railroad service, where they found a Hebrew certificate of membership in the Bolshevik organization, executed in elegant penmanship and surmounted by two interlocked hands—the symbol of the brotherhood—a revolver with five cartridges and a German document corroborating the well-known fact that the Bolsheviki are working for Pan-Germanism.

The latter incriminating document proved to be his identification card issued by the railroad department, the revolver was part of his equipment which he had to carry when on duty, and the Hebrew diploma was his marriage certificate (Ketubah).

Another reason for the pogroms is usually given by the claim that the Jews, insisting on group rights are provoking the national Polish sentiment. To this charge a story though probably folklore, gives a very clever answer. A group of Hasidim making their regular pilgrimage to their saint in Gura Kalwarya (the Gerer Zaddik) were asked why they, who are opposed to Jewish autonomy, did not send a delegation to Paris. They replied: "As we have no airship, we would have to travel by train, and then our beards would have been pulled out by the root which is not only against the law but somewhat painful."

Healing the Hurt of My People

The force of democratic institutions was clearly demonstrated by our latest experience. After the indignation and protest meetings held in the United States, England woke up. The old fashioned shtadlan leadership objected to anything which might cause unpleasantness in Downing street. Sir Philip Magnus went so far as to suggest that the meeting be prohibited, and he found sympathy, just as in 1914, the production of Zangwill's "Melting Pot" in the movies was withdrawn on the suggestion of the foreign office that it might cause irritation to an allied nation.

The meeting was held June 26, and had a tremendous effect. A resolution condemning the atrocities, passed by the American Federation of Labor, and similar actions taken by labor organizations in neutral countries, made official Poland feel that the policy of denial, or the Bolsheviki stunt, would not do under the conditions.

The treaty by which the Big Five recognized the independence of Poland, published June 30, stipulates in article 8 that "Polish nationals who belong to racial, religious or linguistic minorities shall enjoy the same treatment and security in law and in fact as the Polish nationals." Articles 10 and 11 mention especially the Jews and secure for them freedom in the management of their educational, charitable and religious institutions with special guarantee of legal recognition of their Sabbath. Article 13 provides that these rights be placed under the guarantee of the League of Nations.

The Devil Crossing Himself

I cannot claim to be a Shakespearian scholar, and—to be candid—the exegesis of a passage in the Responsa of Joseph Ibn Migash is for the present of more interest to me than the meaning of an obscure epigram in "Timon of Athens," but perhaps because of the habit of homiletical explanation of old texts, I would venture to give the following explanation of Shakespeare's lines: "The devil knew not what he did when he made man politic, he crossed himself by't." Shakespeare wishes to say that the devil when creating a politician in his image crosses himself, feeling, there are others.

The Poles signed the treaty, and the Polish parliament passed a resolution condeming pogroms. The provisional government of Poland has given the American legation at Warsaw positive assurance that it will not tolerate persecution of the Jews. This statement was made public by the department of state in Washington, June 3, and on the same day the Lithuanian delegation in Paris presented to the Peace Conference the above mentioned memorandum in which they declared that Polish armies "have committed wholesale pogroms against the Jewish population whose dead and injured already count up an imposing number."

The "Christian Science Monitor," which seems to cater occasionally to its Jewish clientele, published on July 8, an order of the Polish minister of war, against pogroms; while to judge by the assurance of Mr. Porter, chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House of Representatives, and the report of the United States minister to Poland, Mr. Gibson, pogroms are a mere invention of a German owned newspaper in Copenhagen. This is the substance of Mr. Porter's remarks to representatives of both Jews and Poles who were to have a hearing before his committee.

ANSHEL and Berl were partners in junk peddling. As it is a bad policy to let the seller know that the buyer is anxious to close the deal, it was decided that only one should do the buying, while the other as a sign of consent would step on the spokesman's toe.

One time Berl represented the firm, closed a bargain and Anshel, while all the time protesting against a deal which was bound to result in a loss, stepped on the firm's acting toe. The deal, however, actually resulted in a loss, and Anshel refused to bear his part of the loss. Berl indignantly asked: "Did you not step on my toe?" "Did I?" asked Anshel. "Well, if I did, 'sei mer's mochel.'"

Mr. Gibson speaks of "violent agitation abroad" that "cannot help the Jews" and advises to "moderate the tone" of the Jewish and of the Polish Press. He pleads for "the lack of experience and power" of the Polish government, and advises patience.

We have had some of it in the days of Chmelnicki and Gontha; we had it in 1659 when two rabbis were beheaded in Rossiery on Rosh Hashanah; when in 1664 the prayerbook on the pulpit of the Lemberg synagog was pierced by a lance, the marks still being visible, and incidentally a few dozen worshippers were pierced too; when in the same city in 1726 two rabbis, on the charge that they had criminally aided and abetted a converted Jew to return to his ancestral faith, were killed with tortures that would make an Indian of King Philip's time green with envy.

We had patience when Rabbi Joseph Darshan of Posen, the predecessor of Philip Bloch, was tortured in prison and only discharged to die at home. Posen was then not under the tyrannical rule of the Prussians, against whom the Poles rebelled in 1848 also stepping on some Jewish toes, just as they did in celebrated Lemberg on Nov. 23, 1918.

But, of course, this is stepping on our toes which can't always be avoided. We shall take Mr. Gibson's advice, moderate our tone, and say: "Sei mer's mochel."

The Christian Virtues on the Other Side.

Paderewski admitted to the "Morning Post," which supports him as faithfully as it supported, up to three years ago, the democratic government of Czar Nicholas II, that the pogroms are due to the undisciplined army, a status which will readily be admitted, and declared the government is making all possible efforts to remedy these conditions. In the Seym, however, he expressed regret that Poland, confronted by the power of the British labor element and the Jewish bankers had to sign a treaty which places minorities under the protection of the League of Nations.

The printed records omitted this passage, but unfortunately the papers, even of the Polish side, had published it. Prince Sapieha, Polish minister to England, assured a committee of Polish Jews of Great Britain that his government is animated by the well known desires, etc.; John F. Smulski, president of the Polish American Society, is also sorry, indeed as sorry as President Pilsudski at home, who told the press representatives that the whole trouble was due to Russian maladministration which made of Poland a world ghetto. Pan Pilsudski got a little mixed up in his history. Russia, in annexing Poland, annexed the Jews also, but did not allow them to settle in Russia proper with the exception of a not inconsiderable number of favored individuals; so that, if anything, Russia relieved somewhat the congestion of Poland.

Mojaszewski, the military commander, coincides so accurately with Mr. Gibson's views that the source of the latter's information can easily be guessed. He adds the old story that the source of the trouble is economic and social. We only wonder why this animosity does not stop at the poor Jews, who are the vast majority of the population. We also wonder how the dead buried in the cemetery of Lodz, where the Polish soldiers are pasturing their horses, could be guilty of profiteering.

Pan Korfanty, until lately member of the German Reichstag, as Prince Sapieha was of the Austrian Herrenhaus, did not explain this fact in his address in the Seym where he accused the Jews of pro-Germanism. The same Korfanty is quoted by the Warsaw correspondent of the "London Morning Post" as authority for the authenticity of a circular asking for funds in order to keep Germany in possession of Upper Silesia because Germany is the friend of the Jews, as she has shown by her support of the Zionist movement, which has its strongest advocates in Ira D. Nelson, U. S. minister to Copenhagen (sic) and in Louis D. Brandeis, Wilson's best friend.

Behind the Scenes.

The idea that statesmen are puppets in the hands of a secret Jewish organization is not new. The enumeration of all the achievements of this conveniently omnipresent Jew, governing the universe by his wiles, might fill volumes. Infidel prelates of the sixteenth century, disturbed in their comfort by the Reformation which confiscated their livings, were sure that the whole trouble was due to the Jews, and Jesuits in the nineteenth century held the Jews responsible for Old Catholicism.

One of the most common allegations is the Jewish mistress, the Esterka who bewitched Casimir the Great until he flooded the country with Jews and her reincarnation, who hypnotized Prince Hardenberg until he issued the edict of 1812, granting to the Jews of Prussia full civic equality. The latest sequel to the story is a Polish Jewess who dictated to Mr. Lloyd George article 12 of the treaty with Poland. At least this is what Pan Dmowski tells us. The estimable lady was not quite successful, and ought to economize her caresses for a while.

Poland is not yet the Paradisus Judaeorum. Hirsch Koslowski, a carpenter in Bialystok, obtained a job on a municipal building through the city engineer, but was discharged on the next day because the foreman threatened a walkout if a Jew were employed on a city job. The head of the department of justice in Posen proposed a per cent limit for Jewish lawyers, and a Jewish clerk in the postoffice, employed for 15 years, was discharged by the Polish administration upon the demand of the new employes.

These are things which no section 12 will remedy, nor will it be easy to prevent pogroms when, as was the case recently in Kalisch, after a pogrom in which one was killed and eight wounded, only one man was sentenced to a term of 20 months in prison. Two items prove conclusively how the Jews view the future. The congregation of Posen established a parochial school. They know that their children will suffer in a Polish school. Kurjer Warszawski, the organ of the National Democrats, announces already that the Poles propose to solve the Jewish problem after the Russian fashion. Forty thousand Jews in Warsaw applied for passports to America.

A solution of the problem is impossible unless the Poles are made to understand that czarism will do them no more good than it has done to the Romanoffs.

K. A. KOWALSKI, the delegate of the Russian government in Omsk, who recently arrived from Siberia, issues an appeal in which all the kingdoms on earth are promised to the kinsfolks of Christ, though, like in that classic instance, they are only showing them from a considerable altitude. Premier Wologodski of the same government, issues a similar statement in London. There is no such thing as a pogrom in Siberia. It is done by the other fellow, the Pole and the Ukrainian, and above all the unspeakable Bolshevik.

Archbishop Platon of Odessa, who had the honor of being received by President Wilson, came to this country to plead for the protection of the priests of the Russian church from the murderous fury of the Bolsheviki, who, he said, kill the popes but spare the rabbis. He modified his statement subsequently.

Two weeks later the news came that a resolution was presented to the Holy Synod of Kiev, of which the Most Reverend Platon is a member, condemning all acts of violence against the Jews.

Workers for the Jewish Welfare Board in France. Rabbi Levinger, the author of this article, stands seventh from the left.

Holy Days Along the Battle Front

How the Festivals of 1918, Conducted in Improvised Synagogues and in Intimate Contact with Death, Stirred a New Fervor in Soldier's Hearts

THE author of the following articles, Rabbi Lee J. Levinger, has just returned to the United States, after ten months' service as a chaplain of the American Expeditionary Force in France.

By LEE J. LEVINGER

THE approaching holy days remind us very forcibly by contrast of the festival season a year ago and of the last Passover as well. And the contrast is all the stronger to one who spent both New York and Passover in France as a member of the A. E. F.; who served there as rabbi among the soldiers, and who had the great privilege of leading soldier congregations in the observance of the faith of their fathers.

Religion had a special meaning then to men in the army, in pressing and imminent danger, living and fighting in a foreign land. The soldier longed for home and the things of home. Naturally religion was one of these, one of the chief comforters and strengtheners of the spirit.

Imagine the contrast between my services in France and those to which I had been accustomed in our rather tame and formal civilian congregations. My congregation there was composed almost entirely of men, and those men all very young.

We were meeting in a strange land, amid an ancient but alien civilization, which some of us liked and some disliked, but which none of us could quite understand. We had no Torah, no Shofar, even no complete Machzor. We had no synagogue, and the places we used were lent us by people of another faith, friends and co-workers, indeed, but with little interest in our festival or our religious needs.

But, with it all, we had a spirit which one cannot excel except, perhaps, amid the persecutions of Russia or Poland. These boys wanted to go to Schul. At home they had seldom gone, had never had a great desire for religious observance. In the army in France they were eager, not only for the two days' leave on each festival, but also for the services, to remind them of home, to hearten them for the terrible work ahead, to make them feel happier and more at home in the world.

Rosh ha Shana at Nevers.

I spent Rosh ha Shana and Yom Kippur at the historic city of Nevers, in central France, then headquarters of the Intermediate Section, Service of Supply. Over five hundred soldiers came in for the services from the entire surrounding country, as this was one of the designated points for Jewish services.

The entire American area in France had been charted out for the purpose, and the central cities pointed out, either those which had French synagogues to receive our men, or, like Nevers, those points where Americans were to be found and arrangements had to be provided for them.

Nevers is a quaint, old-world town of 30,000 people, on a hill by the River Loire, with a cathedral (like most French cities) not great, but charming, with crooked streets and comfortable hotels, and—at that time—a surplus of American soldiers. Two barracks in the city were occupied by Americans, as well as a number of camps in the vicinity and many training areas and hospital centers further away.

So the members of my congregation were convalescents from the hospitals, engineers from the camp near the city, troops in training fifty miles away, who were soon to enter the fighting of the Argonne, mechanics from the motor repair shops at Verneuil, medical corps men from the great hospital center at Vichy—a mixed but congenial crowd.

They came pouring into the city in such numbers that they soon overflowed the hotels, and it required a night's work of several worried officers to find blankets and floor space for them all in barracks at the edge of town. Some, direct from hospitals, had had no pay for months and had to have the smallest accommodations provided for them. But all were happy to be together on Rosh ha Shana.

Y. M. C. A. Hut a Synagogue.

Our synagogue was the large Y. M. C. A. at the barracks. Our arrangements were made under the approval of my commanding officer, the senior chaplain of the post, and few features of our service were more appreciated than the address of Chaplain Stull at our services on the second day of the festival.

I had hesitated to invite him, and was therefore doubly surprised when he assured me that this was the third successive year that he had preached at a Jewish New Year service. The things we consider impossible, or at least sensational in civil life, fast became matter of fact in the army.

Our chazan for most of the services was a New York boy, Corporal Cohen, and we found other willing volunteers to assist from time to time. Our head usher was Sergeant Stern, who was as efficient in this task as sergeants traditionally are at everything.

The Y. M. C. A. canteen closed down during the hours announced for services, and the workers attended with the rest of us. And at one of our evening services we offered to be done fifteen minutes earlier than usual so that Christian patrons of the hut need not be disappointed in their semi-weekly picture show.

The service was read out of the little prayer book of the Jewish Welfare Board, which gave a shortened but excellent service; unfortunately, however, less than a fourth of the boys happened to have books—which they had brought from the States—and I had been unable to bring any supplies with me. I read about half the service in English, besides having it all chanted in Hebrew, and gave a sermon in English as well.

Of course we wore our hats, partly as a willing concession of the reform men to the orthodox and partly because a soldier naturally wears his tiny overseas cap at all times, and has to be specially reminded to take if off anywhere.

In the Shadow of Death.

With all its unusual externals, the service was deeply affecting to us all.

The war was going on hotter than ever; between the holy days the St. Mihiel drive took place; no man present knew how soon he would be at the front, how soon he might give up his life. No man knew how long he was destined to stay in France, when or whether he would see his loved ones again. Many had special thanks to render for their own recovery from wounds received at Chateau Thierry or Champigny. All lived in uncertainty of the morrow; brothers met by chance who had not seen each other for a year, and parted at the end of the two days not knowing whether they would ever meet again.

The three Jewish families of the city added a pathetic touch, for they were glad indeed to attend a service, and appreciated the Hebrew, whether or not they understood our English addition. Rosh ha Shana and Yom Kippur in France were days of profound emotion, of uncertainty, of mingled sorrow and hope.

Far otherwise was Passover, which I spent in the American Embarkation Center, at the larger and better known city of Le Mans. In the interval I had been at the front with the Twenty-seventh Division, had served with that unit until it left for home, and now was post chaplain at Le Mans.

The war had been won and the armistice signed. The tide was no longer flowing, in eagerness but dread, toward the battle fields; the men were now going in a steady stream toward the land of their desire—America.

Death was no longer about us, nor fresh woundings, nor the expectation of more. Our worst uncertainty was whether we were to be the first or the last to embark for home. And in the meantime the Jewish Welfare Board had established itself as part of the organization of the A. E. F. Arrangements for Pesach were made in connection with its active workers.

A Mixed Congregation.

At Le Mans we had fully a thousand men, from the Twenty-eighth and Eightieth Divisions and the troops of the area. Two men came in from an isolated post of Military Police at St. Calais, fifty miles to the east, and five from the students at the University of Rennes, a hundred miles west. Five French families, several French Jewish soldiers and two Jews in the Russian uniform worshipped with us.

But the first men I saw when they started to assemble were a group of engineers whom I had not seen since Atonement Day, seven months before. They were on the way home now and emphasized more strongly than anything else could the change that had come to the soldiers and the world in the intervening months.

Again, there were the meetings of friends and brothers, but without the pang of parting afterward. One of the most touching features of the Seder was the number who asked me to inquire whether Sergeant Levi or Private Isaacs was there, and how the whole gathering would be electrified when a voice would cry out, ''Here,'' and cousins or comrades who had not known even of each other's safety were able to exchange festal greetings and rejoice together.

For the two and a half days' leave the Jewish Welfare Board and I tried to keep the men busy with something for every taste. The full program included a Seder, four services, a literary program, a vaudeville show, a boxing exhibition, two dances and a movie.

WHAT HAS BEEN ACCOMPLISHED

WHEN the peace treaty with Germany was signed at Versailles in the closing days of June, in the judgment of the allied statesmen the major part of the business that was to be settled was done. Our President, with a none too friendly Congress in session at home, could no longer defer his departure, and he was soon followed by his Secretary of State. What remains to be accomplished, the treaties with Austria and Bulgaria and Turkey, has been committed to the care of their associates.

The treaty with Germany, embodying it does the League of Nations articles, is now before the Senate and the nation. It probably will be ratified, possibly with certain reservations or interpretations''. The opponents of the League will have had their say, but in the long run the recognition must force itself upon them that, where there were so many clashing interests and each nation was bent upon obtaining what it cherished most, probably the best that could be done was accomplished.

Cavilling is easy; but the test is the thing done. It is quite likely that this or the other senator or plain citizen thinks that had he been there a better treaty would have been the result. They are entitled to their opinion. But they were not there; and with best grace they should accept the good even if the better might have been achieved.

The supreme question is how far American interests have been safeguarded. We have been told that America had no particular objects of its own and that its chief desire was to pacify the world and to see to it that justice was accorded to all and everyone. It is quite true that America had not and could not have territorial designs; but we entered the war for a definite purpose, and that was to keep the terror away from our own doors.

If that has been realized and if the treaty and the League formation precludes any and every menace from whatever quarter, then the treaty is actually the very best. But even from this point of view we must bear in mind that which was realizable. It were preposterous to expect this or any other treaty to bring on the millenium.

Example for the Jews.

The attitude of the nation towards that which our President and his associates have accomplished should be copied in the attitude which we Jews must take towards that which has been done by our representatives. Theirs was an infinitely more difficult task. They were not of the Conference. The Jewish people had no claim to any such status.

Our formidable opponents met their peers on an equal footing and were privy to all that went on within, our spokesmen were forced to pick up information as best they might. Moreover, our adversaries had something to offer.

Poland was re-created as a buffer state, against the terror on the west which the victors had laid low and the red spectre on the east which casts its lurid glare westward. Another such state is right now being handled with gloves; half mistrusted they are needed for the moment to do a certain job.

Politics is the game of give and take. What had we Jews to give? All talk about Jewish domination and Jewish influence is a downright lie. We wield no power commensurate with the political influences which our enemies were able to throw into the scale. Israel's cause had to be presented with consummate skill. Ultimately our weapon was not one of force, it simply could not be that, but one of moral suasion, of appeal to the sense of justice, to the fundamentals of the new order evolving and having for its aim ridding the world of all the vexatious problems which constitute at present an element of discord and strife.

We may therefore be well satisfied with what our representatives at home and abroad have accomplished. In the newly formed and newly defined states there have been won for our brethren minority rights, and they have been won not for the Jews alone, but for all racial, linguistic and religious minorities, for the millions of Germans lodged in Polish territory and for the Poles themselves outside Poland.

Dawn of a New Era.

A new formula is created for new and unwonted times and conditions. The Jewish people as a body comes into the right to live its corporate life, free from all hindrance and chicanery, the right to Jewish education for the Jewish child, the right to organize for religious and cultural purposes, in short the right to continue the Jewish people alive. The state must not be a Moloch to swallow up all individuality. State interests there must be, aye, national interests, in which Jew and Christian must share alike, for the greater glory of their common country. But the state should not intrude into the innermost soul of any group of its citizens.

In England, in America this is so obvious that no legal safeguards, no legal definition is required. We have here all the autonomy we may legitimately desire. Our congregations may form a united body, our educational and philanthropic and social agencies may work singly or be federated. But over there the Jew was at every step interfered with, hampered, harrassed, thwarted and persecuted, because forsooth he clings to his ancient heritage.

Hope of Complete Victory.

Will the guarantees written into the very treaties and constitutions and notably the provision that minorities will have redress at the high court of the nations under the League remain a dead letter? We hope not. Notice has been served by the guiding statesmen, by such men as President Wilson and Premier Clemenceau, that the Jewish question cannot be sidetracked.

So much has been accomplished. The healing hand of time will do much to unite in amity not only the nations which yesterday dealt death to each other, but also the variegated elements within each and every nation.

Let the Christian respect the rights and feelings of his next door Jewish neighbor, if not from principles of humanity, then from the certain knowledge that the blessing of a perfect understanding and of mutual helpfulness will tend to strengthen the common fatherland which both cherish and love.

The Lord's Day

On Atonement, Let the Cord be Strengthened That Knits All Jewry Together

By DR. MAX L. MARGOLIS

WHEN the days were fashioned ere there was man on earth, the Lord, so the Midrash evolves out of the textual reading of the sixteenth verse of the hundred and thirty-ninth psalm, reserved one day for Himself. That day is the Day of Atonement.

You would not think so sometimes when you witness the behavior of congregrants towards the close of the day. There is an impatience to leave the house of worship, to steal a minute or two from the day which is not ours at all, not so much because every heart is faint and every head sick, but in order to hasten back to the little shop and to carry on business before darkness settles down.

The big store keeper ought not to be in haste, for his store was not closed at all. The shame of it that under whatsoever pretext and with whatsoever recreance to duty, as the years go by, the fewer are the large establishments that shut down on the one day of the year. They will close out of respect to a decased partner in the business. But not on the Day of Atonement.

Business Before Worship.

The Sabbath, alas, is desecrated with impunity by manufacturer and pushcart peddler alike. Such is the exigency of the hard struggle for existence. Shall the one day in the year, which the Lord set aside for His own, be likewise desecrated?

And for what reason has it been set aside? The Lord's are all the days and all the time. What need has the Lord of a day in the week or in the year when a thousand years are to Him like a day? Measurements of time are for man. Even the beast observes the divisions of day and night. Only beasts of prey go forth in the darkness to lurk for their prey. The night is meant for rest. But in the artificial life of supercivilized metropolitan man night is turned into day for pleasure and for show.

And yet man requires rest not only for his weary limbs and shattered nerves. He needs mental, spiritual rest likewise. To restore the spiritual equilibrium in man's estate such days as the Day of Atonement were appointed, days of spiritual stock taking, of casting up the spiritual balance. We go about our daily pursuits recklessly. We spend our strength, our bodies, our souls. We deaden all sense of propriety. We ride roughshod over duty. We rob and oppress. We profiteer in life's commodities. We hoard and waste. We show neither respect nor pity.

Questions for Conscience.

The long list of the confessional does not begin to exhaust our misdeeds. Have we done our full duty as parents, as children? As citizens of the state, have we voted righteously or even voted at all? As men in public trust, have we heeded the weal of the city or of the commonwealth? Has our nation dealt squarely and fairly with all the elements that constitute our citizenry and with all other nations near and far?

We have passed through a long and bloody war. Who will say whose was the guilt? Shall we in self-complacency hold ourselves guiltless? War is a calamity, a punishment for sin. And if the sin is our neighbor's, have we eliminated from our hearts ignoble revenge? And when peace was patched up, have we stretched out our hands to the vanquished foe? Has there been a reconcilation?

All these questions are pertinent when we meet the Searcher of hearts. Long ago the great prophet from our midst announced the true fast day, the true day of the Lord. Fasting is a means to an end. So is religion. Ceremonies have a place in the scheme. Judaism is Unitarian in doctrine and Catholic or High Church in ritual. But the end and aim of religion is not the long service, not even with the vapid sermon thrown in. It is not the rabbi's day; it is the Lord's day.

The service and the fasting is the outward symbol of an inward act of regeneration, of spiritual cleansing, that the heart of stone may melt away and make room for the heart of flesh. And out of it is born sympathy with our flesh and blood, sympathy for the disinherited and downtrodden. ''To the end that we may cease from the oppression in our hands.''

When we leave the house of worship we must be ready not to fly to our gain, to our business, but to take a hand in all that tends to the betterment of intolerable conditions. And for one thing, as Jews it behooves us to remember that under the stress of conditions which are not of our own making we are emptied out pretty much of all Jewish consciousness for the greater part of the year.

The synagogue is the Jewish island in the midst of an un-Jewish sea. We do not betake ourselves to it as we should on all days of the year. We are casual callers on the Almighty. But there are still alive certain impulses that grip us on the Lord's day. Let us not return empty-handed. Let on this day of days the Jewish word be heard. Let us renew our allegiance to the Jewish cause. If orthodox, we mourn the past glories which departed long ago all too mechanically. If reformers, we rehearse the story as a finished chapter.

Time of Reconciliation.

God has His own scheme. He is working salvation right before our very eyes. Let our hearts be thrilled with His mighty operations. Let us rejoice in the surcease which may have come to the harassed brother in distant lands. Let us rejoice in the rehabilitation of the land of the fathers. Above all let us strengthen the cord that knits Jewry together. Let there be a true reconciliation within Jewry. Let the voice of strife be heard no more. Let us not profane the Name by denouncing the other Jew.

Those who honor us by aloofness and withdrawal from all Jewish activities are the least entitled to meddle with Jewish affairs. Let them sulk and stay behind and it matters not whether they enter the church or not. ''The informers shall have no share in the future order of things.'' You will not find these worthies in the house of God on the Lord's day. For on this great day, as in the future day of judgment, it becomes known who is for us or against us.

On the Lord's day Jewish solidarity is cemented, and the worshippers of Baal are segregated from those who own allegiance to the Lord only and subscribe themselves with the honored name of the Jew.

Omission

A Little Too Much Efficiency

The Story of an Ill-advised Industrial Engineer, and of Other Activities of the Anti-Defamation League in Combating Slander

JOHN B. LYON, industrial engineer for the Corticelli Silk Mills of Florence, Mass., advised employers in the June issue of ‘‘100 percent, the Efficiency Magazine,’’ to hire ‘‘no Negroes, Jews or Turks.’’ In full, the article read:

‘‘The employment problem has so many angles that in writing about it the question arises which to take first.

‘‘The angle that gives employment managers the most trouble is the human factor. A small business in a country town has very little employment trouble at first, but it grows to a point where it uses all the help in the town and needs more. In this case the new help specifications usually are ‘hire anyone from as young as the law allows to as old as they can lift a hand.’

‘‘The other extreme is the big business located in a city. They have transportation lines from all directions passing their door. They are up to date and know:

‘‘1. The lowest-priced help is far from the cheapest.

‘‘2. Helping celebrate too many holidays interferes with production.

‘‘3. Help not personally agreeable to their neighbors is a poor asset.

‘‘Knowing this, their new help specifications are quite apt to read:

‘‘Hire only those between the ages of 18 and 35.

‘‘No Negroes, Jews or Turks.

‘‘No cripples, consumptives or weak hearts.

‘‘No women who paint or dress flashily.

‘‘No men who drink or swagger.’’

He Did as the Arabs.

It chances that Mr. Lyon is no longer identified with the Corticelli Silk Mills, for the reason that following a meeting of the administrative committee of the Anti-Defamation League with the editor in chief of ‘‘100 per cent’’ and its general manager, the objectionable character of this article was brought to the attention of Mr. Lyon’s employers.

In the July issue the magazine printed the following:

‘‘An Apology.

‘‘Last month a short contribution from a mature engineer of long experience was passed for printing by the editor, in spite of a deprecating remark about several groups of Americans. When reading it the editor failed to note the unfairness and injustice of the statement.

‘‘In making ‘100 per cent’ an idea exchange, a great deal of latitude is allowed contributors in expressing opinions, but our aim is to prevent the appearance of anything unfair, unjust or un-American in its columns.

‘‘We take this occasion to publicly apologize to the groups mentioned in the article, to the company the author represented and to our readers for our failure to hold to the demonstrated policy of fairness with which these and all other groups of Americans have been treated in every number of our twelve volumes.’’—The Editor.

An Inconsistent Editor.

‘‘On April 25 the Easton Labor Journal of Easton, Pa., accepted and published an advertisement from a man named Shullman offering to buy Liberty Bonds. On the same page A. S. Eckert, the editor, permitted to be printed comment as follows:

‘‘It strikes us funny how the sleek conniving Jew is now trying his utmost to buy Liberty Bonds of holders who think they need the money. Now, reader, just watch how these Shylocks will buy of the new issue. Before we would sell them one, we would tear it up.’’

On May 7 the article, having been brought to the attention of the Administration Committee, the secretary wrote Mr. Eckert in part as follows:

‘‘If you intend to express opposition to those who make it their business to buy Liberty Bonds for less than par, then we wish you good luck in your undertaking, for we are of the opinion that no citizen of the United States ought to pe permitted to buy or sell Government Bonds for less than par. But if that is your view, why did you accept Shullman’s advertisement?

‘‘Is Shullman a Jew? If so, why do you attack him as a Jew and by the manner of your attack help to create prejudice and hatred against the Jews who do not engage in this practice? We take it for granted you know that on the New York Stock Exchange Liberty Bonds to the amount of millions are purchased below par, and that more than 90 per cent of the bonds so purchased are purchased by non-Jews.

‘‘We are writing this letter on the theory that we are addressing a citizen who wants to be fair, and if so, we are sure that he will make amends. Should, however, it be the case (which we hope not) that we are addressing one whose aim is to create hatred against a minority of American citizens regardless of whether they deserve it or not, the writing of this letter is, of course, a waste of time.’’

All Is Not Well With Him.

It appeared that Mr. Eckert experienced some little travail at the hands of his local readers, because he complained in a letter of June 5 as follows:

‘‘In reply to your letter pertaining to article published in my Journal, and which was referred to your society by some of the Jewish gentlemen of Easton, would say, as I have already explained to several of them, that at the time the article was published I was busily engaged at court on a civil case, and my assistant, who wrote the article, and has always been reliable, on this occasion, for the first time I allowed his matter to go through without reading it, and it seems this was the unfortunate occasion in which he expressed himself in a manner which did not meet with my approval.

‘‘The above can be easily verified, and is the truth as to how the article happened to be published. The broad minded Jews of this city immediately accepted my explanation, and continued their friedly relations with my publication, but a few of the narrow minded ones, who may have been waiting for an opportunity to start something, would not accept my explanation, but withdrew their support from my publication.

‘‘I have made friends among the Jewish people of this city and elsewhere, and have no reason for singling them out any more so than any other denomination or class of people.

‘‘Thanking you for your letter and your interest in the matter, assuring you that the article passed through on the day previous to publication while I was at court, but from the treatment accorded me by these men, who are so sensitive, I feel that in the future I will be at liberty to so transact my business as not reflect upon them, but at the same time enjoy the privilege to exercise my own good judgment as to the articles published.’’

A Few Words of Advice.

The Administrative Committee discussed the case at length and on July 1, wrote:

‘‘We noted carefully your statements, and, speaking frankly, we were of the opinion that your letter was written in a spirit of accusation and criticism rather than in explanation and retraction.

‘‘Emphatically, we wish to state that any action taken by any of the Jewish people of your city was of their own volition and without prompting on our part.

‘‘We are ready to accept your explanation as to your not being personally responsible for the article, but we cannot understand why you did not, at once, publish a retraction and an explanation, instead of first having advices as to whether such retraction and explanation were acceptable. To our minds that should have been your first thought and action.

‘‘In taking up this matter with you it was not and is not our intention to in any way harm or lessen the material welfare or influence of your paper, but is merely an endeavor to carry out the principles of our organization, among which is to prevent the publication of unjust articles which, in their very nature, would tend to create and foster prejudice toward one class of citizens of our country.

‘‘We hope, as a result of our correspondence, and future action by you with reference to the article complained of, that you will demonstrate your belief in the justice and fairness of our viewpoint.’’

Concerning Bolshevik Agitators.

The Courier of Toronto, Canada, early in June, published an article in which Jews were attacked as the principal exponents of Bolshevism in Canada. The secretary of the League, on behalf of the Administrative Committee, called the injustice of the slander to the attention of Augustus Bridle, the editor, under date of June 14 in the following manner:

‘‘You publish on page seven of the May 4th issue of your paper, a picture of the homecoming of the Fourteenth Battalion. Have you forgotten the record of the Lost Battalion and of the men who served with such signal distinction under General Allenby in Palestine?

‘‘We regret very much that we cannot quote statistics relative to the percentage of Jews from Canada who have enlisted in the world war. In the States, however, more than 200,000 Jews were in the service—about 5 per cent of the Jews of this country; while the Jews total less than 3 per cent of the population.

‘‘The United States Investigating Committee, after interviewing a number of people, found that the charges of Bolshevism made against the Jews were the result of the activities of a few individuals who were interested in spreading Anti-Semitic propaganda throughout the world. A number of the leading newspapers and magazines of this country carried editorials refuting the charges that Jews were responsible for Bolshevism.

‘‘You say that most of the Jews live in cities because they hate the land. By what authority do you make that statement? The Jews in Palestine were an agricultural people.

‘‘Jews are everywhere in the minority. It seems easy to attack a small minority. From past experience we are not astonished when the doctrine of race hatred is preached in Russia and Rumania, but we surely did not look for it in Canada.

‘‘Your paper seems to be otherwise well conducted. Don’t you think that its influence should be used to lessen instead of to increase the prejudice against a people who have suffered for centuries for conscience’s sake?’’

No Malice Was Intended.

Two days later Mr. Bridle replied as follows:

‘‘In answer to your very welcome letter I have pleasure in sending you a copy of the Canadian Courier in which we made an answer to several letters of protest received on the subject. From this you will infer that there was no intention in the editor of this paper to accuse Jews in general of being Bolshevists.

‘‘As a matter of fact this paper has never undertaken any campaign against any race in this country and does not intend so to do.

‘‘There are a great many diverse opinions about the Jews in the present order of civilization and we are interested in getting the truth of the matter more than in spreading prejudice and bigotry. There are still things to be said about Canadian citizenship which may involve criticism of some of the Jewish policies, but whatever we publish on this subject will not be done in malice.’’

The copy of the Courier referred to contained the following editorial:

‘‘Based Upon a Misunderstanding.

‘‘The fact that we publish the letters of complaint on the editorial page should be proof that we endorse the sentiments which they contain. We could not publish and endorse them if in a previous issue we had taken a contrary course.

‘‘The inscription referred to was properly resented by a number of Jewish gentlemen because it gave a totally wrong impression of what was in the mind of the writer. The inscription said plainly, ‘New York Jews organized Trotzkyism in Russia. The same Jews would hoist the red flag in Canada.’

‘‘By ‘the same Jews’ we meant Jews who have become apostates and are no longer in a religious sense real Jews.

‘‘If it is proven that non-Canadian apostate Jews had no part in this attempt at anarchy the accusation falls flat. In saying this the editor makes no apology to honorable gentlemen of any calling who are real Jews in this or any country, except to regret that his comment was so carelessly constructed as to be misunderstood.

‘‘If we should attempt to apologize for an intentional affront to the Jewish race we should have to make the apology to ourselves. An insult to the Jewish race in Canada would be an affront to Canadian citizenship in business, professional life, art, education, municipal government, politics and patriotic service.’’

Personal Notes

In the Peace Conference two full blooded Jews, M. Klotz for France, and Mr. Edwin S. Montagu for India, signed the peace treaty, besides two half-Jews, Sonnino for Italy, and Hymans for Belgium. In prominent position were: Mantoux as translater from English into French, and the Zionist Schauer as legal adviser and interpreter for the German delegation. Some of them went to the synagog on Sabbath, and one girl attached to the commission was guest at the rabbi’s table because she insisted on kosher food.

The ministry of Signor Mitti has a Jewish member in Ludovico Mortara, son of the late Marco Mortara for fifty-four years rabbi of Mantua. He was president of the supreme court and member of the senate.

"LIBERTY"

It did not receive a second. When the devil feels at home . . . he is well, and when the devil is well. . . .

The holy Synod of Omsk is said to have sent out circulars charging the Jews with responsibility for Russia's collapse, but Admiral Kolchak telegraphs to Sazonoff, who is representative of his government in Paris, that in Kolchak's Russia the Jews are so happy that they would not even think of spending the winter in California. There are also reports to the contrary.

Who can know the truth from such a distance? The only trouble is that we remember M. Sazonoff's record too well. When he was the Czar's minister of foreign affairs and as such had important business to transact in London, the joint committee sought an interview with him which was denied; and when he, with the minister of finance, M. Bark, was in London, conferring with a group of Anglo-American bankers in September, 1915, the committee "could not see its way clear to inform the public what, if any, promises were made for the improvement of the condition of the Jews."

But on Feb. 9, 1915, M. Sazonoff made a declaration in the duma denying the atrocious expulsion of the Jews from the war zone and the brutalities committed by the Russian troops in Galicia, to which Heinrich Reizes replied in the "Neue Freie Presse" of Feb. 20, quoting the facts and saying that Sazonoff's statement was merely intended "to calm the public opinion of America, the true home of liberty."

The intention at present is still the same. The devil is anxious to get well.

Russia's Wayward Children

The real Russia, judging by Kolchak's [illegible]ilure in spite of the allied [illegible]eems to be satisfied with the [illegible]ernment, while the Ukraini[illegible]racticing League of Nations [illegible]ble-headed fight against the Bolsheviki and the Poles. Not being persona grata, their leader, General Grigorieff, was abandoned to his fate by Mr. Harmsworth, under secretary of foreign affairs, who declared in answer to an interpellation in the House of Commons that, while the British foreign office had no definite information on the alleged atrocities committed against the Jews by Grigorieff's army, the leader was known to be strongly antisemitic.

A terrible pogrom was reported from Odessa, which later reports again denied. Members of the relief commission operating in Warsaw, who visited Southern Russia, report that the country is one half hospital and the other half cemetery. The loss of life is estimated at 100,000 which is a suspiciously round sum, though about suffering in a country hemmed in from all sides, infested by a marauding soldiery, and impoverished by centuries of Russian misrule, there can be no doubt.

The grim humor similar to that of the French Reign of Terror days, if not literally true, undoubtedly pictures the situation correctly. People meet on the streets. "What are you going to do tomorrow?" is the question. "Die," is the answer.

Julian Batchinski, the head of the Ukrainian mission to the United States, claims for Petlura, the head of his government, all the credit which the other rival nations claim for themselves. Like the others he declares that there is no religious prejudice among his people, and he has as witness various Jews holding prominent offices, among them Arnold Margolin, one of Beilis' attorneys.

The Little Brother

They are coming from all sides with Esau's question: "Hast thou not saved me a blessing, father?"

Lithuania was for centuries a vague term. It was for centuries a part of Poland incorporated into Russia upon the partition of Poland with a slice within East Prussia. Now they come before the world with their plea for recognition on the basis of self-determination.

About their position to the Jews absolutely nothing is known. Way back in the fifteenth century Moses, "the exile" (Ha-Goleh) fled from some pogrom in Lithuania to Kiev where he gave us a special ritual, the Minhag Kaffa. This was before the annexation of Lituania to Poland. Since that time it seems the Poles representing the ruling element have reduced the Lituanians to helotry. They are strict Roman Catholics with a few remnants of Protestants from the time antidating the Jesuit counter-Reformation, and so divided from the Russians. Linguistically they are a people quite apart from their Slavic neighbors.

Though their cities had a very dense population with Wilna, the "Lithuanian Jerusalem" as center, they have never played an active role in Jewish history, perhaps because the large landholders were Poles. In a mass meeting held in Kovno they condemned the Polish pogroms and promised to the Jews not only just treatment but autonomy. As evidence of their good will they have created the post of a minister of Jewish affairs, have appointed M. Rosenbaum as minister of foreign affairs and M. Rachmilewitch as minister of commerce.

The Odor of the Cave

When the lion was sick and consequently in bad humor, he asked the donkey how the cave smelled. The donkey in the simplicity of his heart said, it stank. He was sentenced to death for lese majesty. But the wolf thought he would be wiser, and he declared that the cave was filled with a perfume of roses. He was executed as a hypocrite. The fox excused himself. He had a terrible cold and could not smell anything. This seems to be the only policy to be pursued by the Jews in many countries, but it does not always work well.

A most impressive specimen of this experience is furnished by the conditions in Hungary. The monarchy was followed by a republic built upon the usual democratic principles. This was overthrown by a soviet government; the latter by a semi-monarchy on the lines of the one established by Napoleon III in 1848, but disturbed by the Rumanian invasion; and the latest development, just reported at the moment of this writing, is an abdication of Archduke Joseph with no indication what is to follow.

Similarly complicated is the national problem. Since 1867 the Magyars, though barely 50 per cent of the population, were in the possession of the power. Since last November a regular witches' caldron is boiling over.

The Czecho-Slovaks have lately occupied Pressburg. In northern and western Hungary a soviet republic of the same nationality has been proclaimed with the slogan: no nobles and no Jews, a repetition of conditions of 1848 when murderous attacks were made on the Jews. Galician refugees were expelled from Budapest because they are supposed to have plotted with the Polish consul.

So we see in Hungary the Jews hunted as pro-Polish, in Poland as pro-German or as pro-Russian. Besides they are threatened with pogroms because they are supposed to be Bolshevists, because Bela Kun, the fugitive dictator, and Tibor Szamuely, his assistant, were Jews.

A probably exaggerated report says that 60,000 Jews were converted to Christianity to save their lives. Yet with Count Andrassy, the former minister of justice, William Vaszeny, the first Jew to hold a place in the cabinet, returned from Switzerland, a clear evidence that not all Jews can be Bolshevists.

Rising Nationalities.

Professor Masaryk, known as a true champion of Jewish rights when such a course was in no way a political advantage, is the popular president of the republic of Czecho-Slovakia. He attended a Jewish convention and indorsed Jewish autonomy and Zionism. At the same time murderous attacks on the Jews of Carolinenthal, a suburb of Prague, are reported.

The Greeks, not waiting for an award by the Peace Conference entered Smyrna. An official statement in the British Parliament confirmed the rumor that many Turks were massacred on this occasion. Nothing was said about the fate of the numerous, and incredibly miserable, Jewish population of this city, except that in the vicinity of Smyrna in a place occupied by Italian troops two Jews were murdered.

Judging by the general attitude of the Greeks to the Jews their fate is decidedly perilous. We heard of a ritual murder charge from Chorlu, near Adrianople, which fortunately passed over because the boy supposed to have been murdered was found alive. We know from the affair of Corfu in 1891 what such charges may mean even in normal times.

Israel, Trouble Maker.

Winnipeg had a taste of the possibilities of syndicalism. A strike of all workingmen paralyzed the whole life of the city. The strike began with the metal trade and building unions, in which the Jews, who cannot be so very numerous in Winnipeg, are surely, if represented at all, only an insignificant minority. One of the principal strike leaders was the Rev. William Ivens, a Methodist minister of British birth, and yet even there the outcry against the Jewish bolshevists was raised. Robert Minor, an American journalist, was arrested for similar propaganda among the American troops in Coblenz.

With all this the charges are constantly made against the Jews without considering that for the Trotzkys, Kuns, etc., there are ten times the number of representatives of the capitalist, individualist and imperialist classes among the Jews, not a few in leading positions, as Lord Reading, Herbert Samuel—in fact, all Jewish members of the British Parliament—M. Klotz, Reinach, all Jewish members of both houses of the Italian Parliament, probably twenty in number, not to mention the Rathenaus, Balins, Simons, etc.

Yet the British Detective Bureau in Scotland Yard publishes the picture of Angelica Balabanowa, said to be the head of a Jewish conspiracy to swamp England with Bolshevist literature. The influential Northcliffe papers take the hint very eagerly. They make of all Polish pogroms a defense against Bolshevism, and the foreign office, usually represented in the House of Commons by Sir Cecil Harmsworth, Lord Northcliffe's brother, as a rule, has no information on Polish atrocities when an interpellation, which in no single case was introduced by a Jewish member, is presented in the House of Commons.

In the Latin Countries.

Algeria is a hotbed of antisemitism, and its leaders are not the natives, though the Jews are strongly inclined to European culture, but the Frenchmen with their followers composed of all nationalities—and not the highest class of them either—from the Mediterranean countries of Europe.

The new grandrabbin of France, Israel Levi, made the statement upon his inauguration that antisemitism in France is now a thing of the past, as we have heard frequently since 1791, and in an amusing instance by Ernest Renan in 1886, eight years before the Dreyfus affair. Quite lately the mayor of Algiers, speaking at the grave of a Jewish soldier, expressed the same optimism, "La guerre a mis fin a des malentendus qui divisaient less enfants de la France," he said.

The test soon was to come. At the election of freshmen to a students' society of the university of Algiers all non-Jews were elected, while thirty Jewish applicants, most of them war veterans, one the son of a colonel, were blackballed. Protests were met by the "recteur" with the claim that it was a political affair; by the prefet that it was an academic affair, and by the governor general that it was social and entirely out of the range of administrative authority. The matter was finally adjusted.

The Yiddish press of Warsaw reports that the French soldiers aid the Polish allies in the sport of pulling Jewish beards. Russian Jews—the details are not reported—are expelled from France, and thus delivered to Kolchak's hangmen on the ground of Bolshevism. Jean Drault, an antisemitic author, dissatisfied with the award made to France at the Peace Conference, made the typically Drumontesque statement that the Peace Conference was in the hands of the "Youtres".

Politicians, on the other hand, evidently envious of Great Britain's success in the much coveted Syrian question, addressed a letter to M. Pichon, asking why France did not take the lead in securing for the Jews of Poland the rights guaranteed under the treaty, and M. Pichon replied that France is not fond of anything spectacular—a rather comical claim when we remember the popularity of the libertine Boulanger—but worked more effectively in chamber.

Italy, which has kept itself remarkably clear of antisemitism, is not absolutely immune, as shall be stated without overestimating the incident. A contributor to the socialist paper, Popolo d'Italia, calls the deputy, Claudio Treves, "ebreo sudicione" (dirty Jew) because he contributed only 100 lire to the fund of a party organ.

The Divided House.

The first mail after an interruption of more than three years has arrived from Germany and Austria, but so far no Jewish paper has reached us. While that which reaches us comes from a hostile source, it is only too credible that a people, exasperated by years of starvation, by the humiliation of their national pride and by a dire outlook, would turn against the Jews, and that the Junkers would try to utilize these sentiments for their own political ends. It is reported that posters appeared all over Berlin asking for volunteers of "Deutsch-Germanische" birth with the exclusion of Jews, half-Jews and "Judengenossen", and that Jewish stores were looted in Berlin, Hamburg, and Dortmund, but also that the government took strong measures to suppress all disorders. The agitation is said to be very strong in Bavaria, where the leader of the radicals was the Jew, Kurt Eisner.

Morgenthau, the Shtadlan.

In olden times, when, as Zunz brilliantly puts it, the Jews had to fight for rights because they had no right, the most crying cases of injustice were put into the hands of an official called "shtadlau" (endeavorer) because it was his business to endeavor to improve conditions.

Isaiah Horowitz (c.1550-1630), the celebrated author of the popular "Sheloh", who was rabbi of Prague in the critical days when the war of thirty years began, admonishes the shtadlan to follow the examples of Esther, Nehemiah and Eliezer ben Hyrcanus and place his confidence in God (Sheloh, p. 242a). If we modernize this mystic of the seventeenth century, he would say that impressing Israel's enemies with the sense of justice will be more effective than political power.

We have a shtadlan in Mr. Henry Morgenthau, who has a very delicate task to perform. How he succeeded, we will not know until his report of the Polish atrocities will be made public.

The Associated Press on June 1 reported that Paderewski had asked President Wilson to appoint a commission to investigate the Jewish sit-

Grand Lodge No. 6 Holds Conclave

Dr. Harry A. Kraus is Elected President; Per Capita Tax is increased to $2.60; Dr. Davis Tells of Distress in Russia and Poland

THE fifty-first annual meeting of District Grand Lodge No. 6 was held at St. Paul, Minn., on July 5, 6, 7 and 8 with ninety-two delegates and Past Presidents attending.

The convention was called to order by the President, Brother Hiram D. Frankel. Invocation was offered by Dr. Chas. S. Levi, of Milwaukee, Wis. Brother Gustavus Loevinger, on behalf of the local entertainment committee, and Brother Moses W. Skorish, President of Minnesota Lodge, on behalf of the lodge, extended a hearty welcome to the representatives, for whom President H. D. Frankel responded.

Communications were read from the Governor of Minnesota and the Mayor of St. Paul, expressing regrets of their inability to attend and conveying greetings to the visiting delegates.

President Frankel's message was listened to with marked attention and at its conclusion was heartily applauded. He urged the larger cities of the district to organize clubs similar to those established in Chicago, Detroit and Flint. The Chicago Central Council was especially commended for the excellent results achieved at the boys' camp. The convention delegates were urged to render every assistance to those who were raising funds for the relief of the Jewish war sufferers in Europe.

Closer Bonds Urged.

The co-operation of rabbis was asked and the suggestion was made for a closer relationship between District No. 6 and the officers and members of adjoining districts. President Frankel paid tribute to the excellent work of Gustavus Loevinger, chairman of the Propaganda committee, to Secretary Seelenfreund and to Treasurer Ben Braun.

Upon conclusion of the message, Secretary Seelenfreund, on behalf of the delegates, presented to Brother and Mrs. Frankel a chest of silver in appreciation of the services rendered by Brother Frankel to the Grand Lodge.

This was followed by the presentation of a purse of gold by Brother Gustavus Loevinger, on behalf of Minnesota Lodge No. 157, of St. Paul, Minn.

Brother Philip Stein reported on the state of the Order in his usual thorough and detailed manner and announced the institution of many new lodges throughout the country, resulting in an increase of membership despite the great loss caused by enlistment in the United States military and naval forces. He also recalled the celebration of the diamond jubilee of the Order in Chicago last September and reviewed the Order's welfare work for soldiers and sailors in service.

New Lodges Founded.

The Director of Propaganda work announced the institution of new lodges at Rock Island, Ill., and Minot, N. D., reporting a gain of nine hundred and ninety-four members during the year, a remarkable showing in view of the condition of the country.

The Convention approved the Orphan Asylum building program as adopted by the Cleveland Orphan Asylum Board, and appointed a special committee to be known as the Committee on Orphan Asylum Matters, to which all orphan asylum affairs are to be referred.

The recommendation of the budget committee calling for an increase in the per capita tax to $2.60 was adopted.

The Convention was addressed by Brother Adolf Kraus, President of the Order, who reviewed some of its achievements; by Mr. Henry Rathburne, of Chicago, who delivered a short talk on ''Patriotism and Philanthropy'', and by Dr. H. I. Davis, who described in a most interesting manner his observations and experiences while abroad as an officer of the American Red Cross. Dr. Davis depicted the sad condition of Jews in Russia, Poland and Galicia and closed his address with a strong appeal for liberal contributions to the fund being raised in this country for the relief of Jewish war sufferers abroad. L. Edw. Lashman, Secretary of the Anti-Defamation League, spoke on the Boys' Summer camp at Crystal Lake, near Chicago, and Sig. Livingston told of the interesting and effective work of the Anti-Defamation League.

HEADS GRAND LODGE

Dr. Harry A. Kraus elected president of District No. 6 at fifty-first annual meeting

Funds Are Allotted.

The following appropriations were made:

B. B. Free Employment Bureau..	$1,250
B. B. Library, Urbana, Ill......	100
Hot Springs Hospital...........	250
National Jewish Hospital, Denver	100
Educational League, Cleveland..	100
B. B. Summer Camp, Chicago...	2,000
B'nai B'rith Councils...........	1,000
Social Service & Americanization work	1,500
Propaganda and Intellectual Advancement	3,000

A special degree team, composed of Brothers Gus Loevinger, Julian J. Gusfield, Albert F. Mecklenburger, Henry Monsky and Chas. D. Oreckovsky, exemplified for the first time in an impressive and beautiful manner the memorial service ritual adopted at the last convention of the District Grand Lodge. The prayer for the dead was chanted by Brother Rabbi I. Diamond, and Brother Sigmond Livingston delivered an inspiring address. At the conclusion of the services, all rose and recited the ''Kaddish''.

New Executives Chosen.

The following officers were elected: President, Dr. Harry A. Kraus; First Vice-President, Rabbi Eugene Mannheimer; Second Vice-President, Henry Monsky; Secretary, A. B. Seelenfreund; Treasurer, Benjamin Braun; Sergeant at Arms, Solomon Levitan; members of the General Committee, Albert F. Mecklenburger, Julian J. Gusfield, Alex P. Greenthal, Benj. Samuels, Chas. D. Oreckovsky, Simon D. Rosenzweig and Gus Loevinger.

Delegates to the Constitution Grand Lodge:

Chas. L. Aarons, Samuel Alschuler, Benj. J. Braun, Israel Cowen, Dr. Haim I. Davis, Hiram D. Frankel, Adolph Freund, Alex P. Greenthal, Julien J. Gusfield, Sylvan E. Hess, Adolf Kraus, Dr. Harry A. Kraus, Bernhard A. Lange, Sig. Livingston, Maurice Lefkovits, Gustavus Loevenger, Sidney Lyons, Eugene Mannheimer, Albert F. Mecklenburger, Benjamin Samuels, Benjamin J. Samuels, A. B. Seelenfreund, Henry M. Seligman, Edward Sonnenschein, Philip Stein, Jonas Weil, A. D. Weiner, William Wilhartz, Arnold Wolff.

uation in Poland. Shortly afterwards we heard that Mr. Morgenthau was to head this commission.

The antisemites in Poland greeted this news with a howl of fury. Andrew Niemojewski declared this commission an insult to Poland's national honor and Woodrow Wilson a follower of the Shulhan Aruk. Prawda Robotnicza, a reactionary paper, was equally furious. Woodrow Wilson sent one of his Moszkos, to whom the Poles will have to kowtow, Morgenthau was Borech Schaje's (perhaps a proverbial Jewish name in Polish journalism) Marshalek (buffoon), and Polish civilization was doomed, if such an insult was tolerated.

The official circles were more prudent. Among the delegates of the Seym appointed to assist Mr. Morgenthau was Noah Prilucki, a member of the parliament, recently unseated for his advocacy of the Jewish cause. So it was at least announced from one side; while another report stated that only outspoken antisemites were admitted to the advisory committee, and the Copenhagen bureau reproduced an advertisement in a Polish paper inviting applications from persons, familiar with the English languages who are not Jews.

On July 28 the Associated Press published a telegram quoting Mr. Morgenthau as saying that the reports of pogroms were greatly exaggerated, and that Polish Jews will have to follow the example of their American brethren and resign all national aspirations. The Yiddish press of Warsaw attacked the American commissioner as having entered upon his mission with a ready opinion, but another press report stated that Morgenthau had not made the statement ascribed to him.

Uncertainty of Information.

Louis Marshall, returning from his mission to Paris, was exceedingly optimistic in the address which he delivered at the well-earned, enthusiastic reception tendered to him on July 28. He believes that ''civilization has made a tremendous stride forward'' and ''the Jews who have heretofore walked in darkness of oppression are the beneficiaries'' of a true ''Magna Charta''.

He expressed his ''confidence that henceforth the Jews of Poland, of Rumania, of Czecho-Slovakia, of Jugo-Slavia, etc., will vie with their fellow citizens in the effort to establish but one standard of citizenship.'' . . . He appeals to the Jews to ''forget the nightmare of the past''. This optimism does honor to Mr. Marshall's heart. It is not shared by everybody who has a claim on being listened to.

Henry N. Brailsford, a very prominent British publicist, who was a member of the Carnegie commission, sent to the Balkans in 1913, and knows the east of Europe, declares that the Poles laugh in their sleeves. They are confident that the allies need Poland as a buffer state against Germany and against Bolshevist Russia, and will exercise a charity which cloaks a multitude of sins.

The present writer may without boast claim to know something of Czecho-Slovakia, where he spent more than twenty years of his life. He is certain that the ''one standard of citizenship'' is not so easily applicable to a country with nearly one-third of different nationals and with the desire of either of the two nationalities to make gains at the expense of the other.

In Poland we have seen the difficulty in the borderland between the Poles and the Ukrainians, and instead of going into details and making the reader weary with statistical figures, I shall quote one telling fact.

Dr. Nebenzahl, a leading lawyer of Stanislau, reigned as president of the Jewish congregation. In the published statement made on this occasion he says: ''I was for years the advocate of nationalizing the Jews as Poles''. Mr. Marshall's recipe, ''but the brutality of the recent assaults have made me see the error of my ways. The hatred of the Poles for the Jews is ineradicable''.

How right he is, is shown by a Polish paper, which pleads for the relief of the Jews from the public relief funds from which they have been excluded—not out of sympathy with the Jews but because their position is so desperate that the typhus raging among them is becoming a menace to the Poles.

Things look different in Stanislau, u Reichenberg and in Pilsen than at a dinner table in the Waldorf-Astoria or at a mass meeting in Cooper Union.

Whence Shall Come My Help

The relief commission in Poland shares with Mr. Morgenthau the fate of being unappreciated. The Yiddish press of Warsaw is unmerciful in its attacks on Dr. Bogen, the American agent for the distribution of relief. One can easily understand the insufficiency of all these actions, and the temper of a desperately suffering population.

Jacob Billikopf, who recently returned, admitted the futility of all operations and reported the clamor of the population, whom a free meal today or a suit of clothes does not protect from starvation tomorrow and from freezing in two months. The often alluded to uncertainty of all reports makes it a duty of justice to avoid taking sides until authenticated reports are before us.

In order to close with some achievements whch, if not true, are at least exhilarating, the latest pseudo-Jews shall be mentioned: they are Eamon de Valera, the president of the Irish republic, and King Nikita of Montenegro. Unfortunately neither has a very safe job.

Minneapolis, Minn.

Minneapolis Lodge No. 271 gave a banquet in honor of 300 returned Jewish soldiers on the evening of June 26, in which about 100 members and all the officers participated.

The affair was well arranged and included a program of entertainment. The addresses were of a patriotic nature, except that of Mr. Hiram D. Frankel, of St. Paul, President of the District Grand Lodge, who confined his remarks to the work of the Order.

Back to Nature at Camp Covenant

275 Boys Enjoy Two Weeks' Outing on Lake at Expense of Central Chicago Council; 100 More to be Invited in 1920

AT CRYSTAL LAKE CAMP
A few of the 260 boys who enjoyed the outing provided by the Central Council of Chicago

FROM the opening, on July 1 to the taking of the "movie" on the last day, the 1919 season of Camp Covenant, at Crystal Lake, Ill., was a pronounced success.

Two hundred and seventy-five boys, some of whom had attended the camp last season but the majority of whom had never enjoyed an outing in the country, were given an opportunity to participate in the camp activities, which included swimming, military drills, boating, fishing, hikes, nature study and physical exercises of every sort.

At 6:15 a. m. daily first reveille was sounded. Boys who wished to take a morning dip got out of bed, put on bathing suits and took to the lake for a refreshing bath. At 6:30 second reveille sounded, which called everybody into line in front of the tents. Setting up exercises continued thereafter for about ten minutes, following which the boys helped roll up the sides of tents, hung their bedding out on the line, dressed, washed and got ready for breakfast call.

At 7 o'clock the bugle called assembly; each boy took his place in line and the whole camp participated in flag raising, followed at once by breakfast. After breakfast a few minutes were given for freedom. At 7:40 each boy took part in some definite form of camp community service lasting thirty minutes.

Strict Cleanliness Observed.

During this time the camp grounds were put into shape, floors scrubbed and appearances generally improved.

At 8:10 the camp prepared for inspection. The camp director inspected each boy's bed, clothing, personal cleanliness and orderly arrangement of tents. At 8:50 the whole camp met for morning consultation and announcements. At that time the day's plans were announced; the director or some visitor addressed the boys on an especially interesting topic.

Each tent elected one of its members to meet with the director in planning games, hikes, and other features of the two weeks' activities that filled the hours with enjoyment.

After the council meeting at 9:30 one-half hour military drill was conducted by the athletic instructor. This was followed by an hour of play, boating, fishing, hikes or other planned amusements.

Everyone Takes a Dip.

Eleven fifteen marked the swimming hour, which lasted until noon. All boys were expected to be in the water, playing, swimming or diving. Those who had not passed the swimming test were not permitted to use the boats. Rowing was under control of the patrol boat that continually guarded against any possible accidents.

At 12:30 dinner was served, followed by an hour of quiet, when the boys spent their time on the grass, reading in tents, or under the trees, writing letters or sleeping.

At 2 o'clock scheduled games and other planned activities were enjoyed. The afternoon swim lasted from 4:30 to 5:30. Supper was at 6 o'clock.

Evening play extended from 7 until 8:15, which was followed by camp fire songs, stories, marshmallow roasts and numerous other amusements until 9 o'clock, when all went to bed. At 9:15 taps sounded, lights were put out and the camp became quiet in sleep.

Unfortunately the camp could not accommodate all who applied, so more than 300 boys had to be denied the facilities. It is hoped that in 1920 accommodations will be provided for at least 100 boys more by the Central B'nai B'rith Council of Chicago, under whose auspices the camp was conducted.

Tribute is Paid to Mr. Feuchtwanger

More than three hundred members of the I. O. B. B. assembled in the Lincoln Club, Pittsburgh, at a dinner in honor of the President of the District, Marcus Feuchtwanger. The occasion was made notable by the initiation into the Abraham Lippman Lodge of 100 members. Messages of an unusually high order were delivered by Judge Cohen, Rabbi Goldenson and others. The principle that the Jew must remain true to his mission as a religionist if he would hope to establish his proper position in the world was reaffirmed.

Every mention of Judge Cohen's name evoked an ovation and when he rose to speak he was cheered.

Simon Davis, president of Abraham Lippman Lodge, who has done yeoman service in the interest of the Order, was introduced as toastmaster by Mr. Mark Alexander. Mr. Davis made an ideal toastmaster and his first duty was to direct the initiation of the new members which was conducted in an impressive manner by Past President of the District A. L. Solomon.. At the conclusion of the ceremonies Past Grand President O. H. Rosenbaum eloquently described to the members the great underlying principles for which the Order was established. President Feuchtwanger then delivered brief remarks in which he thanked the members of Lippman Lodge for their kindness in tendering him the splendid testimonial dinner. He stated that while he was not interested in forming new lodges but in developing the old ones that when his term of office expired in six months he would have the honor of retiring with the largest membership the district had ever had.

Second Vice-President Morris Schaffner discussed the splendid work of the B'nai B'rith Orphanage at Erie, which is one of the finest monuments the district has ever erected.

Charles H. Joseph spoke briefly of the problems with which Jewry is confronted and the possibilities open to the B'nai B'rith for becoming an important factor in solving many of them. Judge Cohen followed with an address which was received with the wildest demonstration. Rabbi Goldenson held the audience to closest attention as he made a plea for the necessity of Jewish solidarity.

At the conclusion of the speaking Mr. Davis presented to the first twenty-five men who had signed to become members a neat gold pin fashioned in form of the Menorah. A pin was also given to the members of Abraham Lippman Lodge who brought in ten names of new members.

East Liverpool, O.

B'nai B'rith Day was celebrated in East Liverpool on April 18. Services were conducted by Rabbi Alexander, of Toledo, and a very interesting address was delivered by Brother Sidney G. Kusworm, of Dayton, Ohio, President of District No. 2. In the evening a dinner was served at the Elks' Club, Mr. Leon Rubin acting as toastmaster. Following an appeal by Rabbi Alexander, Mr. Kusworm and Mr. Edward Hemple, over $12,000 was raised for a Reformed Temple.

Washington, D. C.

As a memorial of his election as President of District No. 5, Argo Lodge presented Sol Herzberg with a silver service. Brother Herzberg has been a member for more than twenty-five years and has been active in editing the lodge's paper.

Racine, Wis.

At an enthusiastic meeting of Racine Lodge, No. 697, Monday evening, June 31, a class of fifteen candidates was initiated by Brother J. J. Gusfield, member of the General Committee of the District, and Brother Samuel Zucker of Chicago. After adjournment the members went to the Commercial Club, where an enjoyable lunch was served. Brother Gusfield spoke on "The Work of the B'nai B'rith." Later at Winters Hall Brother Zucker conducted an auction for the benefit of the Jewish War Sufferers. Dancing followed.

Stevens Point, Wis.

On June 29, 1919, Menorah Lodge, No. 769 of Stevens Point, Wis., celebrated its annual B'nai B'rith Day, which proved one of the most successful affairs in the lodge's history.

Preceding the celebration a meeting was held at which four candidates were initiated. In the evening addresses were delivered on the work of the Order. The affair was brought to a close with a dance at Armory Hall, attended by 200 persons.

The proceeds will be devoted to the relief of Jewish war sufferers.

Holy Days

All were well patronized, for the soldier has a cultivated taste in diversion, especially since the armistice. But certainly the most popular of all was the Seder. The soup with Matzah balls, the fish; in fact, the entire menu, made them think of home.

We held the dinner in an army mess hall, standing up at the breast-high tables. The altar with two candles and the various symbols of the feast was at the center of the low-roofed walless structure.

Toward evening the rain, so typical of winter in western France, ceased; the sun came out, and its last level rays shown directly upon the altar and the officiating rabbi. It was a scene never to be forgotten, a feast of deepest joy mingled with solemnity.

Back to God's Country.

We had come to war and held our solemn service of the fall in the midst of doubt and danger. Now we were going home, the danger over—back to dear ones, to the country for which we had fought. As we had prayed before in hope and yearning, so we prayed now in utter thankfulness. The two occasions were complimentary. They were our prayers during action and afterward. They expressed our desire and our gratitude.

Now we are home again. Jewish soldiers are now Jewish citizens worshipping not in the Y. M. C. A. or the army mess hall but in the synagogue or the temple, as before the war shook them from their moorings and brought them nearer to the dread realities of life and death.

And they will think of last year in France. The holy days now will mean more to them because of the very different worship they rendered a year ago. They have missed their Judaism and wanted it; now they return with their hearts ready for it as they never were in the past.

The only danger is that we may forget these lessons which have been so bitterly impressed upon us in the stress of war. Rosh ha Shana has not changed; it is the same as ever. But we have changed; we are able to see more in the festival, to get more out of it.

A Lesson in Deeds.

No sermonic appeal is necessary to a topic such as this. The bare narrative of those very different services in France last fall and spring gives us enough to think about. It needs a great, soul-stirring experience to give us the insight that the prophets and sages had, through whose visions our holy days have come to be.

That experience has now been granted us, most of all to us who have faced the guns of the enemy, but in some measure to all who have had sons, or brothers, or any loved ones in the war.

By a rough estimate it is probable that fully 3,000 Jewish soldiers died in the American army in France. Certainly over 75,000 others served there and have now returned to their own homes and country. Every home is touched in one way or another; every synagogue has its brave boys home again, enriched by their travel, their new view of life, their encounter with death.

Worcester, Mass.

A large class of officers stationed at Camp Devens, Mass., was initiated into the Order at an enthusiastic meeting of Worcester Lodge. Among the candidates was Lieutenant Colonel Lewis Landes, who has the distinction of being the youngest lieutenant colonel in the American army.

MR. TAFT'S ARTICLE

countries. Since then they have heckled and harried the Jews by restrictions upon their livelihoods, by refusing admission to the elementary public schools of more than 5½ per cent of their number, and in secondary schools of more than 7½ per cent, and in many other ways.

Although this is in direct violation of the Treaty of Berlin, the signatories to the treaty have not thought it best to intervene.

Bulgaria and Serbia complied with their obligations.

The Pale of the Settlement.

The law which required the Jews in Russia to live in the cities of the Pale of Settlement produced a great congestion. They were forbidden to engage in so many trades and callings that their means of livelihood was most limited. They had no political rights and were thus kept excluded from government employ.

They were denied secondary and university education except to the extent of a very small per cent of their number, and they were so hemmed about with police restrictions as to subject them to oppressive blackmail. The result has been that the great majority of them are ignorant, and even before the war at least a third of them were in direst misery and destitution.

There are in the world over fifteen million Jews. Of these, six millions are to be found in the ten provinces of Russian Poland and the fifteen provinces called "the Pale of Settlement." There are upward of 2,250,000 Jews in Austria and Hungary. There are 615,000 in Germany. There are 270,000 Jews in Great Britain, 100,000 in France, 45,000 in Italy, half a million in Asia, 250,000 in Rumania, and there are 3,300,000 in the United States, of whom a million or more live in the city of New York.

The Jews in the United States, down to 1880, did not exceed a quarter of a million, but since the oppression, pogroms, and massacres in Rumania and in Russia immigration has increased to the figures given.

The Great Problem of Today.

As I have said, in all parts of Europe and America, except Russia and Rumania, legal discrimination against the Jews has largely ceased and civil equality is accorded them. The present great problem, therefore, is to secure civil equality for them in Russia and Rumania. How is the present condition in those countries explained?

Prince Gortchakoff in the Berlin Congress described the Russian and Rumanian Jews as a great scourge upon any people. Bismarck's answer was that the policy of restriction had given them the character which is now made the basis for complaints against them.

Mirabeau in the French Assembly said, in answer to a similar charge: "If you wish the Jews to become better men and useful citizens, then banish every humaliating restriction, open to them every avenue of gaining a livelihood. Instead of forbidding them agriculture, handicrafts, and the mechanical arts, encourage them to devote themselves to these occupations."

Russia's Plaint Against the Jews.

It is probably true that the Russian Jews do devote themselves to trading in money, and that the Russian moujik is subject to abuse in this respect of which the Jews take advantage, but it must be borne in mind that the restrictions upon the Jews as to livelihood have been and are such as to drive them into money-lending. Indeed, this cause dates from the middle ages, when, as already said, canon law forbade among Christians the lending of money on interest and left that business open for the Jews, who perforce became the money-lenders of Europe.

The few avenues of employment for Jews forced them into the conduct of inns and the selling of liquor. This, as I have pointed out, was a heritage from the Polish nobility.

Even if the charge made against the Russian Jews of fraud and trickery has foundation, it is not to be wondered at, when man's hand is against them, when they are desperate in their efforts to live, when they have a faculty in trade born of the severest necessity. The objection to them that they work together in the interest of each other may well be true. When general society is against them all, they naturally stand together for self-protection and for self-support.

They Make Good Soldiers.

One can hardly expect that they should feel entirely grateful to a government which makes life so hard for them, or that the desire to serve in the army should be strong in them. And yet the reports from the World War indicate that they have made good soldiers, and the history of the Jews in all countries in which they have settled has been that they have rallied to the support of the government under which they lived.

Their patriarch, Samuel of Nehardea, sixteen centuries ago laid down the rule: "The law of the government is the law"; and in the eighteen or nineteen centuries in which the Jews have been wandering over the face of the earth, rebellion and treachery to the government under which they lived have not been frequent among them.

A number of them in Russia under the old regime doubtless had revolutionary and subversive tendencies, apparently confined to Jews of university education, who found difficulty in earning a livelihood under the restrictions and who naturally cherished resentment.

With their active minds, with their genius for trade, cultivated by centuries of necessity, they prefer trade to manual pursuits, but many of them are skilled artisans in many countries.

Denied Educational Privileges.

They do not follow agricultural pursuits because they have long been forbidden to own land, and by this long deprivation their tastes have been formed for city life. They have been cooped up in ghettos of the city and, perforce, have formed the habits of an urban population.

Denied the opportunity for education, they are ignorant; but no people in the world manifest so much anxiety to secure education and improve the opportunities when offered with such earnestness and success.

It cannot be good for a country like Russian Poland and the Pale to continue 6,000,000 of its inhabitants in such a persistent condition of poverty and demoralization. It must interfere with the proper development, prosperity, and health of the rest of the population. So large a congestion of this kind must make a sore spot in the economic, political, and social life of this part of Russia.

In spite of their deplorable condition and the immigration it stimulates, the Russian Jews are very prolific and their number is not diminishing. Their presence in Russia has been a continuing fact and the policy pursued in respect to them up to the Revolution did not remove it or alter it and it was not a success.

In aid of the Christian peoples of the Balkans and Armenia, the Russian Government did a great work, for which those peoples should be very grateful. The conduct of Russia toward them was in marked contrast to its attitude toward the Jews within its own jurisdiction. Is it too much to hope that the drastic experience of this war may lead Russia to a different view?

A Blessing in Dreadful Disguise.

If the war does help the Jew, it will indeed be a blessing in dreadful disguise. One-half the Jews of the world have had to bear its miseries, its cruelties, its sufferings. They lived in the theater of war between Russia and Germany and Austria. In this region, almost without ceasing, the campaign continued. The Russians laid waste the country in order to embarrass their pursuing enemies, and between the two armies the population, of which the Jews were a large part, suffered untold horrors.

As soon as the war came on, as soon as mobilizations were initiated, Germany and Austria, on the one hand, and Russia, on the other, vied with each other in a cultivation of the good-will of the Poles and the Jews.

Russia promised that an autonomous Poland would be created from all three of the incomplete tribal districts of the partitioned kingdom. Some of the leaders of the Austrian Government announced an intention of giving autonomy to Galicia.

When the war came to an end, tremendous governmental changes occurred in the countries where the Jews are so greatly congested (see also page 23).

The dreadful destruction of life, the necessity for rehabilitation of these countries where the war raged with such violence and destruction, must necessarily give greater economic value to every man who survives. The loyalty which the Jews have shown to their respective governments in these countries under a most trying ordeal ought to impress their governments with the claim that they make to equal treatment.

While it is true that in the past much of the cruelty to the Jews has been immediately prompted by popular prejudice, nevertheless it is also true that, with the increase of popular control in all countries, their condition has ultimately been much improved. A war like this, which must be carried on by the people, increases their ultimate power.

Repressive Measures Harmful.

Harsh and repressive measures have not helped the solution of the Jewish question. The result reminds one constantly of Æsop's fable of the contest between the wind and the sun in removing a man's coat from his back. The harder the wind blew, the closer the man held the coat to his body. It was only when the sun with its warm rays increased the temperature and created discomfort that the man removed his coat.

The hardest persecution and injustice merely strengthen the peculiarity of the Jew in his adherence to his ancient customs, in his exclusiveness, in his use of cunning to avoid outrage, and in his adherence to his religion and its ceremonials. Give him the sunlight of freedom and the balmy encouragement of equality of opportunity and he assimilates himself to his environment with all the quickness of perception, all the energy, all the enterprise, all the persistence with which he is so remarkably endowed.

If education and opportunity and freedom and equality are extended to them in the next generation, the traits to which objection is made will become less and less conspicuous, and Russia's great domain, which needs people of energy, people of keenness, people of enterprise, people experienced in trade, people of financial genius, will find a benefit in the presence of the Jews.

Jews in United States.

From the East End of New York and through centers of population in this country where Jews are gathered, by the million and hundreds of thousand, come the youth of the race who soon manifest a spirit of Americanism and get on.

They succeed in trade, they succeed in the professions, they succeed in business, and they move their homes to less crowded districts and acquire all the taste and views and fashions of their fellow countrymen.

They cultivate little or no solidarity in politics, and they manifest a disposition to disintegrate as a community. They retain a loyalty to the race, but not a strict adherence to the ceremonial, and they intermarry with Gentiles.

A number of modern books written by Jews deplore this fact. They fear that Israel will be swallowed up in the nations. They are an excellent law-abiding part of our population. Of course, criminals come from among them, poor and miserable as some of them are, but the criminal statistics do not show their percentage of criminals to be as great as that of the entire population.

When we consider the congestion in New York in the East End of one million Jews, and that this has come within the last thirty years, it seems remarkable that it has not given more trouble to our civilization and our government than it has. These are the lessons which an investigation by Russian statesmen into our experience would furnish.

Strength of the Jewish Character.

The Jews of the world, in countries where they have had equal opportunities, have won their way not only to great financial power, but to places of commanding influence in journalism, in the professions, and in business. They have retained always an acute interest in the welfare of their coreligionists throughout the world. Their religious training has inculcated in them the duty of charity to all—Jew and Gentile—and they have given unsparingly to aid their brethren in distress.

Individuals like Sir Moses Montefiore have given much time, money, and effort all over the world to the cause of their race. Baron Hirsch and Baron Rothschild have planned and carried through rural colonies of the Jews in Palestine, in Argentina, and in Texas.

The Zionist movement to secure a migration of Jews back to Jerusalem does not meet with the undivided support of the Jewish people, but it certainly has substantial strength as one project for relief of the congestion in east Europe.

During the World War the Jews of this country and elsewhere raised a fund of nearly $25,000,000 with which to aid their poor peoples suffering in the train of the war.

In the countries where they have money, power, and influence, great Jewish committees have long been organized to help in securing civil rights, religious freedom, and equal opportunity for the oppressed of their race.

The influence of the leaders of the Jews in Europe and America upon the Congress of Nations at Paris in behalf of the better treatment of the Jews has been weighty and we can be sure that it was courageously and wisely exercised.

The direct interest we have in the Jewish question in these Eastern countries was stated by Secretary Hay to the signatories of the Berlin Treaty in protest against Rumania's persecutions and breach of her treaty obligation, to-wit, that we are the world's refuge for such people, driven out by measures of oppression and restriction, and their coming in great numbers in their present condition imposes an unfair burden upon us.

We may rejoice that more than half the members of this great race have won their long progressive struggle for merely an equal chance with other men.

Jews in the New States.

The result of the war and the breaking up of Russia and the giving reign to the principle of self-determination of racial units have created seven independent European States in central and eastern Europe.

It is to be hoped that the securities exacted in these treaties will be of a character more effective than were the requirements of the Congress of Berlin in respect to Rumania. Indeed, we can be sure that they will.

The League of Nations is to be a continuous body and will have power enough to see to it that treaties of this character are performed.

The Democratic Mr. Anthony

Son of the Late Leopold de Rothschild Creates Favorable Impression in London; the First Peace Passover; Escape of the Russian Zionists; Other News and Gossip of Anglo-Jewry

By DR. M. EPSTEIN

London Correspondent of the B'nai B'rith News.

THE first peace Passover has just ended. London synagogues were crowded with worshippers, and with a sigh of relief one involuntarily recalled the Passover of a year ago.

"War conditions still prevailed in so far as the general food situation is not yet completely eased, and Matzos this year were rather expensive. Londoners paid nearly a shilling a pound (say roughly 25 cents), and even so there was a scramble for them. But the week is over, and no doubt everybody fared well.

"In the London synagogues the great sensation of the festival was the sermon in an Ashkenazi congregation of an ex-Sephardi chief rabbi. We have already related in this column that Dr. Gaster, the learned Haham of the Spanish and Portuguese Jewish community, has been put on the retired list with a pension. Instead of attending the Sephardi Synagogue in Lauderdale road Dr. Gaster goes to the St. John's Wood Temple, and there he preached a sermon on the Seventh Day of the Festival.

"A crowded congregation flocked to hear him, and his reception only showed how great is the esteem in which he is held.

Russian Zionists in London.

Another event that requires to be chronicled is the arrival in London last week of prominent Russian Zionists, after many vicissitudes of travel and wonderful adventures of escape from the watchfulness of the Bolsheviks.

The present rulers of Petrograd and Moscow would not have these men leave Russia; perhaps they are afraid of the truth which the travelers might tell. But they are in London at last, and for the first time for many long months the Zionist Central Bureau was able to obtain direct news of Russian Jewry.

To the community at large this may be of little consequence. To the Zionist organization it is a matter of some moment. It is also of moment to another class in the community. During the last twelve months quite a number of well-to-do Jews have been able to escape from Bolshevik Russia, and have settled in London. They are anxious about their relatives and friends, and the Zionist visitors from Russia will be heartily welcomed by these people.

Not merely Paris can boast at present of its concourse of peoples from many lands. London is only second to Paris in this respect, and so far as the Zionist movement is concerned the English capital will in all probability became its general headquarters.

This is only to be expected, seeing that whatever the details of the settlement in Palestine may be, the general result will be to put the country under British protection. The future settlers are anxious to be under British suzerainty; and it is reported from the Peace Conference that the Powers favor this proposal.

London is therefore peculiarly fitted to become the center of the movement, and already preparations are being made to meet the new problems. Larger offices have been taken to afford accommodation for the increased staff, and a special Palestine Bureau for dealing in particular with Palestine problems, is also about to be set up.

Jews at Peace Parley.

Meanwhile the process of peace making in Paris proceeds slowly, as is but natural, and Jews, more even than other people, are longing for the peace that is to envelop the earth. So far as the Jewish question is concerned, there are any number of Jewish representatives in Paris to press their views.

There are the Zionists. There is Mr. Lucien Wolf representing the Conjoint Committee of the Board of Deputies and the Anglo-Jewish Association. Others there are with claims for Jews. There are even some whose object it is to defeat the claims of those who would obtain mere justice for Jews who are oppressed.

Why cannot a united front be formed? In the atmosphere of peace and goodwill which postulates the League of Nations, why cannot Jews join their forces? It is to be hoped that the presence in Paris of American Jews, who are greatly respected by their brethren in Europe, may tend to unity.

Two questions are involved. Palestine is one, the other is Jewish rights elsewhere. The Zionists will see to Palestine. For the other question, a general Jewish organization is essential.

Jews, it is said, are clever politicians. Yet in so obvious a matter as their own unity they seem to be blind. But it would appear that the need of combined action at Paris, and afterwards, is being brought home to all concerned.

Charity Balls Numerous.

Of happenings in Anglo-Jewry there is not much to tell. The removal of war restrictions in the general community has led to an outburst of jollification, especially of balls, which is perhaps intelligible.

This tendency has been utilized by many Jewish charity societies to arrange for balls which have been well patronized and brought surpluses to the funds of many a deserving institution.

The most popular of these was the ball in aid of the Jewish Home for the Aged and Needy, the society over which Sir Stuart Samuel presides. The function was held at the Queen's Hall and was graced by what is usually termed "the best people." A representative of the Rothschilds was present in the person of Mr. Anthony de Rothschild, a son of the late Mr. Leopold de Rothschild.

It was remarked and commented upon with satisfaction, that the young gentleman was very democratic in his conduct. Unlike some other people of quality who remained in their boxes, he mingled with the crowd, and even walked home on foot.

We mention this trifling piece of news because "Mr. Anthony" promises to become a leader in Anglo-Jewry. A young man still, he has given promise of great things. Both at Cambridge and in the city he won golden opinions.

With a "democratic" Rothschild at the head of societies and institutions it ought to be possible to obtain a following of the right kind of young men.

Young Men of Promise.

The community is fortunate in being able to look to quite a number of young fellows who are at present at the universies. Both at Oxford and Cambridge there are a great number, and it is pleasing to record that brilliant men are among them.

Last term at Oxford, for instance, two Jewish students were elected as officers of the Oxford Union Society—Mr. Hore Belisha as president and Mr. Gallop as treasurer. To be president of the Union is commonly regarded as the first step in a political career. All our great statesmen were presidents of the Union in their day, and Mr. Hore Belisha's capabilities mark him out as destined to be both a foremost citizen and a communal leader.

It is to be hoped that some of these university men may be attracted to the service of the Zionist Central office, where there is a lack of such workers.

Sir John Monash Feted.

Among the visitors in our midst at present is General Sir John Monash, who commanded the Australian Contingent in France, and won universal recognition for his energy, ability and unique organizing capacity. Sir John is a Jew from Australia who has had a wonderful career, and whose abilities have been of great service to the Allied cause and to the British Empire.

Having so distinguished a Jew in London the Jewish community desired to do him honor, and the Macabbaeans, reviving from a long and protracted sleep, arranged a complimentary dinner for the General. It was a thoroughly representative gathering, and Gentiles and Jews alike testified to the gifts of the guest of the evening.

The Jewish Historical Society also invited Sir John Monash to preside at the second Israel Davis Memorial Lecture, which was this year delivered by Mr. R. Travers Herford. "What the World Owes to the Pharisees" was his subject; a good topic and one deservedly interesting just now.

A large gathering assembled to hear Mr. Herford, whose studies on the Pharisees are well known; and General Monash made an excellent chairman.

B'nai B'rith Is Active.

The London Lodge is getting busy. Before long, when demobilization is complete it will have all its members back again, and Brother Goodman—this year's president—should have ample scope for his ability during 1919. We arranged a conversazione for Purim, which was voted a success.

Social intercourse between members is cultivated by functions of this character, which form a pleasing addition to the work of the lodge.

At the last meeting there was an animated debate on the effect of the war on the religion of the soldier. Many Jewish army chaplains exchanged their views and experiences, and Dr. Gaster graced the discussion by wise words.

At the next meeting Mr. Bentwich will report on his visit to Paris, whither he was despatched as envoy of the Order.

The Hospital Project.

Those interested in the London Jewish Hospital are about to proceed with its erection. The ground was secured before the war, and now a leader is required to give the movement the necessary impetus.

That there will be room for the institution goes without saying. London cannot have too many hospitals, and once it is established the promoters are confident that the Jewish community, one of the most charitable in the country, will enable the hospital to carry on its work. It is certain that in the reconstruction of the community the Jewish hospital will be included.

In many ways it is really remarkable how much voluntary effort for good is expended in Anglo-Jewry. The Jewish Board of Guardians commands quite a little army of workers, men and women who spend no small part of the week in helping their poorer brethren in the East End. Then there are the boys' and girls' clubs, with their devoted leaders.

Next may be mentioned the special war problems. The war brought a large number of Belgian refugees to these shores, including very many Jewish families. They were taken care of by Jewish workers whose devotion was splendid.

Perhaps the name of Mr. Otto Schiff deserves special mention in this connection. The London Lodge also had some hand in this movement when the call was urgent, and now that the refugees are returning to Belgium it is a source of pleasure to be able to report that not a few of them became economically independent during the latter part of their stay in this country.

Passover Needs Supplied.

These Belgian visitors are not the only ones we have in England just now. People sometimes forget that the German prisoners of war are still here. Jews are of the number, and these, together with interned enemy alien civilians presented a Passover problem.

The men required Matzos; the want was supplied. Good souls were found who put in much work, and put up with no little worry, in order to furnish these unfortunate people with Passover requirements. The lodge is glad and proud to number some of its brethren among the foremost workers in this cause of kindness and charity.

Nor should we omit to mention the assistance and co-operation received from the officials concerned. Mr. Gruenbaum, who has been most energetic in this business has been aided by both the home office and the war office.

Finally there are the soldiers on leave. Many of them are oversea troops whose homes are far away. The traditional Passover hospitality was accorded to such men, who found a welcome with many a Jewish family.

In this work the Jewish Hospitality Committee was most active, and here again a brother of the lodge (and his wife) spared neither time nor trouble to get the visitors comfortably settled. Really, Jewish soldiers from over the seas owe very much to Mr. and Mrs. Henry Wolff. It should be added that the gratitude of the men is not wanting.

Peace Problems Next.

The war problems will give place to peace problems. The latter will probably be infinitely more difficult than the former, and the best brains and hearts will be required as for the work of the larger general community so in the Anglo-Jewish community.

The workers are all there, but they must be organized, gathered, led. Who will be the leader? What a chance for a single individual! We have many capable men and women in our midst. But there is no outstanding personality! Is there not here an opportunity for the London Lodge? It can do two things. It can direct public opinion and it can furnish workers.

An Appeal

The seventieth anniversary of the birth of Max Nordau was made the occasion of an appeal by the Actions Committee of the Zionist organization for money with which to erect in his honor a monument on the soil of Erez Israel. The appeal concludes:

"The Actions Committee has decided to entrust to the Jewish National Fund the duty of carrying out this plan, and the Jewish National Fund has undertaken the obligation. We appeal to the whole Zionist organization, to the whole Jewish people, to provide the necessar means."

For the Relief of Our Own

NOTHING approaching a complete story of the Order's efforts to raise the B'nai B'rith Loan Fund for the Relief of War-Stricken Members is possible as this edition of The News goes to press.

The project, notwithstanding considerably more than one hundred subscriptions have been received, was presented to the membership barely forty-eight hours ago. An outline of its inception, however, may be given.

Following the receipt of a report by Brother A. B. Seelenfreund, detailing the urgent needs of European Jewry as a result of the war, the President of the Order communicated immediately with the President of every District in the United States. The latter were asked at once to enlist the aid of all the Order's American members in raising a fund for an non-interest bearing loan, wherewith to rehabilitate each of our European members who needs assistance.

Simultaneously, the President sent a similar appeal by letter to every member of the Order in Chicago. Replies to these communications are being received, and a partial acknowledgment is made below.

Time is pressing, however, the necessities of many of our European brethren unfortunately is acute. Accordingly, in order that relief might go forward as quickly as possible, the Executive Committee made a contribution of $30,000, of which $20,000 was cabled to our special representative.

Prompt co-operation by the members of American Lodges now is necessary. For the more time is lost in sending assistance, the more money will be required to alleviate the distress.

Committees to make collections have been, or will be, appointed in all cities, in which the Order has lodges. If in any such city, at the time this paper is delivered to its readers, a committee is not at work, then the President of the lodge is hereby requested forthwith to name it, so it may call without delay on our members and remit the funds they contribute to the Executive Committee, 1228 Tribune Building, Chicago.

When reimbursed by the members abroad, the committee will distribute the money thus received pro rata among the loan's subscribers. Pertaining to repayment, President Kraus, in his original letters of appeal, said: "I know our foreign members; I know virtually all who receive aid will return the money to us in full."

All subscriptions to the loan will be published in the News. It was not possible to hold the form for this issue more than forty-eight hours after the first letters were sent out in Chicago. At press time, subscriptions were reaching the office of the Executive Committee by every mail. The first one hundred were:

PRODUCTS OF THE MILLS OF SLANDER

Reproductions of typical attacks upon the character of Jews, circulated by hundreds of summer resort hotels; included is an objectionable excerpt from the advertising of a school for girls

IT is within the ethics of war to convert the goods of the enemy; and so, although the Anti-Defamation League has waged a relentless campaign against the use of the Merchant of Venice in the schools, one may be pardoned, perhaps, for purloining Iago's observation to Othello:

> ''Who steals my purse steals trash;
> 'tis something, nothing.
> '' 'Twas mine, 'tis his, and has been slave to thousands;
> ''But he that filches from me my good name,
> ''Robs me of that which not enriches him,
> ''And makes me poor indeed.''

In the light of the prevaling cost of the necessities of life, ''trash'' may seem to those of literal mind an immoderate characterization. But none will differ markedly with the rest of Shakespeare's lines—especially Jews. For of all existing races, they have reason to rue the combination of ill-fated circumstances, which once made their name a term of reproach: a misfortune, the effect of which persists, notwithstanding the cause long since has been refuted. And that is so even here in the United States, where political and religious liberty so freely is accorded.

Back to Nature, But—

The season of recreation is ended; against another crowded winter the dwellers in cities have fortified themselves with fresh strength in nature's laboratory—the mountains, seashore, lakes, woods and streams, amid which God still is let do his handiwork; and, in sequel, His product is divided by a tape line of racial discrimination stretched taut as a bow! Curious, indeed, the situation.

No intelligent American Gentile, it is safe to assume, now entertains a project to revenge the crucifixion. Nor can jealousy of some Jew's material success account fully for the slanders which so generally are uttered at their expense; nor a lust by non-Jews to bully them explain the calumnies, because in fairness it must be said that our average Gentile fellow-citizen is neither flagrantly selfish nor wantonly cruel.

It remains, however, that slurs and aspersions are cast, for which need and excuse both are lacking—cast thoughtlessly, largely as a matter of habit, out of prejudices heriditary in their origin, kept alive by that frailty of the human mind which countenances its thoughts to travel by cow-path.

Where Courtesy Is Greek

In consequence you may have received, when you requested hotel rates or reservations of a summer resort not long ago, a pamphlet wherein was contained the following prohibition:

> ''Hebrews, Consumptives and Dogs Not Admitted.''

Or, perchance:

> ''We have a high class of patrons, which will not permit us to cater to Hebrew trade.''

No doubt it is true, with reference to a few Jews, that such an attitude is well taken. It would be easy, in all likelihood, to point to Gentiles, who can exhibit no particular sang-froid in the presence of an oyster fork; and Gentiles, too, are clannish—the Jew claims to be no more perfect than his neighbor. Yet the social ostracism, so exemplified, is directed not against individuals who may chance to offend: a Jew is persona non grata because he is a Jew, his intellectual or cultural attainment has nothing to do with it.

The Evil Is Widespread

The same is true in other aspects of social life—clubs, fraternities and sororities of Gentile composition usually will not admit Jews to membership. To reveal the urgency of combative steps, it is sufficient, nevertheless, to direct attention to the hundreds of complaints, arising out of insulting statements in hotel and resort folders, received by the Anti-Defamation league during the summer past.

Let it be said in preamble, however, that not in all cases was action taken. Undeniably, every man has the right to select his companions, and no Jew of self-respect desires to intrude where his company is not welcome. The league resents, though—as it deems proper that all Jews should resent—the parade of their race's name with shamful significance.

Accordingly, when hotels by the use of some such expression as, ''Our guests are exclusively Gentiles,'' sought to inform the public that they accepted the patronage only of persons who did not elect to meet the Jew on a basis of social equality, the stipulation was ignored as one which we, too, might make. But when a hotel asserted, ''We do not cater to Hebrew trade;'' ''You will be pleased to know that we do not entertain Hebrews,'' or resorted to language otherwise calculated to fasten upon the Jews responsibility for the situation, the league's machinery was set in motion.

With Law and Diplomacy

In eight states, laws have been enacted at its behest to check such evil practices, and in those states, when violations occured, the offenders were warned of the penalty—a procedure which proved almost universally successful. In other states, the league operated through letters of protest, in which attention was called to the injury innocent persons were caused to suffer, and the use of a non-offensive method of advertising was urged.

The league was careful in the phrasing of its letters, many of which achieved the most satisfactory results, illustrated by the following—a typical reply for a hotel proprietor, whose sense of justice was aroused when the harm he unconsciously had done was pointed out to him:

> ''Your letter of July 17 at hand. I will say in reply that I had never given this matter any serious thought. I entertain no prejudice against the Jews, for there are good and bad among all races. I wish to assure you and the league that, from now on, my advertising folders will be entirely free from all such statements as you mention.''

Traducers of the Jews are divided into two principal classes: those who offend out of pure vindictiveness, or a profound indifference to the sensibilities of their victims; and those who err through thoughtlessness, or its virtual equivalent, ignorance.

"EVERYBODY'S business is nobody's business," an adage asserts. Need it be said, How true? Witness the slurs which the Jews have suffered for years, virtually without protest; which they are suffering now in many quarters because of the lack of an organized and determined effort to put their traducers down. One cure is—

ANTIDOTES FOR POISONED PENS

Facsimiles of three of the eight bills, passed by state legislatures to stop the widespread and baseless slander of the Jews

A Task Requiring Delicacy

With the latter, it is far easier to deal; but neither may be approached successfully, as a rule, without the exercise of some degree of adroitness. Hence, the practice of a number of Jews, who retorted to ill-conceived summer resort advertising in hasty, acrimonious letters of censure, is to be regretted, no matter how their personal vanity may have been served; for even the portals of what is normally an open mind will close when threatened with a battering ram.

The exigency is one for enlightenment rather than recrimination—enlightenment for those who would be the friends of the Jew, if prejudice were dispelled; and, of course, legitimate restraint for others who would take to themselves illegitimate prerogatives, no matter what relationship existed.

Eight States Have Acted.

To curb the latter, anti-discrimination laws have been adopted in District No. 1, by five state—Maine, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, New York and Connecticut—the largest number in any single territorial sub-division of the B'nai B'rith. Colorado, in District No. 2, has enacted such a statute, as has Pennsylvania in District No. 3; while the last state to pass the law was Illinois, in District No. 6, where action was taken in the 1919 session of the legislature.

It is the duty of all Jews, first by their deportment to refute their critics; and then, with the consciousness that justice sustains them, to wage uncompromising war upon the enemies of their good repute.

Members who reside in states where an anti-discrimination law has not been enacted, should communicate with the Secretary of the League, 1228 Tribune building, Chicago, Ill., for copies of existing laws and other information that should prove helpful.

The Merchant of Venice

The league also is issuing an interrogation to all the lodges of the country to ascertain how many cities still use the Merchant of Venice for study in the public schools. The league has succeeded in having the play stricken from the list of the College Entrance board, so that there should be no excuse for its continuation as an elementary textbook.

Secretaries of lodges are urged to respond promptly to the questions, and all members of the order, interested in banishing the volume from institutions of learning, should communicate with the league's headquarters for copies of the objectionable passages and for a list of the cities, in the schools of which the Merchant of Venice no longer is present.

Because of the league's complaint against the song, "Solomon Levi," in the song-book issued by the Y. M. C. A. for use in the American Expeditionary forces, the National War Work council of the organization has advised the administrative committee of the league that no further editions will be printed.

Concerning the "Bolshevik Jews"

Dr. Joseph Clare, a lecturer, made the statement many times that "the Bolshevik leaders are all Russian Jews." The following reply to a communication by the league was received from the manager of the Ellison-White Chautauqua system:

> "Your letter has just come to my attention. Regarding Dr. Clare's lecture, we wish to say that this matter was taken up with him immediately. To our knowledge no furthr complaint has been made, as he he has eliminated whatever might have been objectionable.
> "We thank you for your letter and trust that no further complaint will be registered with you."

Instances of defamation should be brought promptly to the attention of the League's secretary, in order that the spread of the slander may be restricted to the greatest possible degree.

London Press Confirms Massacres of Jews; Peace Envoys Act

THE Zionist Bulletin, published in London, sets forth in its issue which has just reached the United States:

The following is a list of the principal towns in Southern Russia in which pogroms have occurred. There is reason to believe this list is not complete.

Elisabethgrad—About 2,000 killed. Bombs were thrown into cellars where entire Jewish families had taken refuge.

Zabakritch—The butchery lasted two days. The Jews had shut themselves in their houses. The bandits entered and killed them in silence, one after another.

Habidievka (Govt. of Podolia)—All the male Jews were killed (nearly 300), and all Jewish houses looted.

Trostiretz—Three hundred and fourteen Jews massacred; goods looted.

Tcherkassi—General massacre; 800 killed.

Krivari—Hundreds killed. Looting.

Litire (Podolia)—Over 400 killed. Looting.

Bobri (Jewish Agricultural Colony)—Whole Jewish population massacred. Only one woman and five children left alive.

Proskurov—About 5,500 killed, including Jewish travelers, and those who died from wounds.

Zlatopol—Pogrom lasted 8 days. Over 100 killed.

Novi-Mirgovode—Two hundred Jews killed. Pogrom lasted 6 days. Entire city set on fire.

Kublitch—Entire Jewish population exterminated.

Alexandrovna—Entire Jewish population exterminated.

Viessoli-Podol—Half the population massacred.

Umane—Terrible pogrom; numerous victims.

Medjiboge—Entire population massacred.

Mattussov—Seventy killed, village set on fire.

Tchitchelrik—Twenty Jews killed. Looting.

Kadima—Two hundred Jews killed. Looting.

Filschtine—Over 400 Jews killed. Looting.

Ostvog—Great many victims.

Haissine—About 500 killed.

Ivanku—Fifteen killed and 10 severely wounded.

Khastchevata—Great many killed.

Lebedine—Many victims.

Hovodischtche—Thirteen killed.

Radomysl—General massacre.

Bieloozevo—One hundred and twenty killed.

Olgofiel—Massacre and looting.

Bratslav—Massacres.

Annapel—Pogrom with great loss of life.

Vainiarka—Seventeen victims.

Tultchine—Eleven victims.

Vassilkov—Complete devastation.

Teplik—One hundred killed.

Smiela—Over 80 killed.

Schpole—Ten to 15 killed.

Krementchug—Great many killed.

Peace Envoys Protest

A cable received from Paris states that the Committee of Jewish Delegations at the Peace Conference has made public a protest against the anti-Jewish pogroms in eastern Europe in the form of an appeal to humanity which has been signed and issued by the foremost men of letters and leading public men of France.

This statement bears such eminent names as Anatole France, Pierre Mille, Charles Seignobos, the historian; Henri Barbusse, Victor Margeritte, Michael Corday, M. Aulard, the historian; Emile Cambes, Prof. Larnaude, Albert Thomas, George Duhamel, Ernest Lavisse, of the French Academy, and many others of note.

The appeal was prepared by a number of public spirited French citizens at the time when the delegation from the American Jewish Congress was still in Paris and co-operating with the Committee of Jewish Delegations. It follows in part:

"Appeal to All Mankind

"In the name of human conscience, in the name of the moral responsibility of all men to their fellow men, the undersigned appeal to the people of the world, and especially to the people of France.

"A cry of despair and poignant sorrow comes to us from eastern Europe—Poland, Lithuania, Ukrainia, Galicia, Roumania. An entire people appeals desperately to us for help. Compared with the recent atrocities, the pogroms under the Czar, the masacre at Kishenev, were as the play of children.

Defense Committee Urged

"The undersigned appeal to the people of the world and ask that they lift their voice against the unheard of crimes of which a people under the heavens are victims.

"It is necessary that there be formed committees for the Defense of Jews in Eastern Europe and that those committees unite in prompt and vigorous action against the oppressors."

Zionism Hears Its Stewards

Criticism of Executive Committee in Chicago Leads to Vote of Confidence, 228 to 25; President Wilson Lauded for Obtaining Justice for the Jews; Holy Land's Early Occupancy is Forecast

THE Zionists' convention was opened in the Auditorium theater at 2:30 o'clock Sunday afternoon, Sept. 14, with an attendance of more than 2,500 persons, of whom 615 had registered as delegates.

Judge Hugo Pam, in his address of welcome, requested solemnity in the proceedings because of the greatness of the task to be accomplished. Zionism, he declared, was of interest, not only to the Jews, but, since the policy of self-determination was being advocated, to the leading statemen of the world.

Judge Julian W. Mack, president of the convention, in greeting the delegates, also asked for the careful consideration of all reports and for constructive suggestions. He referred to President Wilson as "the leader of all humanity," and characterized Justice Brandeis as "Our great and silent leader."

Paints Future of Palestine

He called attention to the fact that the Balfour declaration was only an offer endorsed by other nations, which he had reason to believe would be made by the Peace conference. He pictured a new civilization to be established in Palestine which, while founded on the historic past, would be supplemented by everything modern civilization could contribute.

Judge Mack appealed for men and money to prosecute the reconstruction. He closed with a plea for unity.

Mr. Jacob De Haas, executive secretary of the Zionists, Louis Lipsky, organization secretary and Miss Henriette Szold, educational secretary, submitted reports.

Mr. De Haas told of what had been accomplished in American organization work and praised the leaders of the educational movement. He deplored, though, that sufficient money had not been raised to carry on this activity more successfully.

Restoration Fund Is Tripled

Louis Lipsky reported that the Zionist membership had increased ten fold and the Palestinian restoration fund had been tripled. He recounted his difficulties in reorganizing the Zionists here and in his endeavors to transfer loyalty from the local bodies to the national organization. He suggested the convention proceed cautiously in attempting reforms.

Many greetings from eminent Jews of the world were read, including messages from the central committee of the Zionists' organization of Russia, the British organization, and from Nathan Strauss of New York.

Dr. Chaym Weitzman, who signed the cablegram of the British Jews, expressed his gratitude to the American Zionists "whose moral force and material power have so signally contributed to the realization of the Balfour declaration, and its acceptance by the world powers."

Executive Committee Criticised

On Monday the report of the executive committee stirred many protests because of the high-handed and secretive methods used, because of blunders, and tardiness of action by the administration. The administration was accused of having no policy, and it was urged by the chairman that these charges be put in the form of questions to be answered by Mr. De Haas.

While the latter seemed to satisfy the majority there was considerable disapproval in many parts of the hall. The executive committee was asked whether accounts of pogroms in Poland could be made public as soon as received, whether the administration had done its duty toward the Jewish Legions and how the delegates sent to Jerusalem were selected. Fault was found because of the use of politics and because of a lack of concentration upon the practical problems in Palestine. The accusation was made, too, that the Zionists magnified facts and the leaders were called autocratic.

WHERE HOPES COME TRUE

Reading of Balfour declaration to the Jews of Jerusalem; (at right) Lieut. Col. Patterson, commanding the 38th Battalion, Royal Fusiliers, Rufa, Palestine

Promises Definite Policy

Mr. De Haas declared the administration policy would be determined in the convention Tuesday morning. He requested the delegates to be careful in asking certain questions publicly because of the delicacy and intricacy of international relations involved in Zionist problems.

He reminded the questioners that the Zionist organization of America was only part of an international body and, therefore, could not attempt to solve all problems. He denied that the administrative committee had usurped the power of the executive committee, and explained the apparent tardiness of certain important acts as due to delayed communication with foreign countries.

When some delegates still expressed disapproval Chairman Lipsky called for a vote of confidence, resulting in the support of the administration, 228 to 25.

News of European Jews

Reports on the condition of Jews of Europe and of Palestine were made by Judge Mack and Dr. Wise members of the commission of investigation appointed by the American Jewish congress and Prof. Felix Frankfurter, a Zionist delegate to the Paris parley. Judge Mack related that at the conference racial minority groups had been recognized; that the right of the Jews to use their language had been affirmed, and that the Jewish Sabbath had been protected.

Prof. Frankfurter emphasized that the holy land would be surrendered to the Jews when England is made mandatory, probably in a few months.

"The transfer," he said, "will be made to Great Britain as mandatory, responsible to the League of Nations, with a government of Palestine dedicated to the ideal of a Jewish home land.

"The task of Great Britain will be difficult for the terms of the mandate must consider her relation to the Jew, the Jew's to the Arab, and Great Britain's to the League of Nations."

Dr. Wise Lauds Wilson

Dr. Wise praised President Wilson for demanding and securing justice for the Jewish people in all the peace treaties. Rabbi Wise introduced a resolution which was adopted urging that the American Jewish congress be reconvened.

On Tuesday morning Justice Brandeis and Professor Frankfurter addressed a joint executive session of committees called to draft resolutions.

The following were adopted.

> "Whereas, effective action will become imperative immediately after the political status of Palestine shall have been established, and
> "Whereas, the war has seriously interferred with the proper functioning of the Zionist world organization, and it now becomes possible to re-establish authority and strengthen the leadership of the organization, therefore, be it
> "Resolved, that we favor the convening of the Zionist congress as soon as possible after the political status of Palestine shall have been determined;
> "Resolved, that the Zionist organization of America should use its best endeavors to have transferred to Palestine, as soon as feasible after the political status of that country shall have been established, all central Zionist administrative and financial institutions and activities."

Makes Plea for Unity

Rabbi James Heller, reporting for the committee on committees, declared the political situation concerning a Jewish Palestine is eminently satisfactory. He called upon the Zionists to forget their differences and subordinate everything to the work of reconstruction.

A resolution recording the grief of the Zionists at the untimely death of Aaron Aaronson was adopted. Words of personal tribute were added by Judge Mack and Miss Szold.

A resolution of thanks was given the Jewish Legionaires.

Mrs. A. H. Fromenson of New York, reported that 140 different groups of women workers had been established in this country, many of whom had been manufacturing clothing for Palestine sufferers.

Robert Szold, financial secretary of the Zionists' organization, announced that the Palestine fund totaled $3,000,000.

The evening session was addressed by Rabbi Stephen S. Wise, who read a statement from Mrs. Joseph Fels, recommending gradual nationalization of Palestinian lands. Mr. Bernard A. Rosenblatt, president of the Zion Commonwealth of America, discussed co-operative colonies and described the founding of Balfouria, a settlement of demobilized Jewish Legionaries.

Meet Next in Holy Land

In Wednesday's meeting a resolution that the next Zionist convention be held in Jerusalem was greeted with cheers. A resolution was adopted, providing that the delegates chosen should use their best efforts to obtain action from the congress to adjust the relations between all elements in the international organization.

On Wednesday evening a mass meeting was held, addressed by Rabbi Stephen S. Wise, Mr. Jacob De Haas and others.

The following officers were elected: Honorary president, Justice Louis D. Brandeis of the United States Supreme court; president, Julian W. Mack; vice-presidents, Rabbi Stephen S. Wise, and Henry Friedenthal; treasurer, Peter Schweitzer; assistant treasurer, Walter S. Mayer; executive secretary, Jacob De Haas; organization secretary, Louis Lipsky, and educational secretary, Henry S. Szold.

A Resume

Col. Harry Cutler, in charge of the work of the Jewish Welfare Board, has made public an account of the closing chapter of its activities. In part, it follows:

"When I went to France in February, 1919, in accordance with the suggestions received from General Pershing, through Raymond B. Fosdick, we had been operating under the Y. M. C. A.

"My first act was to take up our status with the proper authorities, and as a result the Jewish Welfare Board was authorized to deal directly with the army. We had then but a few centers with a personnel of fifty-seven. When I left Paris, forty Jewish Welfare huts and stations were flying the blue Mogen Dovid."

"AND the ransomed of the Lord shall return, and come with singing unto Zion . . . and sorrow and sighing shall flee away." (Isaiah, 35, 10.)

Our ancesters used to express in this way the ineradicable hope of every human being in a God that can not have condemned his children to everlasting suffering. They exclaimed such prophetic passages when they rose from the floor after chanting the dirges of the Ninth of Ab after the severe physical privation of the fast on Yom Kippur, they sweetened with them their joy on holydays or at family feasts, as at weddings, and expressed in them their hopes in the moments of ease at their Sabbath table.

For a long time after the French Revolution, when a democratic constitution seemed to have solved the Jewish question definitely, this belief was denounced as childish, if not disloyal. With the beginning of the last era in our history, after the Russian pogroms of 1881, this idea was revived. Theodore Herzl made it "hoffaehig" for thoroughly modern people; and what in 1897, when the first Basle Congress convened, would have been considered utopian, has become a fact. Men of American birth, standing high in public life, ministers and laymen, representing the most radical views on religion, have united in an imposing public gathering in Chicago, Sept. 14 to 18, to proclaim Israel's renationalization on the soil of the Fathers.

A healthy national life is bound to develop parties. Struggle is the symptom of life, and partisan spirit was not absent from the Congress of American Zionists. The first evidence was manifest in a resolution which under a covert threat invited the orthodox Mizrahi and the socialist Poale Zion to return to the fold. The resolution failed to pass in this severe form, and the re-union of the wayward children is still possible without a compromise on the part of the secessionists.

A still healthier sign of life was the seathing general denunciation of the present administration by Abraham Goldberg of New York, who voiced the now popular demand for democratization of the movement. This desire was expressed in a proposition to change the mode of election of the administration. The idea was evidently popular, though action was postponed.

A NEW STATE IN THE MAKING

America is feeding 800,000 starving children in Poland. Above is a group of non-Jewish youngsters receiving food supplied by the American Jewish Relief committee. The center picture shows a Jewish school in Poland maintained despite hunger and persecutions, while the final illustration discloses two rabbis attempting to find the ruins of their home.

There was a great deal of enthusiasm manifest during the session, expressed in thunderous applause, clapping of hands, rising, waving of flags and singing of Hatikvah. A careful observer could, however, not fail to notice that there was a great deal of claque work on certain occasions to which the majority merely yielded but which it did not share.

Justice Brandeis, the most prominent figure of the convention, earned the sobriquet of Moltke, the "grosse Schweiger," being repeatedly referred to by the president, Judge Mack, as "our silent leader," an appellation which every time was greeted with tumultuous applause.

Behind the Scenes

What is the psychology of this enthusiasm at a negative action, if such phrase be permitted? I venture to say that the crowd became enthused at the idea that there was a great deal more to be thankful for than what the convention heard, and that the "silent leader" knew it but for weighty reason deferred to reveal it.

An unpleasant revelation, however, leaked out on the floor. Mr. Gabriel, a native or former resident of Palestine, told the story that the French consul general of New York refused passport vises to anyone going to Syria, unless the applicant declared himself in favor of France as mandatory for Syria. The inconvenient story was shoved out of public debate by a persuasive suggestion of Rabbi Stephen S. Wise, expressed in his irresistibly sonorous voice, which warned the naive questioner from this dangerous Lorelei whirlpool of unconfirmed rumors.

These rumors have meantime received confirmation in a statement pulished in the new Jerusalem daily, "Doar Ha-Yom" (Aug. 20), which reports that both Mohammedans and Christians of Syria are protesting against a mandate to be given to France, and that they clamored for admission to the American commissioners who visited Haifa for the purpose of ascertaining the sentiment of the natives, but that they were kept back by French troops at the point of bayonets.

Another inconvenient fact, which was kept out of discussion, was the mutiny of the Jewish legionaires, who are awaiting sentence by court martial because their expectations are not fulfilled. The case was, however, brought up for discussion in the British House of Commons by Captain Armsby, and Secretary Forster replied evasively. The complete reports have not reached us at the moment of this writing.

Equally obscure are other reports on the progress of the movement. Yiddish papers of Aug. 17, report that the Times declares British statesmen are too sentimental, while the same paper on Sept. 20, in commenting on the Chicago convention, demands a greater Palestine. Previously (Sept. 6), The Times declared that the Zionist scheme is a reality to which only some Jews are opposed. The Daily Telegraph warned against any action for the present because matters are too unsettled. This was practically the view of the official Zionist leadership which was bitterly attacked by Max Nordau in the Palestine Daily News. Now, Nordau, who since the beginning of the war is living as an exile in Spain, is permitted to come to England, and we may look forward to some plain words from this veteran opponent of conventionality.

It ought not to be overlooked that Jean Longuet, the grandson of Karl Marx, addressed a Poale Zion meeting in Paris and expressed himself in favor of the Jewish homeland. This is especially interesting. Karl Marx ridiculed his co-worker, Moritz Hess, one of the earliest advocates of Zionism, as the communist rabbi, and issued the famous appeal to the proletariat of the world to unite.

Longuet certainly presents either a problem from the point of view of Jewish nationalism or its solution. His grandfather was a full-blooded Jew, though not brought up as such; his grandmother, the daughter of a Junker, a full-blooded Teuton; his mother, therefore, a hybrid between Teuton and Jew; his father probably a full-blooded Frenchman. Longuet, therefore, is twelve and one-half per cent Jew, twelve and one-half per cent Teuton, and fifty per cent Gaul.

An Incontestable Boon

The Jewish Health Bureau, established by Nathan Straus in Palestine, shows results which every lover of humanity will receive with genuine satisfaction. It treated in its poliolinic 80,686 cases in 1915, and during the first half year of 1916, its activity reached 87,692 cases. Similar, though not as large, is the work of the poliolinic Lemaan Zion, established in 1898.

The headquarters of the Zionist movement, now located in London, have gained Professor Patrick Geddes of the University of Edinburg, a specialist in town planning, as expert for drafting the plans for the site of the university of Jerusalem.

A music institute was opened in Jerusalem, and the governor, Storres, issued invitations for the event in three languages, Hebrew, English and Arabic. A small incident which occurred at the opening shows the difficulty of the situation. The violinist, Anton Tschaikov, played Hatikavah. The audience rose, but the governor remained seated. His example was followed by Miss Landau, the head mistress of the Evelyn de Rothschild school, and by Norman Bentwich, judge of the Jerusalem court. They rose when at the end of the exercises "God save the King" was played.

The interpretation of this attitude is that Palestine is still a Turkish province under British military occupation.

Russia, New or Old

The realm of the czar, up to 1914, presented the only serious political problem for the world's Jewry. Owing to the creation of the Polish state and the secession of Ukraine, Lithuania and the Baltic provinces, whatever the fate of the latter may ultimately be, the Jews in Russia proper can only be a small fraction of those languishing in the Pale up to five years ago. Yet owing to the wild drive decreed by Grandduke Nicholas in the western provinces at the approach of the German armies, the Jews who found a new home in the interior of Russia, together with those who on the ground of special privileges were living there before, and to whom the political exiles in Siberia must be added, represent a probably not inconsiderable number.

The defeat of Kolchak's army resulted, in accordance with approved fashion, in a wholesale slaughter of the Jews of Yekaterinaburg and Perm, and in pogroms all over Siberia. The London Times published the report of one of Kolchak's generals, who admitted that "the people" in these places, embittered by the brutalities of the Bolsheviki, wreaked vengeance on the Jews and that court martials had to act with such speed that "occasionally" innocent people may have become victims.

The New York Nation (Aug. 23) hinted with great delicacy at "some leading Jews" who had a conference with the Russian archbishop, Platon, in New York, and warned them against placing any confidence in the promises of this "pogromchik." The Dial (Sept. 3) was more explicit and stated that A. Sack, head of Kolchak's publicity bureau in this country (perhaps a converted Jew; Pauline Wenegroff in her charming "Memoirs of a Grandmother" speaks of Abraham Sack, her brother-in-law, whose family converted to the Greek Catholic Church), had arranged a meeting between this ecclesiastic, who was one of the leading pogrom agitators and an ardent supporter of autocracy, and Messrs. Jacob H. Schiff, Louis Marshall, Oscar S. Straus and Rabbi Stephen Wise.

WHENCE COME REPORTS OF POGROMS

According to The Dial, a threat of wholesale pogroms was held out unless the Jews would support Kolchak's cause. As the valient admiral has meantime "resigned" and, as the allied troops are announced to be withdrawn, the incident probably has lost its significance for the present.

The Czar's Residuary Legatee

Great Britain followed the example of the United States by appointing a commission to investigate the situation of the Jews of Poland and by placing at the head of it a prominent Jew, Sir Stuart Samuel, the president of the Jewish Board of Deputies. The latest advices inform us that his arrival in Poland was greeted by a new pogrom in Lodz, just as Morgenthau's arrival was celebrated with the slaughter of Minsk. The following details are reported:

As the Poles prepared to capture Minsk, an airship scattered handbills, signed by Morgenthau, in which the Jews were warned not to take any part in the defense of the city. A pogrom followed. It is said that the Polish government officially notified Morgenthau that of the ringleaders in the pogroms nine were executed and 112 sentenced to various terms of imprisonment.

The Warsaw correspondent of the London Morning Post, an antisemitic paper (Sept. 9), predicts that Mr. Morgenthau will whitewash Poland, explaining the pogroms as a natural reaction against profiteering which led to acts of violence, regrettable but also unavoidable in times of excitement. The same paper (July 29), also declares Dr. Bogen "the most conspicuous victim of the world lie that the Germans undertook to spread," namely, the report of a pogrom in Wilna. Meantime, while the Yiddish press of Poland continues to attack Bogen for having assisted in whitewashing Poland, the Vorwaerts apologizes for its criticism by publishing his report.

The desire of a whitewash is quite evident on the part of Lloyd George's government and its supporters. Mr. Raper interpellated in the House of Commons on the "alleged" pogroms, and Sir Hamer Greenwood, on behalf of the foreign office, replied that the inquiry into the "so-called" pogroms was in progress, but in view of the desired co-operation with the United States government, it was not desirable to make any statement at the moment (July 30).

Popolski's Vernacular

The Polish paper, "To-i-Owo," of Warsaw, attacks "David" Baruch, member of the American Peace Delegation, who is hand in glove with David Lloyd George and who together are responsible for the delay of Haller's army, which is the cause that Poland did not get already Upper Silesia and the whole Baltic coast.

"Prawda Robotnicza" ridicules the appointment of Herman Liebermann of Przemysl as councillor to the Polish legation in London—evidently like the appointment of Berenson in like capacity at Washington, made for the sake of impression—and calls him a red haired "Szaigetz" who will be a proper match for Lloyd George's secretary Namur, the "Englishman from Tarnow."

The Polish ambassador, Prince Eustach Sapieha, falls in line and declares that insignificant disorders were exaggerated into pogroms which never took place, while in reality on a few occasions Poles, outraged by Jewish profiteers, made some demonstrations.

Pan Paderewski also joins in the chorus, declaring the reports of pogroms a German invention, and Pan Korfanty, ex-member of the German Reichstag, informs a reporter of The London Times that the whole problem will disappear when the new Poland shall have solved the question by changing the Jewish stockjobber and middleman into a laborer and mechanic.

Pan Korfanty must have overlooked the fact that he talked to a British and American public all of whom know that by far the majority of immigrants from Poland are shop workers, that there are in New York alone fully 200,000 Jews, mostly natives of what is Poland today, who are employed as laborers in the various branches of the garment industry. He perhaps was unaware of the fact that we know from the official census of Galicia in 1910 that the percentage of Jews employed in industries and in small mechanics' shops is 24.57, while their percentage in the population is 10.86. He may not know, but we do, that in the woolen mills of Lodz, Bialystok and similar places, Jews can not even find employment in some mills owned by Jews because the Polish hands will not allow it.

Pan Korfanty may even have known these things but he has to appeal to the non-Jewish readers of The Times, who are the sounding board for the natural wishes of Mr. Lloyd George's government, desirous to win public opinion in favor of the Poles. This is also the object of a letter addressed by M. Clemenceau to Paderewski, June 24, and only recently brought to our notice, in which the French statesman consoles his Polish colleague, informing him that articles 10-12 of the treaty are not so bad after all, and do not mean "une reconnaissance des Juifs en tant que communaute politique separee."

Jews Sufferings Yet Untold

We omit the unpleasant and tedious enumeration of all the atrocities, big and small, that were reported in the course of a month, and some of which, in Herman Bernstein's mysteriously interrupted series, were given wide publicity by a press syndicate, while others, written with the wonderful realistic vigor of the pen of Shalom Asch, do not receive the attention which they deserve, owing to the fact that they were written in Yiddish.

It is sufficient to quote Bernstein's statement that the facts published about the sufferings of the Polish Jews are as a drop in the bucket. We have an invaluable witness to the seriousness of the condition in a report by the British publicist, H. N. Brailsford, in The New Republic of Aug. 20. A brief abstract of this in every way remarkable article speaks volumes.

"The traditional tolerance of the Polish state," says Mr. Brailsford, "is a myth"—like the protection of the Protestants by Prussia and of the Greek

to the Jews of America

AFTER five years of blind groping into the mist, out of which came to us the voices of our brethren in all the war-torn lands, pleading for help from America, there comes now definite news of their sad state from which we can learn of the task that is before us.

What we, the Jews of America, have done during the last five years has been summed up into one sentence by a rabbi, who said to one of our delegates in Europe:

"Tell the Jews of America that they are running a race with the angel of death. If they send money enough, they win. If they fail us, the cemetery wins."

Nothing more graphic of what we have done and what we still have to do can be said. We have saved hundreds of thousands of lives. Speaking for you all, may I not say to them when I meet their representatives abroad, "We will not fail you now. We will again pledge ourselves before our holy altars to deserve the blessings that the Almighty has showered upon us in this favored land of ours.

"We will do all that is humanly possible to re-establish Israel everywhere, so that it may lead a fuller, more secure and more contented life; to transmit to generations yet unborn the heritage of mercy, truth and love for all mankind that was bequeathed by our ancestors to us."

May the prayers of a United Israel be heard on high, and may the Almighty in His infinite goodness vouchsafe unto us, and unto all Israel, His priceless blessing of peace.

Ferdinand Quoted as Saying He'll Reject Treaty Like Poland's

Catholics by Russia. The patriot, Roman Dmowski, who was a Russophil and Czarist reactionary in the duma, is a second Lueger to whom, as to his prototype, the protection of the small middle man is a convenient slogan for winning political power. Paderewski belongs to the same party. The ruling People's Party, to which both belong, is responsible for the brutal fanaticism which manifests itself in the pogroms.

The Polish Catholics are butchering the non-Catholics as brutally as the Turks butchered the non-Mohammedans, and the authorities connive at these outrages with a "Turkish tolerance." The Allies failed to stop the war between Poles and Ukrainians.

"They will fail, even if they try, to stop the persecution of the Jews," the article continues. "To place minorities like Germans or Jews under Poles and Czechs and then imagine that all will be well because some magic League of Nations will watch over them is a pitiable self-delusion."

Especially significant is Brailsford's report that in a town, which was successively Tsarist, German, Ukrainian, Bolshevist and Polish, the inhabitants declared that the Polish rule was by far the worst.

One exception shall be made from the rule not to mention details because the report came to the present writer by a fugitive who arrived in this country, a woman who begged that her name should not be mentioned out of regards for her relatives still living in the Polish hell.

The town of Monasterzyska in eastern (Ukrainian) Galicia was invaded by a division of infantry who at once summoned Rabbi Meisels and told him unless by noon 200,000 crowns would be deposited, he and twenty other Jews would be shot. The alleged reason for this demand was that the Jews had given aid to the Ukrainians, had shouted hurrah when Polish officers were shot and that Jewish girls had danced with Ukrainian officers. The general in order to prove that he meant business had two sons of Berel Kaufmann stripped naked in public and had them flogged until they fainted, several times reviving them and repeating the procedure.

My informant, the wife of an American citizen who recently arrived in New York, fled to Vienna where the Spanish ambassador gave her a passport to Switzerland. In Berne, where she went to the office of the United States minister, a Pole—Polish spies are always hanging around the embassy—whispered to her in German: "Schweigen ist Gold." This was explained to her by some countrymen to mean that if she would tell anything of her experiences in America, her relatives would be made to pay for it.

New State and Old Story

The Ukrainians, fighting the Poles as bitterly as they did in 1648, are helping them in the eyes of the politicians, if not in fact, by surpassing their erstwhile masters in the cruelty of massacres. The figures given in various reports reach into the thousands, and while it may be proper to adopt the method applied to the Polish affairs and to presume that excitement exaggerated the figures, it seems more than a mere guess when one report of the Zionist Information Bureau gives the number of those killed in the pogrom of Proskurov, which began Feb. 15, and lasted four days, as 3,764.

Abe Cahan, who gathered his information in the vicinity, declares the cruelties in the Ukraine are far more brutal than in Poland. The Pole is a gourmet in tormenting his victims. He will force old Jews to dance until they fall down from exhaustion; he will force boys to singe the beards of their fathers; he will make his victims dig their graves before they are executed. The Ruthenian is brutal. He will stand his victims in line to see how many he can kill with one shot, he will chop their head off with a hatchet, hack infants to pieces and the like.

Cahan, however, adds that Petlura, the Ukrainian leader, has no power. His bands follow him just as long as they feel like it. He tried to show his good-will by inviting the prominent Zionist leaders, Guenzburg (Achad Ha-Am), Ussischkin, Jochelman and Goldstein, to investigate conditions in person. Guenzburg declined because of poor health, Jochelman insisted on a guarantee that the commission be permitted to assist in the trial of the cases reported to the court, and Goldstein went to Paris whence he expects to come to America.

Dr. Sarchi, former minister of Jewish affairs, published in Switzerland a statement of Petlura declaring that he was doing his best to protect the Jews—giving as a proof the law of 1918 which granted the Jews a Zentralrada, an autonomous national council—but that lack of organization and of recognition by the Allies are responsible for his inability to put his orders into effect.

Meantime a new massacre of very large dimensions was reported from Novigrad Volynsk, and to the victims it probably makes no difference whether their fate is due to a colonel in General Haller's army, recognized as military power by the allied and associate governments, or to a hjetman considered a highwayman in the Tuileries.

Rumania Profits by Experience

The Treaty of Berlin conditioned the recognition of Rumania's independence on her granting her Jews full equality. She accepted the condition but evaded her promise. All the foreign ministers of the signatory powers declared that she had not fulfilled her obligation, but this is as far as it went. Now she will not do it any more. She finds it is better to keep up appearances, and maybe she feels her position is stronger than it was forty years ago. Conditions in the Balkans and in Russia are so unsettled that Rumania may at any time become the decisive factor in a combine.

Whatever it may be, King Ferdinand declares he is not going to sign a treaty with a minority clause similar to that of Poland, for this would mean the recognition of a suzerain power. At the same time he wishes to make it clear that he means to solve the Jewish question. For this purpose he invited Mr. Wolfson, an American journalist, who is on a mission to Rumania, to a discussion of the situation. His majesty declares there will be no persecution of the Jews, and there never was. This in itself settles the question for us.

We might, however, mention as an illustration of the situation that Major Chrulescu published a manifesto to the Rumanian people, asking them to cleanse the cross of Jesus, defiled by Judas, the traitor and his worthy successors, Lenine, Trotzky and Kerensky. Small instances like the sentencing of a Jewish soldier without trial to 20 years in prison, on the mere statement of an officer that he had been disrespectful to him, are of frequent occurrence.

The Hydra-Headed Eagle

The bicephalic eagle in Austria's coat of arms was the subject of many jokes in olden times. The joke has turned into a tragedy. In all parts of the dismembered empire conditions take, or have taken, a serious turn for the Jews.

The most immediate result of the change of government was a new election for the Reichsrat, now called Austrian National Assembly (Nationalversammlung) and to the Vienna city council, both elections being held on the ground of universal suffrage of both men and women. The next consequence was that the Christian Socialists, as the clericals euphoniously called themselves, the party of the antisemite Lueger, in control of the city affairs since 1895, lost their power, and the socialists are their successors.

Jews, however, have only one representative in the Nationalversammlung, the Zionist, Benno Stricker, and three in the city council of whom one is a member of the executive, the Stadtrat, the first case since 1896. The cause for this small number is this: The Jews form in Vienna nine per cent while in the newly constituted state of German Austria their proportion is insignificant. They can not elect any one of their midst except in the few Vienna districts where they have the controlling vote. It is also significant for the internal conditions of Jewry that the few Jews elected are Zionists.

This change of sentiment did not prevent the Nationalversammlung from indulging in antisemitic debates on every possible and impossible occassion. The attacks on the Jews come from two opposite sides. The Christian Socialists, who are clericals, have their organ in the "Reichspost" which at the same time is the champion of the landed nobility, and was in former years the megaphone of Archduke Francis Ferdinand, whose assassination precipitated the war. The other section of antisimites is composed of the most violent anti-clericals, the Pan-Germans, who long before the beginning of the war stood for a partition of Austria and the annexation of the German provinces to Germany.

It is impossible to quote all instances which gave rise to antisimetic debates in the various parliamentary bodies, but as highly typical a cartoon in the "Reichspost" may be quoted which shows the presentation of a new Opera by the Alliance Israelite, entitled "Universal Peace" with President Wilson as curtain raiser, caricatured as Jew, The scene on the stage shows fighting, while in the orchestra grinning Jews are enjoying the play.

REBELS AGAINST THE LIGHT

THE transition period between two world orders, such as the much protracted peace negotiations have created, is very much like the portion of time antecedent to daybreak, when the thief that stalks and sneaks in the dark and every nefarious crook hastens to commit one more act of violence against society.

While the great powers have ceased battling, the little brand-new dominions, in this or in that corner, are making war in the most approved manner of ruthless terrorism, killing without quarter and ravaging and generally harassing the non-combatants on all sides. But even within their territories there is no peace. The newly won freedom and sense of power is intoxicating.

Lawlessness is rampant. Old animosities are revived. When one remembers how much each of these states, old and new, is in need of the return to peaceful conditions that the work of reconstruction may be begun by concentrated action, when every energy and effort ought to be bent to undo the evil consequences of war and famine, one stands aghast at the suicidal blindness with which demagogues fan the flames of hatred and incite one-half of the population against the other.

Old Order Dies Hard

Of course, the older order of things with its caste distinctions and its racial hatreds will die hard. At times one is apt to lose patience or to despair of the future. What is the lot of the ill-treated Jewish people at the present moment? Has the outcome of the war done them more harm than good? Has it but served to suffer all the evil to be revived?

From all corners the cry of our agonized brethren rises. Here a pogrom and there a massacre, and everywhere economic ruin and disaster. With their youth beneath the blood drenched soil of Europe's battlefields, with their babes starving for want of nourishment, with their old men the prey of diseases such as famine begets, what is there left of them? And the few that are left are trodden down, persecuted, harassed at every step.

Those rebels against the light would, in the dying moments of the old order, perpetrate what evil they may that the work of internal pacification may be delayed. They little reflect how much incalculable damage they inflict upon their fatherland, how much they rob it of the sympathies of the world, how much they lower the esteem in which we would hold them and lose the affection of which they stand in need. Those are the throes of the new birth. Satan is having his joy in the last hours of his reign.

Dawn of a New Day

But the mists will clear and day break. A house divided against itself cannot abide. No nation can exist half-free, half-slave. No new or old state but must compose its inner quarrels. The various nationalities must learn to respect each other's right. There is room for all and every one. Liberty means liberality. Don't cut your own noses off to spite the man who is your next door neighbor and will remain so for a long time to come.

Meanwhile, turn on the light full and strong. In the light of the day, in the face of public opinion, the hatred mongers must flee to their holes. Then and then only will there be surcease to hapless Jewry. Their brethren in the lands of freedom will not rest until their cause is righted and they are afforded that measure of protection and equality before the law which is their inalienable prerogative.

No more and no less; but that much they must have and will have.

OUR FATHERS BUILDED WELL

Much as we may poke fun at the one-day-in-the-year Jew, much as we may have misgivings about the efficacy of the shortlived revival which Judaism celebrates one month in the year, much as we may wish it were otherwise and Israel would be found in the house of God every sabbath and every week day, the truth remains that we are dealing with institutions thousands of years old, whose foundations were laid in the dim past and whose structure was reared by generations.

We shall not be blind to the signs of decay, to the ruthless demolitions that are going on on all sides, to the willful undertakings of little and big destructionists; but withal our fathers builded well. The house of Judaism is built upon the rock, and wind and weather will not prevail against it. From without they pound and hammer against it, and from within the axe of the destroyer is lifted high and wielded with force.

Many are the discomforts of the old homestead. One craves for the cheap modern improvements. But when we long to be at home, we want the parental roof hallowed by timelong associations. We feel the impact of bygone days. We remember the days of old. We are thrilled by memories that will not fade.

The Spark of Righteousness

What is it that takes the individualist by the scruff of the neck and lands him in the house where Israel's corporate consciousness is manifested, where Jew and Jew rub shoulders, the high-born and the lowly? Atavism they call it. Rather it is that faint spark that still glimmers beneath the rubbish of self-seeking and self-indulgence.

They mock and scoff and ween themselves free. But the bonds were forged long before they were born. At birth, whether we rebel or no, when we are come to man's estate we entered upon an inheritance, and we cannot if we would rid ourselves of it. Our every fibre is responsive to those slumbering impulses.

Instinct is more powerful than reason and blood thicker than water. What is it that made Temple and pilgrimage so dear to our fathers—the animal sacrifices perchance, the weird ministrations of priests? Was it not rather the sense of coming together, of giving and receiving cohesion? Israel united, that was the watchword of the festive day, that the meaning of the institution of annual lustration, that the message that went forth from the white-garbed messenger of the congregation who voiced the corporate sentiments of Israel.

Recalled to Our Duties

Aye, this feeling cannot be generated unless Israel is repentant. In the storm and stress of life we wander far away from the Jewish norm of life. We are a prey to all the vagaries of the moment. We are partly dragged, partly cajoled into alienation. But something tugs at our heartstrings. We are recalled to our duties to the household of Israel. We take our children with us that the forces operative on us may work on them. For the forces are there if we only let them operate. We return to a natural state and nature will have her way.

Yes, the fathers builded for solidarity, for cohesiveness, for standing shoulder to shoulder. The day may be longish. The sermon, too. The service is repetitious. But ere the shadows of the night lengthen themselves, we have found ourselves, we have added one more link to the chain of tradition, we have cast away the dross of self-interest and we have been immersed in the purging atmosphere which time hallowed associations alone are able to create. We are at peace with ourselves, at peace with God, at one with the body of Israel.

The Three Faiths

A True Jew Cannot be a Modernist; Judaism Must be Anchored in the Past

By DR. MAX L. MARGOLIS

WHEN one takes up a book like the one that is on my desk now, written by an eminent master and dealing with the three faiths, Judaism, Christianity, and Mohammedanism, in a manner which leaves no doubt in the reader's mind as to the author's studied calmness and fairness of judgment, one is struck, nevertheless, by the inevitable results which the very comparative method involves. The attitude towards Judaism is eminently friendly, and yet the impression is gained that much of what might be said and felt by the insider is not touched by one who, after all, is without.

Of course, the proportions of treatment could not turn out otherwise. When the three are treated together, the lion's share must fall to Christianity. Be it said with all candor. Christianity has a church history. Both Judaism and Mohammedanism are involved in much that is not exactly churchly.

It is true, Christian church history cannot be taken out of touch with world history. Think of the reformation. It was as much a politiial movement as a religious. But in the East religious sects are at once political parties. And Judaism is bound up with the fortunes of a people. The student of religion would disentangle the two elements which in lfe are woven together.

Myths Surround Christianity

Then there is another moment. Mohammedanism arose in the full light of history. There is little of the mythical about it. We can see it built up stage by stage. When we turn to Christianity, we must perforce use the critical method and sift out the kernel of truth surrounded and encased as it is by the husk of legend and myth. Judaism lies still farther back in time. Its constructive history was finished long before the daughter religion branched off. The beginnings are too far away to engage attention.

It is true, Judaism had a history after Christianity appeared. In a book like the present it can be treated only summarily. And barring a few volumes, little has been written upon it. We have histories of the Jewish people. We are still making history. But the history of Judaism is a sadly neglected subject. Much of it may not be of interest to the student of Christianity who is satisfied with accounting for its rise out of the finished product of the Judaism of the past. But the student of religion will be interested in the later phases alike.

A religion lives so long as it reacts upon the forces of the world which often tend to disintegrate it. Religious truths, revelations as we call them, are, it is true, given to choice spirits, great seers, innovators, creative minds. But a truth must of necessity counteract a falsehood or a half or near-truth.

The Pure Vision of Age

In combating untruth, the verities are born. We speak of them as eternal verities. But they had a beginning. Man groveled in superstition and error before he possessed himself of the higher and purer vision. In every period there are movements and counter-movements.

Our Scriptures, in which is deposited the sum of religious thinking in the formative stages of our history, betray the clash of conflicting opinions. They need not have concerned themselves with so trivial a question as to whether angels had a separate existence or not. To that length we would not go with the Cincinnati philosopher. But there is no gainsaying that he is right in conceiving Judaism as a unit.

In philosophy and in theology old questions are constantly brought to the fore, and Plato and Aristotle are as much alive today as they were in the past. That much is true, that on the weightiest subjects of religion, men's minds were divided. But what is more important is the condition of world thought. No religion lives in isolation.

Judaism Marches Onward

Nor is the Christian estimate correct which looks upon the Judaism which survived Christianity as an arrested development, as something carried on by the momentum of its past. If Judaism persisted, it must have had something in it that was worth while having in the world. Whatever one may say, to the right thinking Christian mind Judaism was and is an irritant. It cannot all be well with the state of Christianity.

Jewish monotheism remains the cornerstone of the faith. It meant the negation of polytheism in pagan times, of polytheism with all its disunity of moral effort. It meant the negation of trinitarianism and of all that it connotes. It meant a refusal, as strong in Isaiah as it was in Akiba, to defy man. For that is after all what Christianity means in any of its forms.

We can understand the value which the Christian religious sentiment places upon the embodiment of the divine in a high specimen of humanity. The sum of Christian morality is to pattern oneself upon the perfect exemplar. And the worshipping mind endows that pattern with the highest moral attributes.

Faith in Good Deeds

We also understand the concentration of Christianity upon man's sinful estate and its efforts to sustain the sinner. Judaism holds rather aloof from the sinner, though it opens to him the gates of repentance. But it does not have much faith in returning Magdalens. The soul that sinneth, it shall die. We appreciate the worth of love. We believe in serving God out of motives of love. To love God is our highest command. But love is apt to be sterile.

Knowing and doing, and especially doing, that is what Judaism consciously emphasizes. The reign of law, of moral discipline, of severe and unpleasant duty, of early training in the

The Arabs' Memorandum of Protest

Plea to Peace Conference Asserts Only 60,000 Jews Reside in Palestine, While Those of Other Faiths Number 900,000; Proposes Closed Door for Holy Land; Cites Example Set by America

THE Copenhagen Zionists Bureau announces:

It has already been reported in our bulletins that the American Section of the Interallied commission, during their sojourn in Palestine, received any number of Jewish, Christian and Mohammedan deputations, which made known their wishes in regard to the future political situation.

While numerous Arabian deputations expressed themselves as being in sympathy with Jewish immigration into Palestine—and because of their understanding of the political situation and the needs of the country, voiced the hope of a harmonious living together of the various peoples—these and other Arabian groups submitted resolutions protesting against the Zionistic ambitions.

Their Woes in Detail

We publish the following memorandum which a group of Arabs submitted to the American commission:

"Southern Syria, called Palestine, comprises Jerusalem, Nablus and Akko. The total number of inhabitants is almost 1,000,000. Of these, 60,000 are Jews, scattered in the various parts of the country, and 900,000 Mohammedans, Christians, Fellachens and Bedouins, who all belong to the same race—the united Arabian people. The extent of the land under cultivation is 30,500 square kilometers, of which 450 square kilometers belong to the Jews and was recently acquired.

"When the inhabitants of the country were apprised that without their knowledge promises were made to the Jews concerning Palestine, the promises which are actually against the interests of the inhabitants—they protested both through those who now ruled by right of occupation, and through the representatives of the leading powers. They forthwith called a convention in Jerusalem on Dec. 27, 1918, and the first work of the Congress consisted in the presentation of a protest in which clear proof of the unjust demands of the Zionists were set forth."

Historical Claims Are Denied

These proofs are as follows:

"FIRST: The claim of the Zionists that Palestine belonged to them for historical reasons is unjust. This country is not their original home land. Their successors originally came from the Region of the Two Rivers, from which they emigrated to Egypt, where they lived 400 years.

"When they left Egypt, they came to Palestine and occupied only a small part of the country, the boundaries of which do not even reach beyond the mountains. Neicher did they occupy the harbors. Their sojourn in the country did not last long, and even during this time were they dependent upon others. Later they emigrated to all parts of the world, without leaving anything behind which would give them the right again to claim the country as their own.

"It is altogether different with us, the inhabitants of the country. We lived in this country even before the Jews came here. Since the beginning of Islam, Arabian groups settled in this country, and have been living here practically 1,300 years; and during that entire time have been defending with their blood the Mohammedan and Christian holy places.

Alsace-Lorraine Is Cited

"During this entire time, they have retained their nationality and their Arabian characteristics, and if France can claim Alsace-Lorraine, despite the fact that this territory was German 200 years ago, how can the Jews disregard rights which have endured for 1,300 years?

"The religious claims of the Jews also have no foundations. The Jews do not possess in Palestine any old official synagogues or religious temples; as against this, the Mohammedans and Christians do possess such.

"The whole history of the Jews in Palestine proves how disqualified they are to govern themselves. The whole period of their government was a series of revolutions, without any evidences of culture seeping in. Altogether different was the rule of the Arabs. The epoch of their independence was saturated with science, statecraft and diplomacy.

A Question of Valor

"How dare the Zionists now announce that they have the intention to bring culture to us, to develop our people and improve our characters, since they are in need of these things themselves. The bringing together of the Jews in one place will only re-establish an era of strife—in contradistinction to the Arabs, who with their declaration of independence will bring to the country good fortune and happiness, just as their ancestors did.

"SECOND: The Zionists ask for Palestine on the strength of the Balfour declaration, which was only made to them on condition that by virtue of it, the economic and spiritual interests of the inhabitants of the country would not be harmed. This condition annuls the entire declaration; such harm has already been done, for the ruin and the destruction of our Arabian nation is imminent.

Zionists for Missrule

"The following facts should be firmly established:

"A—The Zionists are not capable of becoming assimilated with others. They live everywhere, a separate existence.

"B—If they already, while only a minority, are monopilizing all the trades, how much the more will this be the case when they become the majority and deprive the populace of their administrative powers.

"C—The contempt with which the Zionists are now beginning to hold the Mohammedan and Christian religions as the occurrences in Joffa, Ramleh, and in other places prove, betray their future intentions.

"The Balfour declaration rests on two hypotheses:

"1—The claim of the Jews that they constitute the majority of the inhabitants and possess the larger part of the land. This claim is false.

"2—On the assertion of the Jews that under the Turkish regime they would have much to endure. This claim also is false.

Pets of the Sultans

"The Jewish foreign subjects were in the favor of the Turkish rulers. As far as the Jews in this country are concerened, of which there are 22,000 in number, they have become so thoroughly a part of us, that they even speak the same language, having only recently been caught in the net of Zionism.

"Besides, President Wilson made known that all promises and pledges made during the war are null and void.

"THIRD: If the demands of the Zionists are based on the promises of the Allied Powers, which were made on the strength of the liberation of small nations, then these demands are unfounded.

"There is no Jewish nation. There is only a Jewish religion. If despite this the Zionists want a homeland, there may be found in this world many places which could be offered them without the necessity of robbing an honest nation, and compelling that nation to surrender its claim to its home to another race, scattered over all the globe.

"FOURTH: The territory owned by Jews is not even one fortieth of the entire land. The number of their inhabitants is only seven per cent of the population.

In a Sorry Plight

"In order to acquaint the Peace Conference with the situation, we declare before all the world that the one claim, which the Jews have to Palestine, is that they are the minority. Formerly the Jews had absolutely no rights in the government which could give them the slightest claim thereto.

"We raise our voices in loud protest against the demands of the Zionists. We refuse to permit Jewish immigration into this Arabian land which the Allied governments gave the right to choose whatsoever form of government it wished. The rights which Great Britain in the year 1912 and 1914 assumed to forbid the immigration of Jews into England, and to punish steamship companies which against the law accepted Jewish immigrants as passengers—the same right have we.

"Likewise with the same right by which America closed its doors to the Chinese, and Australia to Asiatic immigrants, we too may lock the gates of Palestine against the Jews.

Tell of Their Suffering

"With all the more right may we do this, because Jewish immigration and Jewish settlement in Palestine may create much harm for us. As for the Jews who lived in this country before the war, they have the same rights and responsibilities as we.

"As we utter this protest before the Peace Conference, we express the hope that the justification of our claims will be recognized by the conference and our rights protected by killing the ambitions of the Zionists to settle in our country and establish their home there."

The Zionist organization has so often expressed itself on the Arabian memorandum that it is unnecessary to refute its many false statements and conclusions. It is only to be hoped that even those groups of the Arabian inhabitants, who, knowing the aims of the Zionist movement, are today still protesting against the immigration of the Jews into Palestine, will eventually become convinced that that process will in no way cause the subjection of the Arabian inhabitants, but will rather make for a harmonious whole which can alone bring about the healthy development of the country.

Situation of Polish Jews is Desperate, Warburg's Aide Asserts

JACOB BILLIKOPF, who went to Poland as an investigator for Jacob M. Warburg and other members of the American Jewish War Relief committee, is responsible for an interview in The New York Times, describing the six weeks he spent in the new state.

Starving, suffering, with no hope or strength, the Jews of Poland face practical annihilation, he said. The younger generation, such part of it which survives, is stunted in growth and suffering from all the diseases of hunger. The older generation lives, on resignedly praying for help, not for themselves but for their children. Here are some details of the condition of the children as narrated by Mr. Billikopf:

"Krochmalna is the most ghastly street in Jewish Warsaw, and that is saying a good deal. All that can be said in favor of Krochmalna is that its tenements are low and ramshackle, so that the fresh air is not too far removed.

"Hundreds of children, crippled by rickets, hollow-chested women carrying in their arms wan babies that look to be undernourished infants of six months and who turn out to be children four and five years old are to be seen.

"The choice, if you are looking for poverty at its worst on Krochmalna street, is hard to make. We asked the admiring throng that followed us down this malodorous lane where there was the greatest poverty: 'Everybody is dying of starvation here,' they said. We selected an entrance at random. It led into a dirty, unspeakable courtyard, bounded on four sides by ramshackle hovels with broken windows and crumbling walls. Off the courtyard we tried another entrance. Climbing up a broken staircase we paused on the first landing. A chorus of our guides shouted. 'Here is not yet the greatest poverty.' We climbed again another flight and paused again. The odor of massed and packed humanity, of twelve human beings wedged into one room, made us gasp.

"A woman who appeared to be more than seventy, but who turned out to be not much more than half that age, was standing at a little opening of a window. She spoke to us in a whisper, her hand clenched against her breast to keep down the fits of coughing. She had five children. The oldest one was at a neighbor's house.

"She moved aside from the window and allowed us to see the other four children on the sill. It was here that the simile of the withering flower occurred to me. As I have sometimes seen in the poorer tenements of our cities a potful of flowers trying to blossom in the smoky city air, so here were four blossoms trying to be real babies despite the fetid air, starvation, and disease. But they were not succeeding very well. Two of them looked to be about a year old. Between coughing fits the mother told us that the children were, respectively, seven and eight. Of course, they could not walk.

"The youngest child was about three years old. He was sallow and hollow-eyed, like an old man. It was not necessary to ask if he could walk. One asked how he managed to keep alive at all. There was no milk for him too drink, and no cereal to eat, not even bread. The body that should have been plump and a delight to the eye was angular and bony through the little ragged dress."

Lodges Start Activities of Winter

Portsmouth, N. H.

The big dining hall at Hotel Janvrin, Hampton Beach, was the scene of a most enjoyable affair on June 6, when about one hundred and fifty members of N. H. Lodge No. 839, gathered there. It was the first dinner and meeting of the Portsmouth members. A degree team from Portland, Me., exemplified the degrees of the Order to a large class of candidates.

E. M. Chase, president, of Manchester, thanked the members for their attendance and introduced Louis Shapiro, the toastmaster, who in turn presented the speaker of the evening, Charles H. Shapiro, of Bridgeport, Conn., President of the District Grand Lodge. Maj. F. W. Hartford, Sec. E. H. Baker, of the Chamber of Commerce, Gov. John H. Bartlett and Dr. Capean, of Portland, Me., were other speakers. The committee in charge of the arrangements were Charles Santer, Max Gelman and Alex Salden.

Minot, N. D.

Brothers Sylvan E. Hess, former President of the District; Max Rabinowich, Deputy for the State of North Dakota; Sam Papermaster, W. M. Brooks and H. L. Schwam, members of the degree team of Dakota Lodge, instituted Minot Lodge, No. 842, on Sunday, June 22.

Twenty-four members were present and another class has been promised for the next meeting. The following officers were elected and installed by the representative of the District Grand Lodge:

Monitor, Rev. I. Diamond; president, B. Z. Lyons; vice-president, Chas. Kopald; secretary, Joseph Harris; treasurer, Norman Feldman; assistant monitor, Joseph Kopald; warden, A. D. Bronstein; trustee for three years, M. Kopald; trustee for two years, Benj. Rosenberg; trustee for one year, Henry Rosen, and guardian, C. H. Feldman.

The lodge was addressed by Brother Sylvan Hess, who explained the purpose of the Order and offered many practical suggestions to the lodge officers.

Lincoln, Neb.

An enthusiastic meeting of Lincoln City Lodge was held on Sunday afternoon, June 14. Eight candidates were initiated and twenty-six more will be instructed in the obligations of membership at a future meeting. The degrees were conferred by the Omaha team.

More than fifty members of Lincoln Lodge were present. Talks were delivered by Brothers Edwin Simon, of Omaha; Harry H. Lapidus, Deputy for the State of Nebraska, and Henry Monsky, Second Vice-President for District No. 6. Rabbi Singer delivered a stirring address.

As a result of the visit by Omaha members, considerable enthusiasm in Lincoln has been aroused. A large class of candidates has been promised and a program of work has been outlined.

Butte, Mont.

Baron De Hirsch Lodge No. 420, at its session on Aug. 8, appointed a committee to receive Milton Meyer, president of District Grand Lodge No. 4.

On Sept. 14 an open meeting was held to greet the president and Grand Orator Edgar Levey. The hall was packed and the addresses of President Meyers and Grand Orator Levey were enthusiastically applauded. The visiting officers made a plea for the education of the immigrant and urged Butte to establish a social center for Jewish residents.

The lodge's semi-annual report showed it to be the owner of $3,000 worth of Liberty and Victory Bonds and indicated considerable progress.

B'nai B'rith of Bridgeport, Conn., Aids in Staging First Cattle Show and Farm Products Exhibition by Jewish Farmers in Southern New England

Harmony Lodge No. 711 joined with the Jewish Farmers organizations, the Jewish Agricultural and Industrial Aid society, the Council of Jewish Women and the County Farm Bureau in conducting a state field day and carnival on Sunday, Aug. 17. This was the first cattle show and exhibition of farm products ever held by Jewish farmers in Southern New England. A number of athletic contests were staged and prizes awarded.

Talks were made by Harry Gardner, Gabriel Davidson, member of the Jewish Agricultural and Industrial Aid society; Chas. H. Shapiro, president of District Grand Lodge No. 1; L. A. Bevins, county agent; Prof. W. A. Rhey and B. Stone, editor of "The Jewish Farmer."

Harmony lodge also conducted Flag day exercises at the Hebrew institute. Wm. Wittenstein and Chas. S. Shapiro, president of District Grand Lodge No. 1, were the speakers.

Plans Community Center

At its opening meeting Sept. 9 the lodge considered the establishment of a Jewish community center. The members are preparing an elaborate program for the winter in keeping with those of the past year, when addresses were made by Dr. Stephen Wise, Col. Harry Cutler, Dr. Stephen J. Mayer, president of the Connecticut Public Health association; Captain David Albala of the Serbian High commission, Congressman Isaac Siegel, Herman Bernstein and others.

Community singing first organized in Harmony lodge by Brother George Greenspun has become a feature in many other lodges of District No. 1.

Fete Returned Soldiers

The lodge welcomed returned service men with a victory social and entertainment at its hall in the Staples building. The attendance taxed the lodge rooms to capacity.

Attorney Charles H. Shapiro, District President, introduced George W. Crawford, of New Haven, who spoke on "Some of the Least Obvious Results of the War." The new spirit and vision of returned service men, Mr. Crawford said, has caused them to have a different outlook upon American political and social life.

Drilling by Boy Scout Troop No. 7 of the Park Avenue Temple, led by Attorney Charles S. Brody; songs by the Young Judaea Chorus of fifteen, under the direction of George Greenspun; recitations by Miss Dorothy Katz; songs by Miss Mollie Levy, accompanied by Miss Berger and other features were followed by dancing and refreshments.

Hirschfield Is Honored

Members of the lodge also paid a tribute to one of the oldest of their members on June 18, 1919, by arranging a smoker and entertainment in honor of Brother J. Hirschfield, an attache of the Bridgeport post office for thirty years. One hundred fifty guests attended, including Mr. Shapiro, Max Levy, of New York, Secretary of the District, and Postmaster Charles F. Greene.

Attorney Joseph Solomon opened the meeting and then surrendered the chair to George Greenspun as chairman of the committee. Addresses were made by Mr. Shapiro, Mr. Levy, Charles F. Greene and Mr. Hirschfield.

Abraham Lodge Activities

Abraham Lodge No. 89, at its last meeting of the season, had several surprises in store for its members. First a big smoker was prepared. George Greenspun introduced Community Singing. Alexander Greenspun played the piano, assisted by Jacob Greenspun on the 'cello. Several new candidates were initiated. Committees submitted their reports. Brother Lionel Levy, chairman of the committee to confer with the Jewish Welfare and Activities League, to help procure employment for returning soldiers, sailors and marines, reported progress.

An outing was suggested for members of local B'nai B'rith Lodges and their families. Arrangements will be announced later.

Superior, Wis.

The installation of Theodore Roosevelt Ledge No. 844, I. O. B. B., took place at Hotel Superior June 30. The installing officers were H. D. Frankel, St. Paul, President of the District Grand Lodge; Gustavus Loevinger, of St. Paul, and Charles Oreckovsky, of Duluth, members of the General Committee of the District.

Dr. Louis M. Harris was chosen first president of the organization; Aaron Siegel, vice-president; Philip Litman, secretary, and Robert Jacobs, treasurer. The other officers are Isadore Cohen, monitor; S. Y. Josephs, assistant monitor; Ed. Lasky, guardian; L. J. Marks, Julius Cohen and A. Holzberg, trustees.

Twenty-five charter members and a large delegation from Duluth Lodge were present. Gus Loevinger spoke on the duties of members. President Frankel spoke of the quality of Jewry desired in the lodge. Brother Frankel discussed the object of the Order and pleaded for a higher type of Jewish citizenship. A short talk was also made by Albert Marks, president of the Duluth Lodge.

San Jose, Cal.

It was somewhat unusual when Milton Meyer, Grand President of District Grand Lodge No. 4; I. J. Aschheim, Grand Secretary; Edgar C. Levey, Grand Orator, and Felix Gross, prominent member of the Order, took part in the Shabuoth services and confirmation at Congregation Bickur Cholim on June 4. They delivered addresses before the confirmants and congregation after introductory remarks had been made by J. Hart Dasteel.

The visiting B'nai B'rith officers were warmly thanked for their part in the services.

Cleveland, O.

The semi-annual election of Cleveland Lodge No. 16 took place Thursday evening, June 26, at the B'nai B'rith Building, and the following officers were elected for the ensuing six months:

Eugene E. Wolf, president; Herman Einstein, vice-president; Maurice Kahn, recording and financial secretary; Max M. Ozesky, treasurer; Juda Fineberg, warden, and Martin Wexler, guardian.

Maurice Kahn, who resigned the secretaryship May 1, to take effect July 1, withdrew his resignation, upon request, and was at this meeting unanimously re-elected.

Chicago

On Thursday, Sept. 4, Oriental-Hillel Lodge gave a dinner in honor of the president of the District Grand lodge, Dr. Harry A. Kraus. The lodge had as its guests the President of the Order, the local members of the General committee and the officers of the three Chicago lodges.

Judge Samuel Alschuler greeted president Harry Kraus in the name of the lodge and extended to him its congratulations.

Julius H. Meyer, Oriental-Hillel's retiring president and the incoming president, Dr. Jos. D. Wiedder, delivered addresses. Brother O. G. Finkelstein, State Deputy for Illinois, conducted the installation. The President of the Order initiated the class of candidates. It was a most enthusiastic meeting and foretold much future growth for the lodge.

Central Council's Report

The last meeting of the Central B'nai B'rith Council before the summer adjournment, held on the evening of June 26, 1919, was largely attended.

An interesting report from the Social Service Committee was presented and recommendation for the establishment of a home for boys in need of supervision was referred to the committee for consideration and report.

The committee in charge of the Boys' Summer Camp at Crystal Lake, Ill., reported that all arrangements had been completed and that the camp would open on the morning of July 1. A group of over 300 boys had been enrolled. A corps of physical instructors and boys' workers were ready to look after their needs.

A number of requests for assistance were favorably considered, and the Charity Committee was authorized to extend the required relief.

Outing at Crystal Lake

One hundred and fifty visitors were the guests of David Fish Lodge at an automobile outing to the camp at Crystal Lake. The visitors and the boys participated in the flag raising exercises, both the flag and its pole having been obtained through the efforts of the lodge members.

The daily camp routine was observed, including mess, drill, inspection, swimming and games. All the visitors expressed approbation and promised further aid. The outing was arranged by Mr. B. J. Samuels and Dr. Martin M. Ritter.

David Fish Lodge, besides the flag and flag pole, already had provided the camp with a well and financed installation of a telephone.

The newly elected officers of David Fish Lodge No. 130 were installed by the President of District Grand Lodge No. 6, Dr. Harry A. Kraus, at the first fall meeting, held Monday evening, Sept. 15. Brother Harry Okin, recently returned from France, recounted many interesting experiences while serving as a lieutenant in the U. S. Infantry.

San Francisco

Julian Pinto, who recently secured his discharge from the army, has been elected recording and corresponding secretary of Ophir Lodge, No. 2.

An attractive program was presented at the meeting on Monday evening, July 14, in the B'nai B'rith Hall.

Rabbi Harvey B. Franklin, of Oakland, addressed the members Monday evening, June 16.

To keep its members in closer touch with its activities the lodge has begun the publication of a small monthly bulletin, detailing the programs of the various meetings and other matters of interest.

Grabfelder is Feted at Banquet

President of National Jewish Hospital Entertained on the Occasion of His 75th Birthday; Silver Loving Cup is Presented by Patients

BROTHER Samuel Grabfelder, president of the National Jewish Hospital for Consumptives at Denver, Colo., was tendered a dinner by many men and women of prominence at the Breakers Hotel, Atlantic City, N. J., Sept. 2, in commemoration of his 75th birthday. Rabbi William S. Friedman of Denver, who is closely identified with the work of the hospital, presided. Addresses were delivered by Benj. Altheimer of New York City, treasurer of the hospital, and Sidney G. Kusworm of Dayton, Ohio, president of District Grand Lodge No. 2.

Hundreds of telegrams of congratulations were read. The superintendent of the hospital, Mrs. S. Pisko, presented to Brother Grabfelder in behalf of the patients a silver loving cup and also a set of resolutions thanking him for his splendid efforts in the hospital's behalf, the resolutions being signed by each of the patients.

The board of directors and trustees of the hospital presented Brother Grabfelder with a painting of himself.

At the same time this dinner was being given at Atlantic City, another dinner was in progress at Denver in honor of his birthday, and telephone greetings passed between the two cities.

Brother Grabfelder has been a tremendous inspiration to all of his fellow-workers interested in the National Jewish Hospital.

Many of those present at the banquet in Atlantic City recalled the day of dedication in 1899 when Brother Grabfelder opened the doors of the institution with the words, "I herewith dedicate this building to suffering humanity and pray that its doors may never again be closed while there is need for it."

HIS BIRTHDAY CELEBRATED

Brother Samuel Grabfelder, president of the National Jewish Hospital for Consumptives to whom the patients paid a tribute

Brother Grabfelder has given considerable time and much money to the hospital. The Medical building and the Administration building are monuments of his generosity.

Portland, Ore.

Milton Meyer, president of District Grand lodge No. 4, Mrs. Meyer, Edgar Levey, grand orator of the district, and Mrs. Levey arrived in Portland Sunday morning, Aug. 31, on an official visit to Portland lodge and Portland auxiliary.

On Monday evening, a banquet was given in honor of the visitors, followed by dancing. Addresses were made by President Milton Meyer, Grand Orator Levey, Rabbi Jonah B. Wise and D. Solis Cohen. The Hon. Ben Selling presided. A luncheon was held after which the visiting ladies were entertained at theater by the officers of the Portland auxiliary.

On Tuesday evening the first meetings of the season were held by the lodge and auxiliary in the B'nai B'rith building. The lodge initiated a large class of candidates and a joint session of the organiations was held, lasting until midnight, when the visiting Grand lodge officers left for Seattle.

Colonel Harris Weinstock, of San Francisco, state market commissioner of California, was honored at a luncheon given in the rose room of the Benson hotel.

Colonel Weinstock spoke on "Pogroms and the Jewish Problem in Europe." In the evening he addressed the Portland lodge and the Portland auxiliary on "The League of Nations."

The committee which arranged the B'nai B'rith kiddies' day has made public the following:

"We wish to express our gratitude to those who contributed so liberally in refreshments and prizes.

"We also feel grateful to those who furnished machines and, last but not least, to David E. Cohen, manager of The Jewish Tribune, for the publicity given us.

"We had several hundred well-behaved children.

"At 4:30, when they were tired from play and filled to the brim with goodies, the automobiles proceeded homeward, most of the children promising when they grow up to become staunch supporters of the Order of B'nai B'rith and when they own automobiles to return the compliments."

Forest City, Ark.

Forest City, Ark., was the scene of the sixth annual picnic of Barnet Lodge No. 754 on Sunday, June 29. A very interesting program was arranged for the occasion and a large attendance was reported. Visitors from Little Rock, Cotton Plant, Wynne, Marianna, Helena, Harrisburg and Memphis, were present.

Credit for the outing's success must be given to Brother L. Barnett, secretary of the lodge.

Barnet Lodge comprises citizens of a number of communities. To stimulate interest, meetings were held in different towns from which the members were gathered. These meetings have been instrumental in effecting a most harmonious relationship.

Los Angeles

The last joint meeting of Los Angeles Lodge No. 487 and its Ladies' Auxiliary was held June 14, 1919. Marco Newmark presided in the absence of President Louis M. Cole. Charles Leonard had charge of the program.

The principal speaker was H. H. Harris, Los Angeles attorney, who recently returned from France, where he was attached to the general staff. He gave a "close-up" view of war conditions.

Others taking part in the program were Miss Dorris Lane, Miss Rose Friedman and Little Miss Hilda Jacobson, who gave a charming butterfly dance.

Letters were read from Grand President Milton Meyer and his associates, thanking the lodges for courtesies shown the grand officers in their recent visit here.

The last meeting of the season by the lodge itself was held Tuesday evening, June 24.

President Cole, who had just returned from an extended Eastern trip, was given a royal welcome.

An official dispensation was received permitting the lodge to consider July and August vacation months if the officers were empowered to act in case of emergency.

Dr. Louis Reynolds discussed the Polish pogroms. He urged concerted action by all Jews in this country.

Following the business session refreshments were served. Six candidates were initiated.

While no official action has been taken rumors were heard of a new building which is being planned for the lodge.

SIDNEY GERSON, Sec'y.

New York City

President Chas. H. Shapiro, Past President Morris P. Davidson and Louis Osterweis, chairman of the Intellectual Advancement committee, representing District Grand Lodge No. 1, and Charles Hartman, representing the Executive Committee, took part in the installation of Progressive Lodge No. 841 at New York City. On Thursday, July 10, a special delegation from Henry Jones Lebanon Lodge No. 79 extended greetings to the new lodge. Addresses were made by the visiting officers of the Grand Lodge, by Brother Hartman and by Brother Samuel Dorf, Grand Master of the Order B'rith Abraham, a member of the new lodge. The meeting was followed by a dance.

Chananiah Lodge No. 165 has organized a degree team, which at a meeting held Sunday, Sept. 7, initiated four members. The lodge reports that it has never held a meeting without initiations. It also publishes a paper, "The Chananiah Live Topics," edited by Brother Jacob Lieberman.

Brother Victor Freitag, a former president and member for more than forty years, has been taken by death.

Detroit

A well attended meeting of Pisgah Lodge, No. 34, was held in the club rooms on June 15 witnessing the initiation of a class of candidates. The degree work was performed in a most impressive manner by the lodge special team.

A departure from the usual procedure was made when the initiation ceremonies were conducted at the beginning of the meeting, thus affording the new members an opportunity to observe the method of carrying on business in the lodge.

At the conclusion of the regular meeting, Mr. I. George Dobsevage, general secretary of the Jewish Publications Society of America, spoke on the subject "The Romance of Jewish Literature."

Holyoke, Mass.

Eleven candidates were initiated by the Springfield Degree team at a meeting of Holyoke Lodge No. 728 on June 28.

Have You?

Have you subscribed to the B'nai B'rith Loan Fund for the Relief of War-Stricken Members? It is a matter of personal importance to every brother of the Order in America.

Vancouver, B. C.

On Lag B'Omar, May 18, at 11 a. m. twenty members of Samuel Lodge drove up to the Vancouver Hebrew School and took the children for an outing around the Marine drive. After two hours in the automobiles the kiddies were taken to the picnic grounds and served with refreshments. Brother C. A. Press, principal of the school, explained to them the meaning of Lag B'Omar, relating the story of Rabbi Akiba and his pupils. The kiddies enjoyed the treat thoroughly.

Due to its great success and the generous response of members who loaned their machines, Brother A. Wiener, secretary, has decided to make the affair an annual one.

The lodge gave a banquet and ball on the evening of June 5 for members, visiting brothers and their ladies.

The banquet resembled a family dinner, and for that spirit of good-fellowship and fraternity, much credit is due the entertainment committee.

New Haven, Conn.

The first fall meeting of Horeb Lodge No. 25 was held Sunday evening, Sept. 14. The following speakers were on the program: Chas. H. Shapiro, President of District Grand Lodge No. 1; Morris D. Saxe, of New Britain; Nester Dreyfus, of New London; S. Wagner of Stamford, M. A. Hartsall, of Hartford; Benj. Cashman, of Hartford; H. J. Weissman, of Waterbury; Samuel Campner, of New Haven; Maximilian Stein, of Bridgeport; President P. S. Silbert, of Springfield Lodge, and Dr. Myron Wessler, vice-president.

From the enthusiasm displayed, it was evident Horeb Lodge will soon reach its goal of 1,000 members.

"Pogroms, Poland and Publicity" were discussed by Filbert L. Rosenstein of Patterson, N. J., at an unusually well-attended open meeting, Sunday evening, June 22.

The lodge, by asking each of its 800 members to give 50 cents, was able to donate $400 to the New Haven Hospital drive, conducted by Brother Col. I. M. Ullman.

The tax of 50 cents will assist three charitable organizations: The New Haven Hospital, the New Haven Dispensary and the Nurses' Training School.

President Charles H. Shapiro of the district and Myron Sulzberger of New York, gave two splendid "pep" talks. Community singing led by George Greenspun, the Y. M. H. A. Orchestra conducted by Frank E. Kipperman of New Haven and Julius H. Moss, of New York, and trench songs by Corporal Isadore H. Hurowitz furnished the program.

In Jerusalem

In Jerusalem the most important and interesting convention since Palestine has been freed from the rule of the Turks, opened in the Auditorium of the Yeshiba Mah Sherim. Almost a hundred delegates attended the first conclave of the Mizrachi. They represented the cities and colonies of Ifu, Taifaz, Tabrith, Hebron, Rashun, Haifa and others. Delegates also came from Damascus, Cairo, Salonica, and other more distant centers where the Mizracht ideas have recently gained headway.

Rabbi Judah L. Fischman, who was elected chairman, opened the convention with an inspiring address. The chief rabbi of Palestine made an appeal that the Mizrachi appoint rabbis for the colonies and towns where they are needed. Much space is being given in the two daily Hebrew papers to the accounts of the convention, which is considered an event of deep significance, both historically and for the effect which it will have toward advancing the occupation of the country.

High Tribute to Roumanian Lodge

Worker for Joint Distribution Committee for Relief of Jewish War Sufferers Describes the Feeding of 2,500 Persons Daily at Order's Canteen

THE following copy of an original report sent to the Joint Distribution Committee for the relief of Jewish war sufferers by Miss Hetty Goldman, a representative at Bucharest, Roumania, details the splendid work done by members of the B'nai B'rith there. It is doubly gratifying: in the first place, because it shows the effectiveness of the Order in relieving distress; in the second place, because it demonstrates that, despite the difficulties of our brethren in Roumania—their persecutions and the reactionary attitude of the government, among other things—they remained faithfully in full to the principles of our organization.

Miss Goldman's report:

The activities of the B'nai B'rith Lodge are carried on in a particularly intelligent and modern way. In fact, most of the constructive charity is either maintained or initiated by them and their President, Dr. Bauberger, was very helpful to me personally. They have organized a popular canteen where soup is daily given gratis to about 2,500 people. I visited it one day and saw as ragged and emaciated a group as I have ever seen anywhere. Another canteen is run for the poor Jewish students of the university who are not admitted to the Rumanian student canteens. There an excellent three-course meal is served for which they pay from 5 to 2.50 lei, according to their means. About 20 per cent of the students are getting their meals on credit and are supposed to repay when they are established in their professions. This canteen feeds about 115 students a day at a cost of about 10 to 12 francs a meal.

The Lodge also provides vacations for 120 school children annually, distributes bread and jam every morning to about 1,000 school children, and is now planning to open a disinfecting plant and a creche. The latter is greatly needed as the army is not yet demobilized and many women could be made self-supporting if relieved of the care during the day of their young children. They also gave away 500,000 kilos of wood to the poor during the past winter. In addition to this work the lodge is running a very successful employment bureau and has started seven co-operative societies which are intended to take in gradually all of the Jewish population. They are beginning with the people of means and admitting later on all who are able to pay the sum of 50 francs whether in one payment or gradually. All profits above its philanthropic and cultural work.

Americanization

CHARLES H. SHAPIRO, president of District Grand Lodge No. 1, spoke at a public meeting under the auspices of the B'nai B'rith at Institutional Synagog, New York City, on the second anniversary of the entry of the United States into the war. His subject was "Americanization," and, in part, he said:

I bring you greetings today from old New England. I say old New England advisedly, for only within the past few days has old New England become new New England to us. There were days in its early history when the first settlers who came across the great ocean, after building their homes, their churches and school houses, set about to lay the foundations of a new nation. History tells us that though they came to this country to seek for themselves freedom of religious worship, they soon forgot what they came here for, and were not as tolerant to others who sought to live in their midst. That fact, as told in history, I am glad to say, is a fallacy. The Pilgrim Fathers were not imbued with that idea at all. They were obsessed, so to speak, with the idea that their religion was the only religion and those who would not partake of the blessings which they had to offer, were ungrateful and did not comprehend or appreciate the good things in store for them.

Then again, in the state from which I come—Connecticut—history records that along in 1668 a Jew was permitted to sojourn for only forty-eight hours in the City of Hartford. He was not then privileged to reside, let alone enjoy political rights, even in that great state which gave to the world the first written constitution. So the Jew of those days was between the upper and nether millstone, until Roger Williams, in another New England state, opened the gate and welcomed him. The early New Englanders could never understand why the Jew could not be won over to their religion and so perchance felt him unworthy as a neighbor.

How did the Jew take that? Did he resent it? Did he do anything which might cause them to feel that he would make war upon them for their attitude? No, he dealt kindly towards them because in that very New England, a few miles from where I live, the first Jew to hold office in this country—Mordecai Marks—in 1728 a members of the Colonial Legislature, distributed a good part of his worldly means among Christian charities. No Jews were there to speak of at the time of his death.

So you see the Jew gave to his Christian neighbors an example of charity and justice. And within the past few days in old New England, they have given us to understand that they have seen the good that we have tried to do by removing the last obstacle of discrimination in the great State of New Hampshire, where for many years, as you know, there was some difficulty in the summer resorts, in hotels and other public places on account of the Jewish people coming there during the hot months, from the cities. Now in old New England, no longer do we find this discrimination, for in every state a law appears on the statute books, thanks to the efforts of the B'nai B'rith, which has removed the last vestige of discrimination.

We feel, assembled here today on this great anniversary, that we are pledging ourselves anew to the great work which we have before us in this country. The B'nai B'rith from its earliest days has been the pioneer of Americanism. You will find that in the last century the great Jews of our country, in civic, military, political, and social spheres and in the world of science, in the arts and professions, in manufacturing and in the trades, were members of the B'nai B'rith and Americanism, and its highest ideals were woven into the very fabric of our teachings everywhere.

In every lodge room we have a flag—the flag which to us means a new country, new privileges and a better opportunity to worship God than those of us who were born abroad had in the land from which we came. There are greater opportunities here for education; greater opportunities for advancement, socially, professionally and otherwise.

Those who first settled here had many serious problems confronting them. The poor today are much better off than the rich were one hundred years ago. The difficulty with us is that we have been thinking in terms of riches, in terms of bigness. We now have large cities, large railroads, large institutions, but we did not always stop to think about them before, whether they are beautiful, whether they are sound, whether they are worthy—bigness alone appealed to us. Our eyes are open now and we are looking at it from another standpoint, that of betterment in an artistic, in a civic and in a philanthropic way.

This country is the most wonderful country in the world, not only because of the people that go to make it up, but because it has all the advantages and can do even better for those who settle here than any country on any other continent. Just stop to think of the vast expanse of the United States of America, of which today, as a citizen, I have the honor to speak, and it is an honor to be a citizen of such a country. It has forests broader than many countries in Europe, it has mountains greater than the Alps, laden with gold and silver, with copper and lead, oil and gas, and more than all, millions of acres of fertile fields growing corn and wheat and grain. It has, moreover, those great opportunities extended to every one, the opportunity for unlimited education, the opportunity for unlimited suffrage.

Christian Aid

Dr. David S. Blondheim relates the following reminiscence of the Great War: Senior Chaplain G. Clark Kennedy was in service in the Toul sector a year ago when Jewish soldiers belonging to the British army passed through. They expressed a desire for religious services, but neither they nor the chaplain had any Jewish prayer books. Chaplain Kennedy started on a prayerbook hunt, and he finally located a single copy of "Le Tefila du Soldat," the prayer book of the French Jewish soldiers. He made an English translation and had it typewritten. Twenty Jewish boys gathered about the Protestant chaplain on that Sabbath reading their prayers from the typewritten version.

Enterprise

Two B'nai B'rith lodges have taken steps to enlarge their usefulness.

Portland lodge has voted to establish a lecture bureau, whose representatives will tour the state, speaking authoritatively on Jewish subjects.

The Cleveland lodge has instituted a membership campaign, funds from which will be employed to extend the existing facilities.

In its appeal for co-operation, the lodge sets forth:

"To make the campaign a success the energy of everyone connected with the B'nai B'rith is needed. Onlookers represent an interesting phenomena, but, after all, it is the energy expended that accomplishes the task in hand.

"Let us all get on the stage and take an active part in the drama that will make for our communal betterment."

A Newcomer

The Sinai league of London, which aims to preserve and promote traditional Judaism among young Jewish men and women, announces the publication of a new periodical, The Sinaist, which A. M. Adler, chairman of the league, claims to be the only one of its kind in the English tongue.

narrow path of virtue, that is what counts in the eyes of Judaism. The synagogue remains, as in the days of Philo and Josephus, a training school in virtue. And Judaism is very much alive as a protestant against the atheism and pluralism and the revived paganism of latter-days.

Much as the builders of Zion may refuse to admit, the new chapter that is opening up in Jewish history is a new chapter in Judaism. But Judaism will remain a formidable element in the dispersion alike. It has a mission to fulfill, to bridge over the differences that rend human society, to recall man to social obligation over against the over-emphasis of the individual salvation, to heal the ravages which materialistic science has wrought in mankind, to proclaim the sovereignty of God and conscience, to bring back human kind to the service of truth.

Cling to Ancient Truths

Judaism has all these centuries been readjusting itself. At times the adjustment was conceived in giving way to the subtle influences from without. That was a near-truth. The full truth is that Judaism must discard much that is irrelevant, antiquated, obsolete, anachronistic. But its fundamental truth it will not lightly cast overboard. That would be the counsel of the opportunist and bad pilotship. Judaism must be so readjusted as to emphasize its ancient truths against all the glittering errors of modern life.

The true Jew cannot be a modernist. Judaism must be anchored in the past or it will founder. And there is a third party which is very much alive to the potencies and destinies not of a reformed but of a rejuvenated Judaism, which today is called upon to stand guard over the destinies of a bankrupt humanity, bankrupt spiritually quite as much as economically. The Jewish saint, very much unlike the Christian monk and Mohammedan Desvish, is needed in the world, for though transcending the secular he remains in touch with human life and by his piety of learning and doing reinvests it with dignity and religious seriousness.

Life is a very serious task, that is the supreme message of Judaism in all its phases.

Anniversary

Memphis Lodge No. 35, Independent Order of B'nai B'rith is 60 years old, and preparations are under way to celebrate the event during the latter part of October.

The lodge was really organized on June 9, 1859, but in order that the anniversary could be commemorated when the weather was not so inclement, the event was deferred.

The lodge is a part of District Grand Lodge No. 7, I. O. B. B., comprising Tennessee, Mississippi, Arkansas, Louisiana, Texas, Alabama, Oklahoma and Florida, and is not only the oldest B'nai B'rith lodge in the district, but is the oldest in the south.

Samuel Schloss, of Memphis, is the only living charter member. Milton B. Roso is the present president and the other officers are: Vice-president, Clarence S. Wurtzburger; secretary, H. Henochsberg; warden, Harry Bearman; guardian, Joseph Krivcher; treasurer, Herman Bluthenthal; trustees, Samuel Schloss, S. L. Lee, Charles J. Hasse.

It is significant that at the same time the Christian Socialist Party publishes an appeal in the American Catholic press against the Peace Treaty in which the Jews are not mentioned.

The demoralization of public opinion is again shown in the clerical press of Tyrol, where the summer guests, in former years welcome as a source of income, are attacked as Jewish war profiteers while, at the same time, children underfed and stunted in their growth, often tubercular, are sent to Switzerland for recuperation, and the mortality of the Vienna Jews is demonstrated in the following telling figures: 1913, 2,501; 1914, 2,709; 1915, 3,392; 1916, 3,425; 1917 (Jan.-April), 1,570.

Similarly sad is the picture presented by internal conditions. The list of withdrawals from the congregation, which since 1900 averaged 500 to 600, rose during the first half year of 1919 to 628. We find in this list prominent aristocratic names whose forebears were among the leaders in Jewish communal life, like von Schey, von Kuh, the latter descendants of Rabbi S. L. Rappoport of Prague and others.

The Eagle's Other Head

Conditions in Hungary, if the reports do not greatly exaggerate, are approaching those of Ukraine and Poland. Pillage, murderous assaults and rape are of daily occurrence since the communists government was overthrown, and a Rumanian army of occupation pretends to establish order, evidently the order of Rumania.

An appeal of an organization, calling itself "Hungary Awakening," demands extermination of the Jewish race in the interest of the world's peace. The students in the university and in the polytechnic of Budapest insist on the expulsion of all Jewish students, and the dean appealed to the latter to stay away from the lectures until peace shall be restored, to which the Jewish professors replied with the threat of a strike. One of the latter, Professor Gross, was so severely beaten by students, who are members of the newly founded "Christian National Party," that he had to be taken to the hospital.

The leader of this party is Premier Friedrich, on whom the Allies' military commissions relied to put up a government which should re-establish order after the chaos of the soviet government of Bela Kun. The latter according to "Bloch's (formerly Oesterreichische), Wochenschrift" is not a Jew, nor is, according to the same source, Tibor Szamuely, whom the Associated Press on the occasion of his suicide advertised as a Jew, a Jew by descent.

The Oppressed as Oppressors.

If in the Magyar section of Hungary, the Jews, who for the most part were strong supporters of the Magyar element, are the victims of national chauvinism, one can not wonder at similar, though evidently much milder persecutions, in the Slovak sections, where the Jews had for the last half century been on the side of the Magyars. Srobar, minister for Slovakia, is stirring up the population by attacks on the Jews as profiteers and as a disloyal element.

In the former Austrian section of Cecho-Slovakia the Jews are equally placed in a difficult position. One-third of the population of the former Austrian kingdom of Bohemia is German, the Germans living in a compact territory, and bitterly resenting the Slavic rule which is being imposed on them by the Treaty of Paris. The Jews have therefore formed Jewish National Councils, which are not recognized by the government which demands that they register either as Germans or as Cechs. They are consequently boycotted by one or the other party in turn.

President Masaryk, about whose sincerity there can not be the slightest doubt, promised protection, but even his popularity is not strong enough to check the racial chauvinism. The only serious case of excesses occurred in Holleschau, an old pogrom center, known in Jewish history as the place where Shabbetai Kohen (Schach), the famous glossarist of the Shulhan Aruk officiated in the seventeenth century. There, immediately upon the declaration of the independent Zecho-Slovak republic, riots occurred which resulted in the death of one and in the wounding of several Jews (November, 1918). The new republic proved its determination to preserve order by prompt trial of the guilty parties, thirteen of whom were sentenced to terms of imprisonment ranging from one to five years.

Kyffhaeuser's Dream.

The old German legent of Kaiser Barbarossa, dozing in the Kyffhaeuser and waiting for the call when he shall rule the Holy Roman Empire, is satirized in Heine's verse:

> "Wir wollen ein neues bauen,
> "Doch fehlt dazu das Beste,
> "Die Marmorsteine, die Quadern
> "Und die gekroenten Gaeste."

Prince Henry, the ex-kaiser's brother, is willing to try again. From his exile he issued a manifesto to the German people on his august brother's birthday (Jan. 27), asking them to join in the restitution of the dynasties and the removal of Semitic influences in commerce, industry and politics. So far response came only from the junker party which met in Potsdam where its members raised $40,000 to begin a campaign for the restitution of the good olden times.

In their antisemitic aims they evidently have sympathizers outside of the monarchial party, for Berlin is filled with posters and handbills, some of them imported from Cecho-Slovakia and Poland, demanding that the German people shake off the Jewish yoke. A prize is offered for the best popular essay which would show the pernicious influence of socialism as handmaid of Semitic world-rule. The offer is made by the "Gau Westmark" of the "Deutsch-Voelkische Bund." The nomenclature strongly reminds us of similar literature after Waterloo.

It is said, however, that Noske's revolutionary army is also infected with antisemitism, that its members stop trains, arrest without reason Jewish passengers and distribute antisemitic literature. Excesses against the Jews were only reported once from Berlin in the quarter where Jewish small shopkeepers have their home, the Kurfuerstendamm. The extent of the excesses is not known. It is significant that the German Odd Fellows published a pamphlet, "Von der Verjudung des Deutschen Volkes."

Justice requires to state that, on the other hand, the German Grand Lodge of Freemasons, though this organization, as far as we know, excluded the Jews, issued a statement declaring in view of attacks on the Jews, "that the fundaments of our order, serving the highest ideals of humanity, remain unshaken." It is equally important, though in line with the traditional policy of the "Centrum" (the Catholic party of the Reichstag), that its leader, Erzberger, now a figure of national prominence, sent out an appeal against pogroms. In contrast with this statement is the expulsion of Austrian Jews from Upper Silesia, reported in an interpellation which was introduced into the Reichstag by Scheidemann—a fact doubly surprising in view of the imminent plebiscite at which Jews surely will not express a preference for Polish rule by pograms.

The contradictory and incomplete nature of our reports is again illustrated by the announcement of a bill which will grant to Polish Jews, for a long time residents of Germany, the right of naturalization. The significance lies in the fact that the opposite policy, in force since 1885, was the only tangible concession made to the antisemites clamoring for the repeal of the constitutional equality of the Jews.

The critical condition of public affairs is responsible for the very quiet celebration of an important event in the inner life of German Judaism, the fiftieth anniversary of the "Gemeindebund," founded July 29, 1869. The organization published its "Mitteilungen," No. 90, in which various important problems which the organization has to face, like woman's suffrage and separation of state and church, are discussed. Equally important is the appeal of District Grand Lodge No. 8, I. O. B. B., which calls for new activity on the basis of Benevolence, Brotherly Love and Harmony, and which surely will find a ready response.

Finally, as a sign of new times, the fact that the Jew, Lande, is "Regierungspraesident" in Duesseldorf, deserves to be chronicled. The administrative branch of the government has heretofore kept Jews jealously out.

The Case of the Victor.

A defeated nation always needs a scapegoat, but in our present situation, whether it be due to the danger lying in social unrest or to any other cause, both sides seem to select the Jew for his traditional role in vicarious atonement. The growth of British antisemitism is the most discouraging sign of the times. In the debates on Bolshevism in the House of Commons it is easily noticeable that the government is intent on holding the Jews chiefly responsible for this doctrine. Replies given to the antisemitically tinged inquiries by Raper as to those presented by the staunch advocate of the Jews, Colonel Wedgwood, show this object plainly. The Russian Bolsheviki are all Jews, they persecute and murder priests, scoff at the ikons, and are pro-German.

The London press falls in line. The Daily Graphic reports that in the Bolshevist meetings in London Yiddish is exclusively spoken. The Northcliffe papers, especially the Morning Post, indulge in invectives which are replicas of Stoecker's Staatsbuergerzeitung. There is, if we believe this paper, a Jewish world conspiracy, headed by the Italian general, Segre, United States Ambassador Morris and Justice Brandeis, to thwart Britain's policy unter the disguise of Zionism.

The mission of Sir Stuart Samuel is attacked because he is a corrupt politician whose appointment will justly be resented by the Poles. The Jewish Chronicle comes in for severe denunciation for having—before the declaration of the war—opposed war. The next thing that we may anticipate will be the proof that the Jews are responsible for the railroad strike, being the controlling force in the half million railroad workers.

A valuable lesson may be learned from a report of Robert O. Rohme, an Austrian prisoner of war, who recently returned from a camp on the Isle of Man. He complains that the British Jews, different from Catholics, kept studiously away from their interned coreligionists, and that the only religious service which they had, held by the Rev. Levy, consisted in the glorification of British imperialism.

Just now the British Jews resent bitterly as an insult the conferring of knighthood on one, Leon Levison, for charitable activity on behalf of Polish Jewish war sufferers. The "reverend gentleman" is a professional Meshummed of the regulation type, and a professional charity monger whose methods were seriously questioned by Christians, though their mercenary character was finally covered with the cloak of Christian charity.

Personal Notes.

Lovers of Jewish literature will be glad to learn that the rumor which had it that the stereotypes of Biblical and Talmudic literature, issued by the famous publishing house of Romm, in Wilna, were destroyed, is not quite true. The plates were mostly carried off by the retreating Russian army, but the matrices are all intact and kept in a fireproof building according to a report in the "Buchhaendler Boersenblatt," just to hand.

A sad counterpart is the report that the Odessa Hebrew authors, supposed to have become very prosperous during the war, Nahman Bialyk among them, are in great distress. A remarkable sign of the change of times is the report of a new Yiddish daily in Warsaw, called "Letztes Najes," which appears on Sabbath. The rabbis declared a boycott against it.

Again a case of remarkable liberalism on the part of a Polish rabbi is reported by a German deaconess who was in charge of a military hospital near Kovno, located in the synagog. She reports that the rabbi visited the hospital regularly and had her dictate to him the Lord's Prayer, which he transcribed in Yiddish so that in the absence of a Christian chaplain he could recite it with the dying soldiers.

Austrian papers, just received, inform us that Victor Adler, the socialist leader who died on the day when the Austrian republic was proclaimed, was an unattached Catholic. He had been baptized with his parents by the Pope in Rome on Yom Kippur. The father had evidently dreamed of another career for his son than that of a socialist agitator.

The dead of the last moth include Siegmund Maybaum, rabbi of Berlin, a prominent representative of the liberal school, born in Miskolez, Hungary, in 1844, and Bergson, president of the Warsaw Congregation, an uncle of the famous French philosopher, Henri Bergson.

The name Bergson, originally Berekson, is derived from the philosopher's grandfather, Berek, whose father, Shmuel Zbitweker, is a famous character in Hasidic legend. By sacrificing his fortune he saved the Jews of Praga when the Cossacks captured the city in 1794. Some Hasidic rabbi, living at a great distance from Warsaw, had a vision of Shmuel's death, and said to his followers: "At this very moment is Shmuel Zbitkewer with his heavy boots being ushered into the Gan Eden."

His great grandson, probably with patent leather shoes, was ushered into the "Academie Francaise" as the first Jew, Jan. 24, 1918. He will be 60 years old on Oct. 18. Let us hope that "ueber hundert Jahr" he will find his great grandfather in Gan Eden.

In Czecho-Slovakia

Prague advices relate that "The Blue Star" is the name of a new organization which is said to have as it chief purpose the annihilation of all the Jews in the country by means of wholesale murder. It is generally reported that the new organization is planning to begin pogrom activities during the Jewish holy days.

An order to suppress such a course on the part of the anti-Semitic forces has been issued by the government.

Supreme Sacrifice

Among the details which are gradually reaching Copenhagen concerning the recent pogrom in Novgorod-Volinsk, one story has come through which is worthy of being inscribed in the annals of Jewish martyrdom. It tells how Rabbi Yehusha Kitman lost his own life to save the lives of thirty-seven Jews whom he had hidden in the cellar of his home to protect them from the hooligans.

After stripping his home, the pogromists informed Rabbi Kitman that they would spare his life on condition that he give them the key to the celler. His reply was: "Yehusha Kitman would rather die than allow thirty-seven Jews to be slaughtered."

Sketches of Modern History

From July Revolution (1830) to February Revolution (1848)

IN which is described the attempt of Frederick William IV to revive romanticism in the government of Prussia—a course which made of the Jews a company of outlaws, whose reformation was mildly to be sought.

By Dr. GOTTHARD DEUTSCH

THE head of any monarchial organization from a village mayor to the pope of Rome, entering upon his office, will be guided by the record of his predecessor. He will either be a Jeroboam, working for decentralization of worship against Solomon's principles of centralization, or he will be a Rohoboam working upon his father's lines but trying to show that his little finger is thicker than his father's loin.

Frederick William IV. of Prussia (1840-1861) was a Rohoboam. He is splendidly characterized by David Friedrich Strauss (1808-1874) in the brilliant satire, ''Der Romantiker auf dem Throne der Caesaren oder Julian der Abtruennige, 1847.''

Strauss, the merciless critic of the New Testament, whose ''Life of Jesus'' (1835) made the young author an international celebrity, showed under the disguise of a biography of Emperor Julian (361-363) the futility of Frederick William's attempt to resuscitate the medieval romanticism of a state based on the principle of division by classes which the king emphasized on has ascent to the throne by receiving the homage of the population, divided into high nobility, clergy, nobles, burghers and peasants.

Jews as Aliens

The Jews in such a state were a group of outlaws whom a mild government tried to reform. Such a government could not be representative. It was based on the will of Providence which placed God's annointed at the head, willing to listen to the wishes of his children, though not bound to comply with them.

Such a system was bound up with the idea of a state's church. The War of Thirty Years (1618-1648) had definitely disposed of the strict denominational interpretation of the state's church. Prussia had at various times, and especially after the Vienna congress, received such a large and compact Catholic population that the ''Evangelical Truth'' could no more be part of the Constitution, but the mystically vague phrase of the ''Christian State'' was a convenient substitute for the state's church.

It is like a prank of history that this phrase should have found in a converted Jew, Friedrich Julius Stahl (1802-1861) its most vigorous expounder, and that the Protestant neo-orthodoxy, formed in opposition to the radicalism of David Friedrich Strauss—who, by the way, was neither a Jew nor, as far as known, of the remotest Jewish descent—should have had in another Jew, August Wilhelm Neander, originally David Mendel, (1789-1850) a respected leader.

Jews as Ecclesiastics

One of the ''wandering anecdotes'' told occasionally of the Abbes Lemanne, Ratisbonne, Bernard Bauer and probably of others, reports that a Catholic prelate said to one of them tauntingly: ''A wonderful people these Jews are. No sooner does one of them become converted than he becomes a monsignore.'' To which the Jew reparteed: ''The first one who was baptized became even a member of the Trinity.''

The Talmud (Yer. Shekalim, 45d) says already: ''The Jews are a many-sided people. They are asked to contribute to the building of the sanctuary and they give, they are asked to contribute to the golden calf and they give too.'' Our latest experience with Lord Reading, the Imperialist, and Trotzky, the Bolshevist, is another proof of this statement.

Both, Neander and Stahl were favorites of King Frederick William. For such acquisitions the Jews had been preserved in his opinion. One of the earliest schemes of his government was the conversion of the Jews. The method by which he expected to accomplish it shows what a queer character he was.

According to the Sunday school conception of church history, which Neander propped up with his profound, though biased, scholarship, Christianity began in Jerusalem where the apostles, with proper consideration of the conservative habits of the people, established a Judaeo-Christian church. This by and by shed the Jewish customs and by the accession of converts from the Gentile world became the nucleus of the true Christian church. This policy was to be repeated.

The Protestant Bishopric of Jerusalem

The king entered into an agreement with the Anglican church, according to which the Prussian ''Landeskirche'' and the Established Church of England should alternately appoint a Protestant bishop of Jerusalem who would preside over this supposed Apostolic church, and in the course of a few years realize the Apostolic promise that all Israel shall be saved.

The first bishop so appointed was Michael Solomon Alexander (1799-1845), a shohet from Schoenlanke in Prussian Poland, who had served a congregation in England, and having lost his position, found, like many before and after him, a job in the Mission to the Jews from which he graduated to become the first Protestant bishop of Jerusalem, where he was solemnly installed, Jan. 21, 1842.

It was an ill-starred adventure. Michael Solomon died in the desert on the Egyptian frontier in 1845, and according to reliable information, there are still some Jews in Jerusalem whose heart is as hardened as was that of their grandfathers and great grandfathers eighty years ago. The agreement between Prussia and Great Britain, which never worked well, was finally cancelled in 1885.

Liberals Are Expectant

The first acts of the new king were eagerly looked for, not only by the Jews but by the entire liberal element of the country, which was impatient with the reactionary policy of his predecessor. Among the liberals of the old type, who, under Stein and Hardenberg, the authors of the Jewish emancipation law of 1812, had resurrected the Prussian state, was Heinrich Theodor von Schoen, the Oberpraesident (governor) of East Prussia, whose advice for a representative form of government was strongly supported by the Jewish physician of Koenigsberg, Johann Jacoby (1805-1877), a prominent figure in the fight for Jewish emancipation.

Jacoby published a pamphlet, entitled ''Vier-Fragen'' in which he formulated the liberal program. He was arrested, sentenced to two and a half years in jail, but afterwards upon appeal discharged. Jacoby, who had previously defended the Jews against the attacks of Karl Streckfuss mentioned in the last article deserves to be commemorated at this moment as a great statesman.

A Prophet Without Honor

He had the courage, in the midst of the wild national excitement over the victory of 1870, to protest against the the annexation of Alsace-Lorraine without consulting the wishes of the population, and met with the most convenient refutation of an inconvenient political wisdom. He was put in jail. Many Germans, and especally the citizens of Koenigsberg, will ask themselves today who was the better patriot and the wiser statesman, Bismarck or Jacoby?

The king's opposition to all forms of parliamentary government was part of the general policy which saw in autocracy a divine institution and in the feudal state the ideal constitution. In such a state the Jews, as said before, were a colony of aliens. They soon learned it directly from his majesty's mouth.

A uniform legislation on the Jews was one of the urgent needs of political administration. The edict of March 11, 1812, which made all Jews ''Buerger unde Einlaender,'' had by subsequent interpretation been restricted to the part of Prussia for which it had been promulgated. The Prussia of 1815 was probably more than twice as large as that of 1812. All the newly acquired territories were to retain temporarily their ancient status, and so Prussia had twenty-two different Jews laws, ranging from prohibition of residence in some of the sections annexed from Hanover and Saxony, to full civic and political equality in the parts which had been French in 1814.

Reactionary Policy.

The confusion was only in the most crying needs remedied by the regulation for the province of Posen in 1833. The Jews were looking forward to the announcement of the king's views on the subject. It came in a cabinet's order, dated Dec. 13, 1841, which left no doubt as to the king's real opinion.

It declared briefly that he desired to go back of the principles of 1812, leave alone the hoped-for progress. Political rights were entirely denied to them. They were to be excluded from all public offices giving them authority over Christians, including teaching positions in universities; even military service was to be denied to them, and as compensation they should be given greater autonomy in their congregational life, while in the municipal councils they should have a proportionate representation.

The same view was maintained in the king's reply to various congregations, among which that given to the congregation of Berlin, dated May 5, 1842, and signed by the Minister von Rochow shall be quoted:

''The king with paternal kindness wishes to allay the apprehensions due to a misconception of his 'Gesichtspunkte.' The king wishes to remove the civic disabilities of the Jews, grant them autonomy through enlarged rights of their corporations, subject to the principle of the Christian state which requires—as it did from the times of Constantine—that Jews should not have authority over Christians. It was but consistent that they should be exempt from military duty which, however, would not prevent them from entering the army as volunteers.''

Blow to Jewish Hopes

The public announcement of these views was cold water on the optimistic expectations, aroused by the king's reply to the homage of the Berlin congregation on July 17, 1840, that he was ''not a believer in the blind prejudices of former centuries.'' This disappointment is plainly visible in the correspondence between the above-named Johann Jacoby and the Berlin publisher, Moritz Veit (1806-1864), also a prominent leader in Jewish affairs and afterwards, like Jacoby, a member of the diet of Prussia.

Zechariah Frankel (1801-1875), then chief rabbi of Dresden, was to be called as chief rabbi to Berlin and to become the first spiritual leader there of modern type after the office—due to the difficulty of harmonizing the opposing tendencies—had been vacant for more than 40 years. He would not leave his position, where he was recognized by the government and where he received part of his salary from public funds and go to a place where the Jewish religion was ''Privatsache.''

He wanted a call by the government which, as the law stood, was impossible. He preferred Saxony where the right of residence was limited, where it required an order by the king to compel the tailors' guild to admit a Jewish boy as apprentice, and where the Jews did not even possess that modicum of political rights, the municipal franchise, which the edict of 1812 gave to the Jews of Prussia.

Schemes of a Jewish Church

Isaac M. Jost, the historian (1793-1860) in his ''Legislative Fragen betreffend die Juden in Preussischen Staate,'' Berlin, 1842, and in the ''Nachtraege,'' published in the same year, enters into an argument with the king, disproving the latter's view that the Jews have a nationality of their own and that their religion prevents them from serving in the army and performing other public duties. He proposes in order to remove all doubts that the king appoint a Jewish consistory which would althoritatively pass on such questions.

Jost still lived in the dreams of Napoleonic imperialism, advocated by his benefactor, Israel Jacobson (1768-1828) the real originator of Napoleon's Sanhedrin (1806) and president of the consistory of Westfalia by the grace of King Jerome, king ''Morgen wieder lushtik.'' Jost and Frankel, both men of great learning and keen intellect, solve to us the question, why the victims of the Cossack massacres of the seventeenth century, and those of the petty persecutions in western Europe in later years, did not know better than to sneak from one ghetto into another or to implore their petty tyrants for another small favor.

Rabbis Were Theorists

We had no Bradfords and Robinsons, as had the Puritan. Our spiritual leaders were scholars, bookworms, without knowledge of public life. The Polish Jew has for this typo the untranslatable and expressive word ''Batlan.''

The Batlan, when told that the city is going to be besieged, says: ''What of it? Keep the big gate closed, and let them in one by one through the small gate, and put them in iron.'' Or when told that some infidels keep their stores open on the Sabbath, he says: ''What good will it do them? They cannot sell anything.''

The non-Jewish world took a stand according to its leanings. Theodore von Hippel, the author of the famous ''Aufruf an mein Volk,'' 1813, by which Frederick William III called the people to arms in the war of liberation, referred to the distinction which Jewish soldiers had won in the war, and admonished the king to fight prejudice instead of encouraging it.

Alexander von Humboldt (1769-1859) beyond doubt the greatest celebrity of Berlin and highly respected by the king in spite of his liberal views in politics and his radicalism in religion, was indignant at the proposed legislation which he considered revolting and opposed to the fundamental principles of sane politics.

Providence Interpreted

His indignation was increased when he read a Berlin correspondence, published in ''Journal des Debats'' of March 10, 1842, where the king was quoted as speaking of ''Divine Providence which had so wonderfully preserved the Jews,'' words which were in reality a repetition of the views of Pope Innocent III (1199-1216). In a letter to Count von Stolberg, Humboldt calls it a dangerous arrogance of mortal man to interpret the plans of the Almighty.

It goes without saying that the king's reactionary views found a lively echo in the tory and the pan-Germanic chauvinist circles. Strange to say, even Jewish romanticism nurtured by Hegel's philosophy, a very convenient prop for reactionary tendencies, though at the same time an incentive to radicalism, responded enthusiastically to Frederick William's reformulated medaevalism, which saw in the Jewish people a foil and a whipping boy, providentially preserved for the benefit of Christianity.

Samuel Hirsch (1815-1879), afterwards one of the leaders in liberal Judaism, both in Germany and in the United States, had just then published his scholarly ''Religionsphilosophie der Juden,'' Leipsic, 1842. Frederick William IV cabinet's order of Dec. 13, 1841, evidently came to the author's notice, when he revised his manuscript for publication or while he read the proof, and so he expressed his lively assent in an extensive footnote inserted at the end of the book, where he speaks of the Messiah idea.

Samuel Hirsch

The Jewish people, Hirsch argues, are indestructible, and in order to preserve their distinctiveness, Divine Providence kept them in a condition of political disability. It is therefore wrong on the part of the Jews to demand political equality, for this would lead to their disintegration and militate against their Divine destiny. Besides Jewish emancipation is usually coupled with a parliamentary form of government, and the latter, according to Hegel's ''Naturrecht,'' is a rebellion against the will of God and contrary to Jewish teaching.

The antisemites—the term, of course, was yet unknown, as political and religious reactionaries required no euphemism as yet—were naturally jubilant. Bettina von Arnim (1788-1859), a member of that circle of reactionaries and chauvinists always found in such a decadent epoch, as Hilaire Belloc and the Chesterton Brothers are found now in England, Leon Daudet and Maurice Donnay in France and Adolph Bartels and others in Germany, wrote her ''Dieses Buch gehoert dem Koenige,'' which was published in 1843. She could not withhold her admiration from his majesty for his ''splendid orders on the Jews.''

Goethe's Circle

Bettina von Arnim is such an interesting character, and there are so many interesting pranks of history connected with her life and her family, that I cannot help, dwelling on her story a little.

To begin with, Bettina was from Frankfort. One might say, she was born an antisemite. She was a great deal around Goethe's mother and annoyed the aged poet with her morbid lovemaking. She had a good school for training in antisemitism. She sent to the poet upon his request the recent pamphlets on the Jewish question in Frankfort (1807) when, much to the chagrin of the Frau Rat and her illustrious son, the Jews of Frankfort were given the right to sit on the benches in the park like other humans.

She was closely connected with the romantic school in German literature to which both her husband, Ludwig Achim von Arnim (1781-1831) and her brother, Clemens Brentano (1778-1842) belonged. This school advocated a national chauvinism combined with a religious romanticism in which there was no place for the Jews, as even the classicist Goethe, the hater of everything Christian, taught in his ''Wilhelm Meister.''

Social Snobbery

Ludwig von Arnim organized a ''Christian-German Club'' in Berlin, membership in which was restricted to ''reputable gentlemen, born in the Christian religion.'' What these people understood by gentlemanly conduct was illustrated by Bettina's husband when he appeared one evening in the salon of Mrs. Sarah Levy, a member of the highly respected Itzig family, and behaved in such an insulting manner that Moritz Itzig, a nephew of the lady of the house, challenged him to a duel.

Herr von Arnim refused to fight with Itzig, and the latter on the first occasion gave him a sound thrashing with a cane. The cavalier appealed to the police for protection from this ''mad Jew-boy.'' Itzig was afterwards killed in the battle of Luetzen, and Friedrich Staegemann (1763-1840), wrote a poem on the inequality of Jew and noble that will not allow a noble to fight a Jew.

Trotz diesem Spruch der edeln Sieben
Sind alle beide doch geblieben.
''Wie gieng das zu?'' Das hoeret an.
Die Kriegstrompete scholl nach hueben
und nach Drueben.
Zu Hause blieb der Edelmann,
Der Jud' ist in der Schlacht geblieben.

And now a little sequel. A nephew of Bettina, Franz Brentano (born 1838), raised in the romanticism of the family, became a Dominican friar, taught philosophy at the university of Wuerzburg, and distinguished himself as a Catholic propagandst, achieving the conversion of one of his Jewish students.

The Austrian government, eager for philosophical celebrities who were good Catholics, called Brentano to Vienna, where he became an out and out infidel. This would not have cost him his professorship, but he fell in love with a Jewish girl, the sister of his colleague, the chemist Adolf Lieben (1836-1914). According to Austrian law, he, having taken Cotholic orders, could not marry. He resigned his professorship, married at the German embassy, and the ministry of education could never appoint him again.

All this happened to a nephew of Ludwig Achim von Arnim whose collection of folkpoetry ''Wunderhorn'' contains a metric version of ''Had Gadya,'' dedicated ''fuer die Juengelcher von unseren Leut.'' May be that among these Juengelcher are grandnephews of the poet. History does indulge in queer pranks.

patrons. The existing hospital accommodation in London falls far short of the requirements of London's sick, and the Jewish hospital will undoubtedly satisfy a want.

In the changed circumstances people will support it. It is only to be hoped that the new hospital when it begins to work out its complete program will set itself a high ideal, both in its scientific activities and in its management. Let there be peace within its borders and plenty in its stores.

Fete in Peace's Honor

Peace! The celebrations were duly carried out all over the country. We thanked God for His mercies, and for the people a pageant was prepared. The victory march in London was a splendid spectacle, and many a little child who was taken to witness it will relate the experience to his children.

If only this be the last war! As Jews we wish it even more than other people, and if this was the last victory march, then, indeed, it will be truly historic.

For British Jewry it is historic also in that a Jew was prominent in the triumph. General Monash was among the distinguished men who led the Colonial troops, and one can only wish that those who in their ignorance identify Bolshevism with Jews would think a little.

General Monash has won the gratitude of his fellow countrymen, and General Monash is a Jew. It must be admitted that Bolshevism counts Jews among its leaders and among its rank and file. But it also counts non-Jews in both categories. If Bolshevism is condemned as a gospel, it is surely unjust to lay special stress on its Jewish supporters. There are those, Jews and nou-Jews alike, who believe in Bolshevism, and those, Jews and non-Jews alike, who condemn it utterly.

A Lesson in Democracy

Jews surely have as much right as non-Jews to think freely. It is one of the lessons of democracy this—to tolerate all men and all men's views. We of the Order pride ourselves on that. There is so much to do in which all may combine that, if only we did combine, the world might be a better place to live in. One cannot help recalling those verses of Robert Louis Stevenson:

There's so much good in the worst of us,
And there's so much bad in the best of us,
That it hardly behooves any of us
To talk about the rest of us.

Priest Is Honored

Fortunately goodness has not quite departed from amidst the sons of men. In Whitechapel there lives a Catholic priest, Father Wilson, and so great is his love of his fellow man that when people are in distress he helps them, asking not what their race or creed. During the war, when the air-raids distressed many citizens of London, Father Wilson comforted and helped his neighbors, among whom, of course, the Jews were very numerous.

When Jews were rendered homeless, Father Wilson housed at his own residence two or three entire Jewish families who had been rendered destitute. He had provided them with oKsher food and even gave them candles for use on the Sabbath eve.

Needless to say, this conduct engendered gratitude, and recently a presentation was made to the reverend father for his praiseworthy conduct. He was given an illuminated address and a cheque. But he refused the latter, suggesting that it should go to the funds of the London hospital.

Words of High Praise

In the address the signatories declared:

''During the thirty-three years of your ministry of St. Augustine's, Stepney, you have shown invariable kindness to your Jewish neighbors. You have made us all feel that you are our friend.

''Many of your Jewish neighbors had fled from religious persecution, and it has been a revelation to them to find a leader of a differing faith so zealous, so earnest, so sympathetic on their behalf. Your recent exertions during the war, when air-raids so grievously afflicted the district, made an everlasting impress on our hearts. You provided protection aud food to large numbers of our brethren who could lay no claim on you by religious fellowship.

''You showed them the utmost consideration and displayed a lively regard for their religious observances. You evinced no desire to proselytise, and yet you were a source of true religious comfort to all whom the recent trials disheartened or made despondent.''

Concerning Holy Days

The Tract Commission of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations and Central Conference of American Rabbis' Schools and Presidents of Colleges, enclosing copies of the Jewish calendar and asking that the programs of the institutions be arranged so as not to interfere with the observances of Jewish students. In reply many communications were received, expressing sympathy and promising co-operation with the commission's purpose.

Here are quotations from a few of the representative replies:

Yale University: ''Every possible consideration has been shown to the people of your faith in the matter of granting abseuces from exercises and examinations. We have repeatedly excused students from examinations and have arranged special examinations.''

George Washington University, Washington, D. C.: ''The university is always glad to co-operate by making possible the proper observance of holydays.''

Rochester University: ''We shall, of course, be only too glad to continue the same policy that we have always carried out—that of recognizing these special days and excusing the children accordingly.''

Some of the other favorable replies received were from the Universities of Maine, Syracuse, Ohio, and the public schools of Holyoke, Mass.; Schenectady, N. Y.; Madison, Wis.; New Rochelle, N. Y.; Ft. Wayne, Ind.; Virgiuia, Minn.; Danville, Ill.; Pittsburgh, Pa.; Kansas City, Mo.; Springfield, Mo.; Lake Charles, La.; Bloomington, Ind.; Albany, N. Y.; Washington, D. C.; Elizabeth, N. J., and Calgary, Canada.

London Plans for Post-War Work

Reconstruction Program Outlined by Anglo-Jewry at Central Hall; Many Notables Attend; Impressive Protest Held in Effort to Curb Persecutions by Poles; Heroic Priest Honored

By Dr. M. EPSTEIN

London, Aug. 13, 1919.

WEDNESDAY, June 11, 1919, will go down as a red-letter day in the history of London Jewry. The community was invited to meet its leaders in order to discuss with them the great reconstruction scheme for Anglo-Jewry. The Central hall, one of the largest public buildings in the metropolis, was chartered for the occasion, and truth to tell, the attendance might have been larger. The hall might have been filled in every nook and cranny. As it was, it was only tolerably full.

Still the gathering was fairly representative. One saw the rich folk from Mayfair and Bayswater, the well-to-do from Hampstead, and the denizens from the eastern quarters of the city. The clergy were there in full force; the modern pastor from up west sat beside the be-capped rabbi with flowing beard from Whitechapel. Ladies were also present, as was but proper.

On the platform were to be seen the leaders of the community. The presidential chair was occupied by a scion of the Rothschilds, none other than Mr. Lionel de Rothschild, member of parliament and late major in his majesty's army, the very image of his popular father, the late Mr. Leopold de Rothschild.

Lord Rothschild Attends

A. Stern sat beside the chairman on one side, and Waley Cohen on the other. Sir Adolf Tuck was among the elect. Lord Rothschild occupied a chair at one end of the platform, and Mr. Laski, the popular, the generous, the capable representative of Manchester Jewry, was at the other end.

The chief rabbi was there. So was the Rev. Morris Joseph, the respected head of the reformed wing of the community. We also saw a representative of East End Jewry, and especially of the Friendly societies. Sir Stuart Samuel smiled down from the platform. His kinsman, Lord Swaythling, was out of town and therefore unable to be present. One man was missed from the platform—Dr. Gaster. Such is ever the tragedy of the "ex." But Dr. Gaster was among the audience. He was probably missed in another sense. Had he spoken, he would, as is usual with him, have carried his audience away. A wave of enthusiasm would have swept over the assembly. Whatever the scheme propounded people would have generated some warmth about it. But there was no warmth, no enthusiasm, no deep feeling. It was all very hum-drum and commonplace. The speakers did not fire their audiences, and only the chief rabbi reached, at one moment, a level above the ordinary.

Rebuilding Plan Proposed

The great scheme was propounded. The speakers had come prepared with reams of typewritten sheets which they read in a furtive sort of way. What was it all about? The community needed rebuilding, reorganizing. The time was opportune. The work would be a memorial to those Jews of England who had fallen in the war. A million pounds was required and would be spent under three heads.

Jews college, our training institution for ministers, would be transferred to either Oxford or Cambridge. Religious education would be properly endowed so that we should get many teachers adequately trained, many school rooms adequately furnished, and many scholars taught that the fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom. These three schemes were set out at length.

The usual compliments were exchanged, and a motion put that the community as represented at that meeting approved. It had been arranged from the first that no money was to be asked for on that evening. Only the resolution under its three heads was therefore pressed.

The speakers adumbrated on the need for more Jewish religious training and on the excellence and the beauty of a cultured ministry acquainted with the best in Jewish thought and comprehending the inwardness of British civilization. The plan was undoubtedly large in conception and worthy of all praise. But its advocates did not make the most of their opportunities. Here was a unique occasion, one of those occasions that occur at long and rare intervals in the life of any community. Certainly it occurs all too rarely in our own.

Meetings Far to Few

As a community we do not meet frequently enough. Sections meet, committees debate, boards pass resolutions. But the members of the community as a body, they, and in the words of that fine communal prayer, their wives and their children, hardly ever come together in solemn assembly.

In olden days it became a tradition for the annual president of the Union of Jewish Literary societies to give a reception to which all and sundry were invited. Occasionally the Jewish Historical society gave a dinner which was an occasion of meeting for the community as a whole. But of late years we have not met our fellow Jews at social gatherings.

Possibly we are so intent on our communal problems that we neglect the human side of intercourse. At any rate the gathering in the Central hall was one of those few communal meetings where not only the elected representatives of the people but the people themselves came together. . This should have been emphasized and made the most of, to say nothing of the scheme, which is really a great step forward, even if all the details are not generally approved.

Zionism's Advocate Heard.

The discussion was not particularly illuminating. A Zionist wanted to know whether if Palestine became a British protectorate the Jews there would be allowed to enjoy the advantages of the scheme. (This was in reference to the chairman's statement that if the British colonies and dominions contributed to the scheme they would participate in its blessings.) But our Zionist did not intend to be serious. Obviously he merely wanted Zionism to be remembered in that gathering.

Then a minister of one of our fashionable congregations took the ministry under his protection, feeling probably that on this historic occasion his views should also be heard in the assembly of the congregation. Truth to tell, he spoke wittily as ever, and wit, like charity, makes up for much.

The chairman believed he had the meeting entirely with him. He was soon undeceived, for before he put the motion a very practiced speaker raised his voice to oppose that part of the scheme which contemplated the transference of Jews college from London.

Mr. Hartog's Criticism

The speaker was Mr. Philip Hartog, the registrar of the University of London, and one of the recognized authorities on education in the country. No light critic he. But he did not carry his point. His speech, however, was symptomatic of the doubt generally felt about the removal of Jews college from its present abode.

On the other two points of the communal scheme opinion seems solid. About Jews college the community is divided. Nothing has been done as yet. A large council is to be appointed. Every possible organization in Anglo-Jewry has been invited to send two representatives to the general council, which, we assume, will proceed to collect the million pounds.

One word in conclusion. The brunt of the work of organizing this great gathering of Anglo-Jewry fell on Mr. Maurice Myers, one of the respected members of the London lodge.

Polish Pogroms Protested

Another brother of the London lodge organized a great assembly of a different character a fortnight after the meeting already described. This was Brother Dr. Jochelmann, and his task was more sorrowful than Brother Myers. Dr. Jochelmann arranged for a great protest against the pogroms in Poland.

Thursday, June 26, 1919, was appointed a day of mourning for Jews in London, and in the Jewish quarters, Whitechapel and Soho, shops were closed and people abstained from work. A procession was arranged to march from the East End to the Queen's hall, where a service was conducted by the chief rabbi, the Rev. Morris Joseph and other ministers.

The procession was very effective. A large part of London witnessed the march, and many people asked the reason for the demonstration. The reason soon got about, and the great majority of people were entirely sympathetic. It was a sight to see the popular shopping center round about Oxford circus, which is in the vicinity of the Queen's hall, held up by the crowds of Jews, mournful of mien and attire.

Crowds in Hyde Park

The Queen's hall was packed, and a host was turned away and directed to Hyde Park, where they held a meeting of protest. Inside Queen's hall there was a very impressive service, and the chief rabbi moved his audience by his weighty words of protest against the massacre of men, women and children in Poland. Many a face was tear-stained, and the non-Jews who were present shared in the sadness.

The protest was not without effect. The press gave the movement ample publicity, and the Polish agencies in London showed, in letters to the papers, that the protest did not leave them untouched. The original idea was to hold a Mansion house protest meeting against the Polish atrocities. The authorities had almost decided to grant the Mansion house for the purpose. But at the eleventh hour the arrangement was cancelled.

It is not clear who was at the bottom of the change of view. But it is alleged that Sir Philip Magnus used his influence privately to put a spoke in the wheel.

Sir Philip's Foes Many

It is not too much to say perhaps that at present Sir Philip is one of the most unpopular men in Anglo-Jewry. He was not re-elected to the board of deputies, of which he had been vice-president, and when the president at the first meeting of the new board suggested that a vote of thanks should be passed to Sir Philip for his long services as vice-president, the suggestion was howled down.

In the meantime the Polish pogroms are kept before the public by constant questions in the House of Commons. There are very many members of Parliament who, to their credit be it said, are ready to make their influence felt on the side of right.

Synagogues for Ghetto

If there are great movements in the community there is no lack of lesser undertakings. For the most part they are of religious character. The west feels that the Jews in the east of London may be saved by religious services. So several schemes are on foot for planting new synagogues in various parts of the Whitechapel Ghetto.

The liberal wing of the community is said to have acquired a piece of land on which they intend to erect a Liberal synagogue. The Reform congregation of Berkeley street are undertaking to maintain a Jewish settlement in East London, near the river, where again religious services will play a great part.

Nor should it be thought that only the communal left is active in this direction. The communal right, in the person of the Sinai league, is also very energetic. The league disposes of a paper which in its latest form has taken on ample dimensions.

Jewish journalism, indeed, is about to witness a revival. A new communal paper is being talked of, and it is stated that a limited company was recently registered for the purpose of bringing out a weekly to be called "The Jewish Guardian." The sponsors of this venture are said to be Sir Charles Henry, Dr. Israel Abrahams and Mr. Michael Green.

Paper's Field Uncertain

It is true that these three gentlemen are actively connected with the league of British Jews, but whether the new journal is to serve the cause of the league or be a general communal paper, it is difficult to say. Of course people will draw conclusions. But then people are always doing that.

The problem will be solved, however, and all questions answered when the paper appears. Nor will that be the only new star in the communal firmament. A sort of federation has been set up of Jewish university students, and one object of their movement will be the issue of an organ.

The Zionist Central organization, now permanently settled in London in offices worthy of the work it has to do, will likewise publish a new journal, not a general newspaper but rather a specifically Zionist magazine on the lines of official journals published by government departments in all countries. English Zionists already possess a monthly of their own in the "Zionist Review," which seems to grow from strength to strength. If live journalism is a sign of health, Anglo-Jewry should be healthy indeed.

Hospital's Work Begun

The Jewish hospital, long talked about and long collected for, is at length beginning to heal the sick. So far only an out-patients department has been opened. But presently, no doubt, greater things will be undertaken.

The question is no longer asked—Is a Jewish hospital necessary? The point now is that any hospital is a necessity, no matter what its name or who its

Lieut. Levin Appeals for War Sufferers in Austria and in Poland

By Lieut. MOSES B. LEVIN

Member of Oriental Hillel Lodge of Chicago

ON Jan. 4, 1919, I received telegraphic orders detaching me from my organization and directing me to proceed to Paris for duty in connection with the American Commission to negotiate peace.

Almost two months had passed since the armistice had been signed; two long months, during which we dreamed of home and hoped for something to jolt us out of the lethargy which followed the cessation of hostilities. Coming out of a clear sky the telegram proved jolt enough for me.

Two days later I arrived in the French capital and found that I had been selected to act as one of a group of officers who were to form the liaison between the missions in the field, the diplomatic centers throughout Europe and the headquarters in Paris. On Jan. 8 I left for Rome on the first leg of a tour that in three months carried me through ten countries of central and eastern Europe.

Within the limits of this article it would be impossible to give more than a brief sketch of what I saw on that tour. I will give only a general picture of conditions as I found them in the various centers.

Hopes Center in America

Traveling as an American officer (except in neutral countries and such other places where discretion required civilian garb) and under diplomatic passport, I was met everywhere with the most polished courtesy and welcome. I had not traveled far before I understood the motives underlying my reception.

Every country looked to America for aid of some sort. Italy looked to us for help in securing a strategic frontier in the North; the Jugo-Slavs looked to America to save Fiume for the new Slav state; the Austrians and Poles looked pleadingly toward America for food and other material assistance; the Rumanians sought support in its demand for Transylvania, and the Hungarians begged us to save something of the wreckage of the old state from its grasping neighbors—and the conflicting stories that one heard in almost every center made him wonder whether there was any truth left in men.

In Vienna I was told that the food shortage in the Austrian capital was due to the refusal of the Czek farmers to ship food to Vienna. In Prague the new Czeko-Slovak capital, I found also a scarcity, and was informed that there was plenty of good food in the outlying regions, but the farmers were sending everything to Vienna.

In Budapest I was told that eighty per cent of the inhabitants of Transylvania were Hungarians; in Bucharest it was claimed that fully eighty per cent of the same territory were Rumanians. Is it any wonder in the face of such conflicting testimony that the American members of the Peace Conference have erred in certain settlements?

Hunger Stalks in Vienna

I have said that I traveled always as an American officer. That I did, but at the same time, wherever my work carried me, I sought to determine the circumstances under which my people were living. A knowledge of conditions as I found them in Vienna, Warsaw and Bucharest should be in the possession of every Jew.

I spent practically the whole month of February in Vienna and the surrounding territory. The city was in the throes of hunger. The bread ration a loaf of black bread per person per week meant two small slices per day. There was a gaunt, starved look on practically every face one saw in the streets.

I visited the Home for Aged Jews in Vienna, an institution housing several hundreds of our old people. There, as in practically every home and institution in the city, a shortage of fuel existed. The superintendent asked me to taste a bit of the main article of food the old people were getting daily. It was a sort of gruel, but, like most dishes one found in Vienna, it was a mystery, an "Ersatz."

Through Professor Ehrmann, the head of the B'nai B'rith of Austria, I met a large number of prominent Jews. In many cases I found them despondent with very little hope for the future. They were depressed, not only by the ravages of war, but also by the prospect of the heavy taxes that must follow, and the dark outlook due to the dismemberment of the old Austrian state.

Tramps Through Warsaw

From Vienna I went to Warsaw, remaining there three days. I arrived on Feb. 27 and, after reporting to the head of the mission, I went out into the city. Except for the destruction of the bridge between Piago and the Polish capital and the demolition of a few manufacturing establishments at the edge of the city, Warsaw had not felt the heavy bond of war.

The inhabitants, however, had felt it. I followed two old Jews, recognizing them as such by their peculiar yamekeh and long dark coats, through Nalewka Strasse into the main Jewish settlement. Here I saw several thousand of our brethren, young and old, getting ready for the Sabbath.

On their faces was written that same starved look that I saw in the streets of Vienna, and in addition the fear that comes from living constantly in dread of what the next moment might bring. That night I attended services at Sirota's Temple. At their close the members of the congregation gathered about me and asked me about conditions in America. Was food so scarce here? Did Jews live with the same fear always confronting them? Did America know what was going on in the outlying regions? Could not something be done?

Eyes Have Haunted Look.

As I listened to them and saw that weary haunted look in their eyes I thought of the sentence found in our daily prayers, "I was a youth and I grew old but never have I seen a righteous man forsaken or his children wanting bread." And I wondered whether their despondency might not in some measure be due to their loss of faith in themselves; to that loss of self-respect which every man must hold dear.

On March 1, I arrived in Bucharest, where I stayed three weeks. Here I found almost the same deplorable conditions. Food to be sure was a little less scarce, but the prices made it practically prohibitive. Bread, a poor black compositions, was 8 lei a kilo, or about 25c a pound, the cheapest meat was 14 lei per kilo; a suit brought 800 lei, a pair of shoes 400 lei.

Here, too, I found the same fear that existed in Warsaw, and the reports of attacks and outrages against Jews that came in from the outlying sections substantiated that feeling of fear.

Funds Are Needed Now

It is not my intention to draw harrowing pictures of conditions overseas. I would only say as an eye witness that they are very, very sad and in no way exaggerated.

In the campaign that is being made for the relief of the war sufferers, every Jew must give and give till it hurts. In addition to giving to his uttermost to the general relief fund, every member of the B'nai B'rith should give also to the special fund being raised by the Order.

The B'nai B'rith of Europe numbers in its ranks the leading Jews of the several communities. They are men, who if helped, can undoubtedly be the means of helping many, many others to get back on a self-supporting basis. They look to their American brethren alone for help. They cannot, they will not, look in vain.

There is needed at once food and money. This will bring immediate relief. But what is essential to bring a more lasting solution to the big problem is organized political effort.

I need give only one illustration to make my point clear. When I was in Rumania in March the government was considering a law prohibiting any citizen from carrying from the country property or money beyond a certain amount. Although the word Jew was not mentioned it was clear that the law was aimed at our people to prevent them from leaving the country with their property and wealth.

Having withheld the rights of citizenship for years, the government now aims to force it on the Jews whether or not they desire it. Relief from such attacks cannot be had by individual contribution. Organized effort alone will avail.

The Persecution of the Talmud

How the Great Encyclopedia of Law Has Survived Attacks, Which Antedated Even the Christian Era, to Be the Bulwark of the Jewish Faith and the Major Tie That Bound Judiasm Together Through the Centuries

By Dr. M. GASTER

THE same fate which has overtaken the Jews has been meted out to their literature. Not even the Bible has been spared, still less the other production of Hebrew genius and Hebrew thought. Slander, vilification, misrepresentation and persecution has been the fate of the one and the other. The brunt of the persecution, however, had one book to bear, in which the enemies of Israel thought to recognize the sources of Israel's vitality, the hidden spring of its remarkable strength, the bulwark and mainstay of the Jewish nation.

I need not mention the book, its name is on your lips. I speak of the Talmud, of that great encyclopedia of oral law, of profound dialectics, of beautiful poetry, of surpassing morality, of quaint humor.

In it the Jewish nation has found the storehouse whence to take the weapons, not for murderous fights, but for the pacific discussion of the law, for the fight on ignorance, the most deadly foe of mankind. It has kept up Jewish keeness of spirit, it has enlivened the mind, it has rejuvenated Israel in each generation, for it provided the mind with food, the heart with satisfaction.

The Talmud has prevented us from becoming fossils, antiquated remains from a past long forgotten. On the contrary, it has kept us in constant touch with the ever-changing times and has enabled us to cope successfully with the difficulties that cropped up in various generations; it has reconciled the teaching of religion with the necessities of life. And thus our enemies were justified in hating the Talmud, because they knew that without that marvelous monument of the past we would be cut off from our organic development, the very ground under our feet would vanish, and it would be only a question of time when we would disappear as Jews.

The One Great Bond

I am not exaggerating, nor attributing to the Talmud magical powers. To everyone who has read the history of our nation, who is even superficially acquainted with the vicissitudes through which our race has passed, this will appear almost a truism. Every section and every individual that has separated itself from the teaching and the vivifying influence of the Talmud has in the long run become thoroughly alienated from Judaism.

The most interesting example we have is the Karaites (on which sect I may discourse at another time) who were the first to depart from the teaching of the Rabbis and to oppose the Talmud. One might say by stretching a point that with the sect of the Karaites began the persecution of the Talmud.

For centuries the battle has raged between the two camps. The victory would have been even earlier won, if the Karaites had not in time relinquished much of their opposition. They felt that through their opposition to the oral law, embodied in the Talmud, the ground under their feet was giving way, their Judaism and correct interpretation of the Bible was vanishing, its influence upon their lives was diminishing. So they introduced surreptitiously many of the teachings of the Rabbis, many of the principles expounded in that grand book, which represented the intellectual work of centuries.

This first attack upon the Talmud though producing a profound cleavage in the hitherto close unity, was not, however, followed by very grave consequences, as it partook more of the character of an internal dispute. Neither party appealed to an alien power, to the arm of the government to carry their point, nor was it a question of putting down the adherents by force of arms.

It was a battle of ideas and principles which must always be welcome and is always useful.

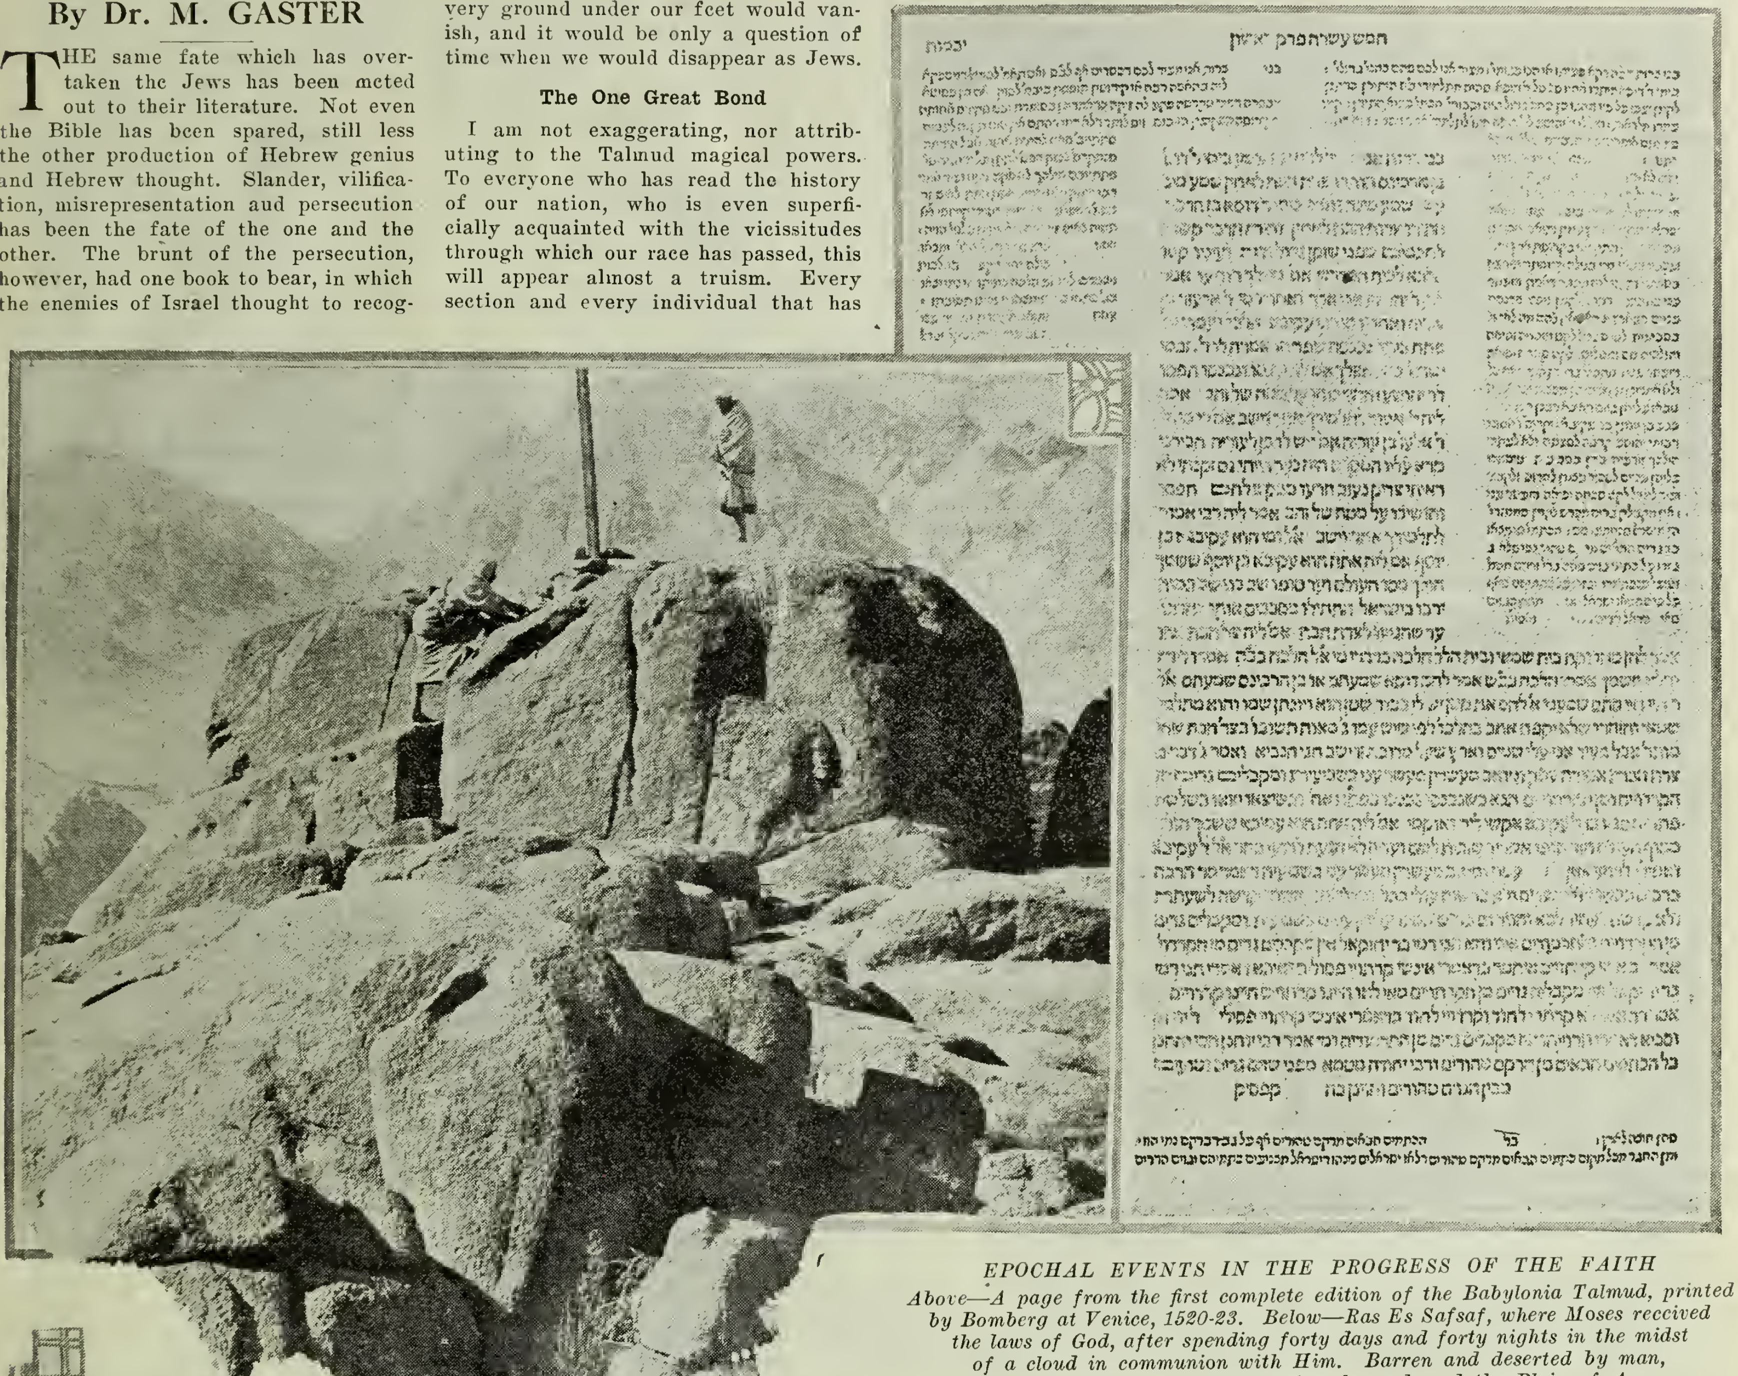
Christians Launch Their Attack

The question took quite another aspect, when the Christian Church took up the fight. The leaders in the attack upon the Talmud were invariably renegades, apostates, who for various reasons became traitors to their own race and faith; the soldiers and followers were fanatical monks, besotted kings and popes who thought to gain valuable riches by the conversion and plunder of the Jews.

The first who stood up as an accuser of the Talmud, who sudenly felt scandalized at its pretended immorality and blasphemy, and who told that the conception of God as expressed in the Talmud was grossly materialistic, and who presumed to be judge upon the teachings of the Rabbis, was such a renegade called Nicholaus Douin.

Probably for very valid reasons he had been excommunicated by the Rabbis. Filled with rage and hatred he turned Christian and sought means to avenge himself against them. He knew that "the weak point" would be the Talmud, and so he approached Pope Gregory IX with calumnious statements such as those I have mentioned. The Pope believed every word Donin told him and he sent orders to the kings of France, England, Spain, and Portugal to confiscate at a certain date all the copies of the Talmud and to burn them. This happened in the year 1239.

In addition a public disputation was arranged for between this apostate and the foremost representatives of Jewish learning of the time. The disputation actually took place in Paris, where Louis IX, narrow-minded and bigoted, alone of all the kings written to, had carried out the Pope's orders. The most important personage among the Jews was R. Jehiel of Paris, and the text of that disputation has come down to us.



EPOCHAL EVENTS IN THE PROGRESS OF THE FAITH

Above—A page from the first complete edition of the Babylonia Talmud, printed by Bomberg at Venice, 1520-23. Below—Ras Es Safsaf, where Moses received the laws of God, after spending forty days and forty nights in the midst of a cloud in communion with Him. Barren and deserted by man, an unending silence abides with the rock and the Plain of Assemblage in the Mount Sinai Valley, Asia Minor, to which the prophet summoned the Children of Israel to listen to the reading of the commandments from the stones that had been used as tablets. Photograph copyright by Underwood and Underwood.

Inquisition Decreed Death for Those Who Hid Holy Book

Donin had drawn up a list of accusations to which R. Jehiel gave most admirable replies. He proved the ignorance of Donin and also that he had purposely perverted the passages in the Talmud in order to give them a meaning totally at variance with the true one.

Slander That Will Not Die

It is remarkable that though refuted and proved to be baseless, these very accusations have been henceforth repeated over and over again. They form the stock-in-trade of all the old and modern anti-semites. Whoever wanted to have a fling at the Talmud without having the slightest knowledge of it, borrowed the stone from that rubbish heap. Whoever wanted to throw mud on the Talmud dipped in that mire gathered by Donin and increased by subsequent renegades and falsifiers of truth.

One sad lesson is to be learned from this, that, however much we attempt to fight slander and enmity, however many arguments of reason and truth we may bring forward, they will fall on deaf ears and upon the hearts and the minds of those who do not wish to be corrected, and of people who persist in believing the most atrocious statements, because it suits them and their interests and dispositions. And yet must we carry on the war, for in the long run truth must conquer.

At the Jehiel-Donin disputation, the result was a foregone conclusion. Heard or unheard, proved or not, the Talmud was condemned beforehand, and in 1244 no fewer than 24 carts full of Talmud copies were burned in the public place of Paris. It was on a Friday in the month of Tamuz that the first auto-da-fe was lit for the Talmud. The parchment may burn, but the letter detached from it would flutter about, the spirit would not be killed although the blow proved then to be almost irreparable. The North of France, which at one time was the place where the study of the Talmud was flourishing, where it had, in fact, reached the highest development, sank after that calamity never to recover.

The evil seed once sown continued to grow. Disputation followed disputation. The Jewish literature was ransacked for the purpose of finding therein proofs for the Messianic character of Jesus. Another remarkable disputation was that between Fra Paolo—also a renegade—and the famous R. Moses B. Nachman (Ramban or Nachmanides) which was held in Barcelona in 1263. At this occasion the Talmud was made to do the duty of witness to the truth of the advent of the Messiah.

The Aggadic tales and other similar legendary portions were taken literally and a meaning put into them, against which Nachmanides protested spiritedly and energetically. He took up the defense of the Talmud and of Judaism most fearlessly and nobly, and inspired the king and assembled grandees with the profoundest respect. In spite of this true interpretation of Talmudic passages the Talmud was not saved from ill treatment at the hands of Fra Paolo and his helpers.

Censorship by Clemens IV

At the instigation of this renegade, Pope Clemens IV ordered a careful inspection of the Talmud to see whether there were in it passages defamatory of Christianity and of its founder. A committee was appointed and the Jews commanded to deliver up all their copies to be examined. Thus the first censorship was established and as we know it has not yet ceased to exist.

The committee examined the Talmud in the light of their limited understanding and erased a great number of passages which they thought objectionable. The Talmud would have been burned there also, as it happened in France, were it not for the insistence of Raymundus Martini, that many passages in the Talmud were in favor of Christianity and that they were of Mosaic origin.

Thus the Talmud was saved from complete destruction and was instead only mutilated. This example, like the first, of burning the Talmud was often afterwards imitated, as we shall soon see.

Not 150 years passed before another of the then very numerous apostates began a new persecution of the Talmud. Josua Lorki, afterwards Geronimo de Santa Fe, followed the example of Alphonse of Valladolid and Palus of Santa Maria Burgos and embraced Christianity. He became the physician of Pope Benedictus XIII and strained every nerve to convert his former coreligionists. He insisted on having public disputations with them, and thus arose the well-known disputation of Tortosa, which lasted from February, 1413, until November 12, 1414, more than a year and a half.

The Pope himself presided and the object of the disputation was to find out whether the Talmud recognized Jesus as Messiah or not. The old arguments and arbitrary interpretations of the Aggadot were again dished up by Geronimo, and when he discovered that the Jews were far from beaten by his ridiculous assertions which they easily controverted, he changed his tactics and accused the Talmud in the style of Donin and Alphonse of Valladolid.

Consigned to the Flames

He declared it to be a book full of abominable blasphemy and immorality, full of heresies and defamations and that it ought to be burned. He was the first to denounce the Kol Nidre Formula on Kippur evening as sanctioning false oaths and he said that the Jews prayed against the Christians by insinuating that the word Goy, i.e., a Gentile, meant a Christian, and he placed the same malicious interpretation upon that word when it appeared in the Talmud. The Jews might protest as much as they liked, might prove that these interpretations were false, the Talmud was ordered to be burned, and many other Jewish writings shared the fate of the Talmud.

Thus a material made up of the most scurrilous and unscrupulous accusations against the Talmud was brought together. They were treasured up by the fanatical Dominicans, afterwards the masters and guides of the Inquisition and made use of in the following centuries in order to destroy or to mutilate the whole of our literature. The accusations were believed in, and are still so.

A new terror arose, every Hebrew book was subjected to the inquisitorial eyes of the censorial committee, and there is not a single valuable MS. in the libraries of the world in which one cannot find some erasure by the hands of these enemies of truth. All the MSS. saved from the general destruction, which come from these countries, are mutilated in the most ridiculous way. The censor is not always—or has never been—a man of real learning, and whatever appeared to him offensive or doubtful was remorselessly excised. There exist many Manuals for such censors, which are all based upon the calumnious writings of those apostates.

Printing Press Our Aid

Printing, however, succeeded the painful and slow writing, and the Jews were among the first to avail themselves of the new invention. They realized immediately the importance of being able to multiply easily the written word: they knew the value of being able to disseminate as quickly as possible the truth contained in our scriptures, and to put them, if possible, beyond the reach of absolute destruction and annihilation.

Jews lived everywhere, and if one could only send copies of books to the Jewish communities scattered over various countries, the certainty was that here and there a copy would be preserved. And this has really been the case. I do not know of any single Hebrew work that once printed has utterly perished. Though publicly burned and destroyed in more than one country, copies of those very books turn up in some remote corners of the earth.

If the Jews seized eagerly upon the new invention, their enemies were not slow to realize the danger, and the printing has been gagged and persecuted to our own days by all those demons of the night which shun the light of the day.

The printing of the Talmud had also to pass through some strange vicissitudes. A few years previous to its complete first edition (1523) another renegade, Pfefferkorn, started a controversy which, in a short time, set the church in flames and prepared Germany for Luther's successful Reformation. Pfefferkorn abetted and assisted by the Dominican monks of Cologne, and by the Inquisitor Hochstraaten of that place, resuscitated the old accusations against the Talmud, and urged the confiscation of all the copies in order that they should be burned, just as it had happened in former times in Paris and elsewhere.

Jews Resolve to Fight

The Jews in Cologne, Mainz, and other towns held privileges from the Emperor of Austria by which their property was guaranteed to them. They resolved then to oppose this decree which Pfefferkorn had obtained, and were assisted by the Archbishop Uriel of Cologne. The Emperor was prevailed upon to annul his first decree and to order the restitution of the confiscated books.

Pfefferkorn, however, and his abettors, who liked the smell of roasted human flesh and of burnt books, would not let their prey slip out of their hands, especially as they might also extort money from the Jews to return them the books. So they suggested that a committee be appointed, which should examine the Talmud and other Hebrew writings, and decide in the first place whether the Talmud should be burned and which of the other books should share its fate.

Among the members of that committee they sugested a man whom they knew to be pure-minded and upright, a profound scholar and one who was held in the highest estimation by the Emperor and his learned contemporaries That man was Johannes Reuchlin, one of the prominent humanists of the time, a classical scholar and well versed in Hebrew lore. He had studied under the direction of Loans and De Farno and was a warm, nay, enthusiastic admirer of Jewish literature. He gave his report totally in favor of the Talmud.

This so much exasperated the Dominicans and Pfefferkorn that they began to attack him. The latter published a libelous pamphlet against the universally respected Reuchlin. The result was that Reuchlin answered by the publication of a similar pamphlet (Augenspiegel of the Spectacles) which created a profound sensation throughout Germany.

Beginning of the Speech

With that pamphlet commences the era of free speech and public opinion. This was created through the controversy over the Talmud. From the Jews and the Talmud the controversy passed over to Reuchlin and his adherents, all the men of humanistic education in Germany. The power of the monks was still more shaken through a series of satirical letters and the so-called epistles of the obscurants, issued by a friend of Reuchlin, by which they were made the laughing stock of the world.

After a wearisome controversy and trial which dragged on for years. Reuchlin was completely vindicated of the accusation of heresy which his enemies had leveled against him, and he won his cause triumphantly. This was indirectly that of the Jews and they had for the time nothing more to fear. The unexpected happened. Not only did they get their books back, but Pope Leo X, an enlightened man, suggested that the Talmud be printed so that one could see what was true and what false in all those accusations.

The complete edition appeared in Venice in 1523 in 12 folios. This edition is the basis of all subsequent editions, in which the original pagination has been retained. It is now almost as scarce as a MSS. of the Talmud itself, of which only one copy is known to exist in Munich. Detached portions of the Talmud appeared in Portugal, Morocco (Fes), and even earlier still in Italy, long before Bomberg's edition. Soncino had printed a few in the years 1483-89, but that edition cannot be compared to the magnificence and beauty of Bomberg's.

In his office appeared also the Jersusalemitan Talmud, about the same time he published those three magnificent editions of the Biblia Rabbinica, which have remained unsurpassed for the beauty and correctness of the execution. It is said that he spent no less than 2,000,000 ducats in the printing of Hebrew works.

Under the Inquisition

But things were not to go so smoothly. The Reformation of Luther had given a severe shock to the Catholic Church. A reaction against any and every liberal tendency set in. One of the blackest characters, Pietro Caraffa, afterwards Pope Paul IV, pointed out to the more liberal Pope Julius III that the Inquisition ought to be established everywhere in order to stamp out heresy of every kind and to strengthen the tottering church.

Pope Julius acquiesced and on July 21, 1542, the Inquisition was established in Rome. The liberty of printing was immediately restricted, committees of censors were appointed, which had to examine every book before it was printed and to approve of the publication. Before the same tribunal all the books already published were to be brought and all the obnoxious passages struck out or obliterated, by blackening them over, thus putting their own seal over them.

A new era of persecution began for Hebrew literature. The censors were, as a rule, renegades and they would use their power to ill-treat and extort money from the Jews. From among them arose new denunciators, who only repeated the old calumnies and tried to strike a decisive blow at their former co-religionists.

Such men were Solomo Romano, Joseph Moro, and Hananel de Foligno, who accused the Talmud of heresies against the Christian Church and its founder. The Pope had no power to save it this time. The matter belonged to the Inquisition, and Caraffa with his assessors decreed the annihilation of the Talmud on August 12, 1553, and the copies robbed and taken away from the Jews by force, were burned on Rosh Hashana of the same year.

Thousands of Copies Perish

This time the destruction was much more general for auto-da-fes were lit not only in Rome but also in Ferraro, Mantua, Venice, and other places, hundreds, nay thousands, of copies were destroyed, and not only the Talmud but whatever the mercenaries of the "Holy Office" could lay their unholy hands

THE unfortunate situation of our brethren in Poland still occupies the center of the stage in the Jewish world. Pogroms on a large scale, in which the soldiery takes the leading part, and attacks on individual Jews, are of daily occurrence, and instead of giving the monotonous details, we shall let an important witness speak.

Samuel Charney, the Yiddish essayist, better known by his pen name, S. Nigger, who arrived in New York October 18, having had a narrow escape in Wilna, where he was arrested, sentencted to be shot, and then deported, reports that the Polish pogroms are considerably worse than the Russian article of the same brand. In Russia one had the impression that pogroms were staged by a corrupt government, figuring on the support of a debased and criminal element by which the law-abiding and intelligent population should be intimidated. In Poland the bourgeoisie leads and enjoys the sympathy of even the socialists so that fully ninety per cent of the population may be classed as anti-Semites.

Convenient Excuses

Even the criminal and the cynic need some pretext for their acts. The slaughter of Minsk on Aug. 8 was excused by Paderewski with the claim that the Bolsheviki, who were exclusively Jews, had terrorized the population, which, breathing freely for the first time, when General Haller's troops entered the city, could not be restrained and vented its wrath on the enemies of society.

We have now come into possession of some facts which throw light on this thin excuse and on the general charge of Jewish Bolshevism. While the Bolsheviki were in possession of the power, the arrest of the "Stodtmaggid" (Preacher) Benjamin Shakowitzki, was ordered on the charge of profiteering and hoarding coin. The rabbi was informed in time of the proposed action and succeeded in making his escape. When this was learned, the Bolsheviki ordered the arrest of the chief rabbi, Eliezer Rabbinowitsch, and two of his assistants as hostages, imposing on the Jewish community a fine of 100,000 rubles for allowing the alleged criminal to escape.

The chief rabbi, with a heroism that has a precedent in the similar attitude of Rabbi Meir of Rothenburg in the thirteenth century, who was willing to die in prison rather than allow that his popularity should be used as a means of extortion, warned his congregation that if they paid the money he would nevertheless refuse to leave the prison. In spite of this, the poor people of the town scraped the sum together. Thereupon the radical element among the Jews—whose existence, of course, nobody denied—appealed to the Bolshevik administration against accepting such sacrifice from the hands of the proletariat which they are supposed to protect.

The latter saw the point, and discharged the three rabbis, issuing at the same time an appeal to the Jewish proletariat, "hoodwinked by superstition, which is the handmaid of capitalistic exploiters," to join their ranks.

Another Handy Excuse

The railroad workers in Lodz were on a strike. There was not a single Jew among them. The Polish government took care of that, dismissing all Jews employed during the German occupation as soon as it came into power; nor were there any Jews on the police force, called out to quell the riot, nor in the municipal offices from which the police received its orders. Before you knew it the rumor spread that shots had been fired from the house where the offices of the Jewish congregation are located. The excited masses found an outlet for their rage. Jews, found on the streets or in stores, were beaten, the stores and homes looted, and Jews who arrived from out of town were clubbed in the depot, and had their beards cut, which has become a national sport of Mr. Popolski.

There was no loss of life but the number of wounded is said to reach 300, and twice as many were arrested for interfering with the legitimate pastime of General Haller's finest. The Yiddish papers which reported these facts were suppressed, and Mr. Hartglas, the Jewish member of the sejm, who brought the facts before the parliament, was hissed down, and when he refused to leave the tribune, the members left the hall, breaking up the session.

Similar actions are taken by local authorities. When the Jews of Siedlce appealed to the local military commander for protection against an attack, in the course of which two men were mortally wounded, the commander told them if one word were reported in the press, he would move his troops and leave them without any protection.

The less violent methods are still more effective. In Wengrowo the synagog is requisitioned for military purposes, in Warsaw the "Sholem Alechem" School is needed for some municipal office, in Posen registration of Jewish students at the university is restricted to two per cent—under Russian regime the universities of the Pale had a ten per cent limit, those outside of the Pale five per cent—in one city a municipal bakery with the right of monopoly is opened, all private bakeries are closed, and Jewish bakers are not employed. lawyers are boycotted, physicians are not admitted to hospitals, officials who under the German or Austrian government served twenty years are discharged, and the Lemberg Tageblatt sums up the situation in an appeal to the civilized world, closing with the words: "If you knew the facts as we know them an outcry would be heard in all civilized lands.".

Soldiers and Outlaw Bands Enact New Outrages in Ukraine

The Shepherds

We need the fiery language of an Ezekiel to stir up the conscience of humanity against the shepherds who eat the fat of their flock and dress in their wool but do not tend the flock. The story of the revived corruption which carried the old Polish kingdom into the abyss will be told at a later date when the facts that stink to heaven will be permitted to be told.

The present policy is the same as that which was adopted by Russia and Rumania for years, hypocrisy and denial of patent facts for the consumption of foreign countries, and intimidation of the Jews at home. Niemojewski, the radical writer, advises the government to reply to Mr. Morgenthau that the Jews are a sore on the body of the Polish nation; Dwa Grosha, the paper which Paderewski helped to finance in 1912, wishes Sir Stuart Samuel expelled because he had the temerity to convince himself by autopsy of the fact that a Jewish student, arrested by the police on an arbitrary charge, had not committed suicide, as the police reported. but had been tortured to death by the guardians of public order.

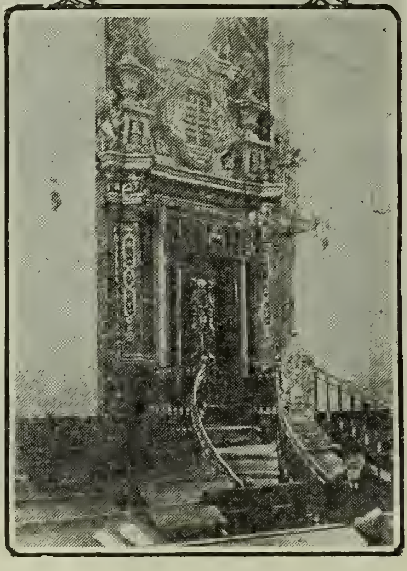
The sentiment of the Poles is clearly presented in their American organ, Free Poland, published in Chicago, which, in the issue of Oct. 1 has an article by Ex-captain Nowak of the United States Army, who informs the American public that the Jew is taught by his religion that it is not wrong to boycott. The priests of the Caholic churches in Detroit and Jamaica, N. Y., who proclaimed a boycott against the Jews and used the pupils of the parochial schools as pickets to see that no Pole should enter a Jewish store, were probably disguised rabbis who preached the Shulhan Aruk after they had celebrated mass.

While willing to wait for the official report, we regret to say that the whitewashing attempts seem to be the policy of the American commissioners. General Jadwin, member of the commission to investigate the pogroms, addressed the Jews of Minsk in German with the evident desire of calming them and said that in the pogrom of Aug. 8-9 only five Jews were killed. The audience replied that on that very day sixteen victims had been buried in the Jewish cemetery, and on the next day this number rose to twenty-five, and at least six were known to have been buried outside of the city.

Official Actions

The sejm passed a law, dividing the population into citizens, inhabitants and aliens. We know from the precedent of Rumania what this means. A recent London dispatch informs us that in clear violation of the treaty the sejm will pass a law which prohibits trading by the Jews on Sunday. Private advices inform us that the packages containing food, which are sent from the United States to relatives in Poland, are rifled before they are delivered, and in one individual instance it is reported that of 20,000 kilograms of foodstuffs sent from America to Kolomea, the Jews, who form one-half of the population, received 1,600, the Ruthenians, who are the majority of the other half, nothing, and the Poles, who are a mere handful, the rest.

It has to be acknowledged as a miracle that defendants in a ritual murder trial in Strzyzow were discharged. The frame up in this case was so evident that the court could not sustain the accusation. The difficulty of the situation is presented in one instance. In Lithuania the Polish government ordered a conscription. Two thousand Jews signed a protest against this order, and Niemojewski, the above named Polish journalist, demands that they be court-martialed. At the same time the Lithuanians, whose claim on independence has been heard by the conference in Paris, ordered a conscription for their government. We can therefore understand why the Jews of Tarnopol, which is in the Ukrainian section of Galicia, protested against Rabbi Taubeles, who attempted to preach a sermon in Polish on Rosh Hashanah. Were the Ruthenians to come again into possession of the city, this would be the best excuse for a pogrom.



IN THE PUBLIC EYE

Above—Hotel Bristol, Warsaw, where Sir Stuart Samuel, head of the British Commission to investigate pogroms, is staying. Below—Interior of the "Altschul" in Nikolsburg, Moravia. The building is at least 400 years old.

It seems a pity that the Yiddish press of Poland does not wait for the publication of Mr. Morgenthau's official report before criticising him. His policy of bringing about an understanding between the two parties is, after all, the only possible solution of the problem. On the other hand, one can easily understand that the encouragement given by the British anti-Semites to the reactionary element, which holds the balance of the power in Poland, provokes the bitterness of the Polish Jews.

Lord Northcliffe's Morning Post (Aug. 30) went so far as to declare that the mission of Sir Stuart Samuel is an insult to Poland and could be compared to an attempt to send a negro from Sierra Leone to the United States to investigate negro lynchings. The Polish Jews must also feel that actions like the protests of the Danish socialists and of the Italian Jewish organizations, with a brief matter of fact reply of the respective governments, are empty demonstrations.

Yoktan's Family

Our ancestors, wishing to say that one is as bad as the other, quoted Gen. 10:26-29, where the thirteen sons of Yoktan are enumerated, with the concluding remark that all these were the sons of Yoktan. There can be no doubt in spite of the impossibility of obtaining official information, that the conditions in Ukraine are worse than in Poland. There are, not counting the Poles, four different parties fighting for the control of the territory.

The Bolsheviki, holding the governments of Kiev and Czernigov, and parts of Podolia and Volhynia, wish to make Ukraine part of a Russian Federation. Petlura, holding other parts of Podolia and Volhynia, is fighting for an independent Ukrainian state. Denikin, holding Charkov, Cherson, Poltave, Crimea and parts of the province of Yekaterinoslav, is really the agent for Kolchak and his party is expecting the re-establishment of czarism, and finally there are independent bands, joining from time to time one or the other party, but having no program beyond loot and murder.

It may be that Petlura's bands are responsible for the worst of these pogroms, but one can not suppress the suspicion that the parties having the control of the news service for the American press are whitewashing Denikine. In a London dispatch, published in the New York Times of Oct. 8, the old story is told that the peasants, impatient with the rule of the Bolsheviki, who failed to make good their promises, attacked the Jews in spite of the efforts of Denikine to restrain them. The report of William A. Nash, in the Chicago Daily News of Oct. 19, speaks, in a suggestive way, of the large wealth accumulated by the Russian Jews during the war, and of the increased difficulty to solve the Jewish question, which has become more acute than it was under the czar's regime.

Justice requires us to state that Dr. Pazmanik, a Jew, who served as surgeon in the Russian army, stated in London that he sees in Denikine the only possible salvation from anarchy. On the other hand, Robert Minor, the American journalist whose testimony before the United States Senate committee on Bolshevism created a sensation, stated in an address delivered in Chicago that Kolchak's and Denikine's political wisdom is confined to the parole: "Exterminate the Jews." The same statement was made by the Jewish historian, Mark Vishnitzer, in London, who sees the salvation of Russia in complete autonomy of the Ukraine and in Petlura's success.

Meantime the slaughter and pillage continue, and it is hardly to the credit of foreign missionaries in that country that they withhold from starving women food unless they consent to be baptized.

The pogrom area is being extended. In Riga the Letts proved themselves worthy disciples of czarist traditions by a pogrom for which the reason was given that the Jews had signalled to the German and Russian armies when they attacked the city, a story similar to that at the beginning of the war in Poland, where afterwards the author of the rumors was discovered in the Russian colonel, Miassayedoff, who had sold his troops to the Germans.

The report of the United States Consul, Haines, in Omsk that in Siberia no pogroms have taken place, suggests new trouble, and the only bright star on the horizon of the Russian Jews is the report that the Georgian republic in the Caucasus gave to the Jews autonomy and appointed a Jew as minister of Jewish affairs, at the same time naturalizing the Jewish refugees from Russia. The native Jews of the Caucasus form a class of their own, different from those of the western provinces and speaking the Grusinian language. They are devout cabbalists, and a colony of them is living in Jerusalem.

Anti-Semitism, Fact and Possibility

The American Jewish Committee did a wise thing at its meeting on Oct. 19 when it made arrangements for the publication of a list of Jewish soldiers who participated in the World War, and voted against the negative suggestion of Isaac W. Bernheim that such a publication would single out the Jews as a class, instead of insisting on their being considered American citizens of the Jewish persuasion. It is the old story of the man who ran away from a dog that barked at him after having just expressed his conviction that dogs which bark will not bite. He knew it, but he was not so sure that the dog knew it.

It is much to the credit of Ludwig Philippson that he conceived the idea and, foresaw the necessity, of compiling a list of Jewish soldiers in the Germany army in the war of 1870, when everything tended to the realization of Mr. Bernheim's idea of the definition of the Jews as a religious community. The growth of German anti-Semitism since 1878 proved that he was right. America is not immune. The report of William Nash, quoted above, that the Russian Jews who form only five per cent—which at least since the declaration of Poland's independence is greatly exaggerated—and monopolize the total wealth of the country, is a proof in point. The agitation for a complete prohibition of immigration, for the present opposed by the attorney general, A. Mitchell Palmer, is not without its anti-Semitic tinge, especially in view of the charge that bolshevism in Russia is upheld by the sympathy of the American immigrant Jew.

The allegorical painting of John S. Sargent, placed in the Public Library in Boston, which presents the synagog in the style of fifteenth century fanatics (see Hans Foltz: Die Alt und Neu Ee) as a blind woman clinging to old rags, is not without its significance for the opinion of the American public on the Jews.

A New Pogrom Area

The White Terror in Hungary, which succeeded the soviet government in which some Jews—though it still must must be treated as an open question whether Bela Kun and Tibor Szamuely were Jews—took a prominent part, in-

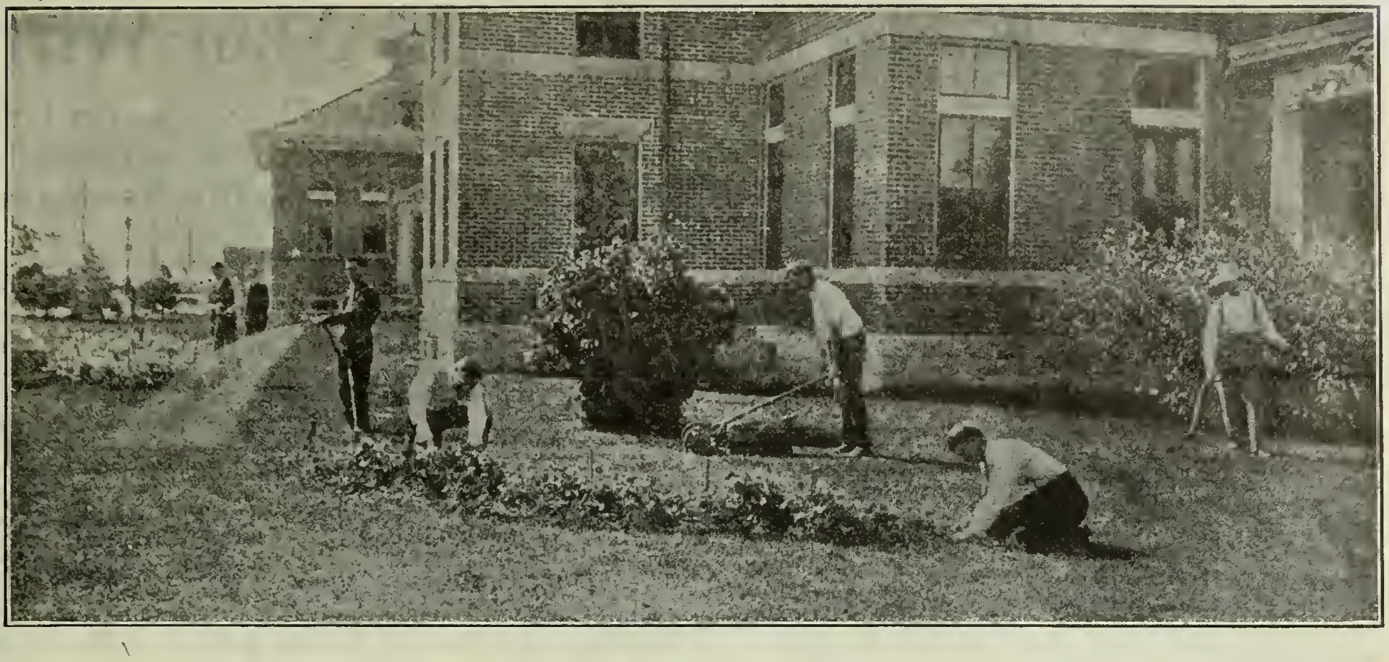
THE aim of the hospital is to keep the minds of its patients occupied so that they will not be free to dwell on their physical condition, for freedom from worry is one of the essential elements of cure. Accordingly, we see male patients engaged in cultivating the lawns —a recreational as well as useful task.



REST, fresh air and sunshine are factors of first importance in combating tuberculosis, all of which are abundantly to be had at the hospital. The patients spend as many hours out of doors as the weather—which is, for the most part, ideal—and their progress toward complete recovery from the plague will sanction.

Two New Leases on Life

A Story Written by Patients of the National Jewish Hospital for Consumptives at Denver, Which the B'nai B'rith Founded Twenty Years Ago; It Describes the Kind of People the Order is Helping Gain Health

THE Independent Order of B'nai B'rith is the founder and a principal patron of the National Jewish Hospital for Consumptives, one of the best institutions of its kind the world has produced.

From time to time the members of the Order have been made familiar with the hospital's equipment and its methods—its site in Denver, where to the west the Rockies rise a mile and more above the mile-high level of the plains; the spacious lawns which surround its beautiful, airy buildings; the perfection of its scientific apparatus and the atmosphere of cheer and security that permeates all the place. But little has been said personally of those it serves.

Subjoined are the narratives of two of the patients. These stories are non-theatric—read casually they seem even commonplace—yet between their lines is to be discerned the elements of tragedy, which multiplied by all human experience usurps so large a part in the great drama of Life.

By A PATIENT

AS you all know, tuberculosis is contracted, but when it once a disease which is not easily gets the upper hand on its opponent, it is vanquished only with great difficulty and after a terrific struggle. In order to tell you, then, how I contracted the disease and what this great hospital has done and is doing for me, it will be necessary to go back several years to the time when my resistance was gradually lowered by continuous and excessive exertion, both mental and physical.

In the fall of 1913, at the age of sixteen, I discarded by short trousers for longer and more manly ones, and, entering one of the big eastern universities, commenced my struggle for an education. With tenacity of purpose and resolute determination I registered in one of the technical colleges and set about overcoming the obstacles in the path of my ambition. It did not take long for me to learn that these obstacles were more numerous than I at first anticipated.

With only a few dollars in my pocket, it was necessary for me to find work. As there were many poor boys looking for work at that time, competition was keen, and—as a natural result—the employers took advantage of the situation. Students were exploited and paid very little for their labors.

Discrimination in Colleges

Aside from this, there was another factor that complicated matters. With very few exceptions, fraternities would invariably employ Gentile students in preference to Jews. The Jewish student was, then, "up against it," with very few prospects of obtaining satisfactory employment.

I was acquainted with several Jewish boys who, having tried in vain to obtain work, lived on milk and bread all the year 'round rather than give up their efforts to obtain an education.

After much difficulty, I finally got work in a fraternity house, but soon learned that if I wanted to hold the job, I had to be a little better and do a little more work than my Gentile friend. With that thought ever present, I managed to retain the position all year and was successful in making both ends meet. I welcomed vacation time, not because I would have the opportunity of resting, but because I had a chance to work and earn a little money, so that I might be better equipped to start the next semester.

All Work and No Play

For the next three years my experiences were simply a repetition of those in my freshman year, only they became less arduous as I made more acquaintances in town. Excessive work, with little or no recreation, preventing my proper physical development, gradually lowered my resistance and paved the way for a hospitable reception of Tuberculosis.

In 1917 I climbed another step in the ladder of ambition and was awarded a university degree. With a little vacation at this period I might have been prepared to shoulder the burdens that were to follow. For financial reasons, however, I could not afford a rest, and so I immediately obtained a position with one of the big eastern railroads.

Realizing the opportunity that was open to those who made good, I put every ounce of energy and interest into my work.

This sudden exertion, coming as it did after four years of physical and mental excesses, seemed to give the Tuberculosis Bacillus added courage, and it lost no time in taking advantage of the opportunity. The immediate effects of its work were readily discernible. I grew pale and haggard, ran temperature and lost in weight from day to day.

Gets the Doctor's Verdict

When the railroad physician discovered that I had been working continually with 101° fever, he advised me to stop immediately. I took his advice, went home, and was diagnosed as a moderately advanced case of tuberculosis.

The physician who examined me, being a personal friend, informed me of the National Jewish Hospital at Denver and urged me strongly to fill out an application for admission. I lost no time and four days later I set foot on Denver soil, with the same determination to get well as I previously had to obtain an education. After a little chat with the superintendent, I was directed to the hospital ward, where a nurse put me to bed and made me feel as comfortable as possible. With such pleasant surroundings and kindly treatment I soon became unconscious of my illness and readily contracted the spirit of optimism that prevailed among the other patients.

The wholesome meals, the pure, fresh air and the continual rest, which is the prescribed treatment, soon made their effects noticeable in my generally improved condition and my outward appearance. I gained 25 pounds in

THE PRESIDENT'S ILLNESS

To the prayers of a host of sympathizers and well-wishers we join ours that the illness which has befallen the chief magistrate of our country may be of short duration, and that ere long he may regain his health and vigor to do the great things in the midst of which he was prostrated.

At a time like this it were indelicate to wish that he might have refrained from overtaxing his strength, that he might have chosen to direct the peace negotiations from Washington rather than from Paris, or that he might have refrained from his speaking tour. We may take it that the President was inspired by a high sense of duty, into which calculations as to personal comfort and convenience were not suffered to enter. His task, imposed by unique world conditions, required not only courage and moral strength, of which he possessed a superabundance, but also bodily vigor which, alas, broke under the strain.

We are beginning to realize what a stupendous expenditure of nervous force the duties of the Presidential office require, even in normal times. But President Wilson has had problems to deal with that took in a world out of gear and, in their perspective, years ahead of the present emergency.

No Criticism of Senate

It is not our business to find fault with the opposition in the Senate. Undoubtedly these gentlemen likewise acted from a high sense of duty.

Nor is it to the point to deplore the unnecessary injection of personal ill will which, perhaps, more than anything else, had to do with the President's breakdown. Strong men are known to make enemies, and the higher the position, the more numerous they are. There are some persons who pride themselves upon their ability to handle the human element to their own satisfaction and to wheedle the recalcitrant around to their own views. Yet, it is done at a sacrifice of the finer instincts of morality.

What is uppermost in the minds of the American people, aye, of an expectant world, is, aside from the purely human sympathy that goes out to the suffering mortal, the consciousness that this man, chained by sickness, has a task to perform right now that none other can do. The world is boasting of democracy. Yet here in the most democratic country it is the one man whose absence from his desk that puts the whole machinery of world adjustment well nigh out of commission.

Found America in Tumult

President Wilson came back from Paris believing that he got as much as it was possible to get under the circumstances. He brought back an instrument which was the best attainable. To his mind it safeguarded American interest and insured world pacification. He found great unrest in the country. He knew that much of it might be allayed by a speedy return to peace conditions and that again it was part of a world condition to be accepted as the inevitable consequence of the disastrous catastrophe. The high cost of living, the scarcity of dwelling accommodations, profiteering and gouging, strikes and mob lawlessness—all of these in a peculiar entanglement of cause and effect, and each of these requiring immediate attention.

But there he lies on his sick bed. His speedy and full recovery must be the wish of every true American, of every lover of human kind. We pray and hope that we may soon see him immersed in public business, with just a bit of caution that he do not overstrain, but otherwise with enough strength of body to do the things that are of immediate concern to all of us.

For his has been the singular opportunity to be just to the conquered, and at the same time watchful over the interests of the conquerors; a friend of labor, yet ready to curb all excessive dictation; above all the protagonist of small nations and of subjected and repressed minorities.

THE DIVORCE EVIL

Our friends of the Episcopal Church at their recent convention in Detroit had their differences about one of their canons concerning the remarriage of the innocent party after a divorce. The matter concerns members of other religious denominations.

Whether we Jews are affected in the same alarming proportion as others is questionable. Nevertheless, divorce is becoming more frequent even among us. It shows how little our family purity, on which we prided ourselves, was grounded in racial temperament. For the race is the same today, but it lacks the discipline to which, in the past, it was submitted.

But whether we are directly interested in the question or no, as religious men and as American citizens we are vitally concerned in all that tends to weaken the family. It is not for us to hark back to ancient authority, though no one will gainsay its weight. We had our stricter teachers whose view coincided, for example, with the law on the statute books of the state of New York, and the milder jurists who would approve of the law of the state of Nevada. What is important to consider is the immediate conditions surrounding us.

The state judiciary grants divorces. No other body is competent to do so. Our orthodox brethren may insist on a superdocument issued in accordance with ancient prescription. But the court decree alone is valid. The unorthodox among us are satisfied to leave divorce proceedings entirely to the courts. But inasmuch as the state still authorizes ministers of religion to perform marriage ceremonies, the religious celebrant must fall back upon the laws or canons of his religious denomination when it comes to remarrying a divorced person.

The Minister's Problem

It is true, he is an agent of the state; but he is so not as a private individual, but solely as a minister of religion. He pronounces man and woman joined in wedlock, not merely according to the laws of a certain state, but also in accordance with the law of God as interpreted by his denomination. Where the laws concerning forbidden degrees of consanguinity clash, he cannot contravene the state law; but where the state law, for example, tolerates the marrying of a deceased brother's wife, the Jewish minister must refrain. And when it comes to marrying divorced persons, the Jewish minister ought to consider whether by mere acquiescence in a court decree he is not encouraging an evil which may undermine the structure of family life.

By performing the marriage ceremony he lends religious sanction to the secular decree of divorce which was antecedent. His position as a religious guide ought to counsel prudence. He should inform himself upon the character of the dissolution of the previous marriage. The stricter view and the milder view both have solid grounds to stand on; the lenient minister will recall the fact that human nature is as it is, that graver evils may ensue if divorce is made more difficult.

But there is no blinking the fact that divorce is much too much on the increase, that marriage is entered upon too lightly and severed just as facilely, that men and women consider only their own selves, their own pleasures and conveniences, and forget that the children are the innocent sufferers of rash acts. All religious denominations ought to unite on pressing upon the state legislatures or upon Congress the need of uniform laws of marriage and divorce. It should not be tolerated that what is unlawful in one state is lawful in another.

Guardian of Conscience

Even so, the minister's duties remain in force. He is the guardian of the conscience of his people. That conscience is the outgrowth of the ages. It is laid down in written codes. Above all, his is the preventive function. He cannot too strongly, albeit delicately, preach purity, continence, forbearance. He must instil in the minds of his younger charges the conviction that marriage is a social institution, a service to society, that it is sanctified by God, and that the altar of God weeps because of rash dissolutions.

Sometimes a wise judge succeeds in effecting a conciliation; should not the minister of religion intervene cautiously, prudently, with all the prestige attaching to his position? Here is a pastoral duty of no mean signficance. No minister will meddle with the domestic affairs of a parishioner. But he ought to show that he invites confidences.

The Jewish minister can no longer entrench himself behind the racial immunity, which we fear is fast disappearing. He must face the conditions of today, of metropolitan life, of the momentary unrest in the wake of the war, of radical teachings in factory and parlor alike. The dead letter will not help much. He must act not as some authority did under different conditions, but as that same authority would act if with us today.

Thus the chain with the past is not broken, but rather maintained, and the conscience of past and present is made one on all the vital issues which concern life, society and the family in a changing world.

A Man Without Pity

Rockford, Ill., Newspaper Publishes Stinging Rebuke to Merchant Who Insulted Delegation Seeking Relief for Starving Jews in Poland

The following editorial, published by the Republic, of Rockford, Ill., in its issue of October 30, requires no comment. The editor sought to impress upon the offender the meaning of what he had done, but the most telling indictment is the man's own words.

"But there are 3,000,000 Jews—men, women and children—starving in war-ravaged Poland!"

"I don't give a damn. I wouldn't care if every Jew on the face of the earth would starve to death. There's the door."

The first statement was made by Mr. Edgar E. Bartlett, publisher of the Register-Gazette, and Mr. Louis Burke, West State street optician.

The rejoinder came from Mr. A. C. Deming, wealthy store proprietor of West State street.

Mr. Bartlett has known Mr. Deming for thirty years. They have called each other by their first names. It was like a blow between the eyes, to receive this bitter reply to a plea for starving babes and to be shown the door.

Mr. Louis Burke, a Jew, went out of the store broken-hearted, crushed, humiliated.

Later in the day Mr. Deming went to the Register-Gazette to explain that he did not mean the "door" for Mr. Bartlett, but for Mr. Burke.

Mr. Bartlett unloosed the vocabulary of mercy outraged and talked to Mr. Deming as only a friend knows how to talk when he stands in the presence of cruel, bitter misanthropy.

Makes Peace-Offering

Mr. Deming offered $5 as a peace-offering to help feed 3,000,000 starving children, women and men in Poland.

As a solicitor for the Jewish Relief committee Mr. Bartlett had not the right to refuse to receive the money. He tendered it to the general committee of thirteen prominent citizens in session last night. He did it with trembling voice as he explained the circumstances.

Sheer amazement held the committee tongue-tied,—for a moment, but the following letter, accompanying Mr. Deming's $5, is today being sent the donor:

"Mr. A. C. Deming, City.

"Dear Sir: Your remark, 'I don't give a damn. I wouldn't care if every Jew on the face of the earth would starve to death,' and your treatment of two of our solicitors were reported tonight to thirteen prominent citizens representing Protestants, Catholics and Jews in the joint committee of the Jewish Relief society.

"We wish you to know that we feel that we would be doing ourselves and the pitiful victims in Europe a grave injustice were we to accept your contribution. We return it with a calm pity and a deep wonder that any man in this age and land can feel such sentiments.

"We sincerely trust that on reflection you will realize that you have done yourself as well as your fellowmen a gross injustice. Your $5 has been covered by us so that there will be no loss to the starving children in Poland.

"Jewish Relief Committee."

There are 15,000,000 Hebrews in the world today. Of these 6,000,000 are in Poland; 3,000,000 of them are starving and unless America comes to the rescue, all of us—Jew and Gentile alike—hundreds of thousands of little babies will be dead by next spring.

By the accidents of race these folks are Jews. By the deep command of creation they are human. And they are starving.

These are the people Mr. Deming damns. But it is as well to remember, Mr. Deming, that these people gave to the world the church through whose doors you enter to worship; out of the loins of a Jewish mother came the Jesus of Nazareth, the Prince of Peace, whom we suppose you believe in. You are undertaking a tremendous responsibility when you profess willingness to let these people starve.

A Friend of a Hundred Years Ago

In Tribute to George Eliot, Novelist, Born on Nov. 22, 1819, Whose "Daniel Deronda" Gave to English Fiction Its First Adequate Characterization of the Jews; a Review of the Book Itself and of Its Author's Life

ONE hundred years ago, on Nov. 22, Mary Ann (or Marian) Evans, known to the world of letters as George Eliot, was born. Fifty-seven years later, at the zenith of a career which stamped her the greatest of English women novelists, she published Daniel Deronda.

This sympathetic and yet penetrating romance of the descendants of Israel is destined to live always in the memory of Jews, for it was as epochal in the literature of the English tongue, wherein it touched our race, as historically were the exodus from Egypt and the Babylonish captivity. It stood forth especially conspicuous against a background of ridicule and calumny, fashioned by the hands of Shakespeare, Sheridan, Scott, Carlyle, Browning, Thackery, Dickens and lesser notables, which was, perhaps, why it was so little comprehended.

It stirred, in any event, the fiercest controversy of any of the author's works — a noteworthy circumstance, since several of her novels, particularly Romola, had previously impelled the literati to no inconsiderable zeal of pen.

Though Oscar Browning declared it the greatest of her books, and his view was shared by a few others, by far the majority of the critics described Daniel Deronda as "unreal." Mordecai was called "a bore," his dream of restoring the nationality of the Jews "fantastical," and even Deronda himself was not spared the appellations of "an amiable monomaniac" and "a prosy moralist."

Jews Saw Its Worth

It remained for Jews, whom, of all authors in English, George Eliot was the first to depict in the several complexions of personality, agreeable and otherwise, which are the heritage of all races, to appreciate contemporaneously the true merit of her achievement. While Gentile reviewers were bickering whether the shortcomings of Daniel Deronda were to be laid at the door of George Henry Lewes—to whose alleged pernicious influence they had attributed certain faults in Adam Bede, the most popular of the great novelist's efforts—Joseph Jacobs wrote in Macmillen's Magazine:

"The critics have had their say; the recording angels of literature, more sorrowful than angry, have written down Daniel Deronda a failure.

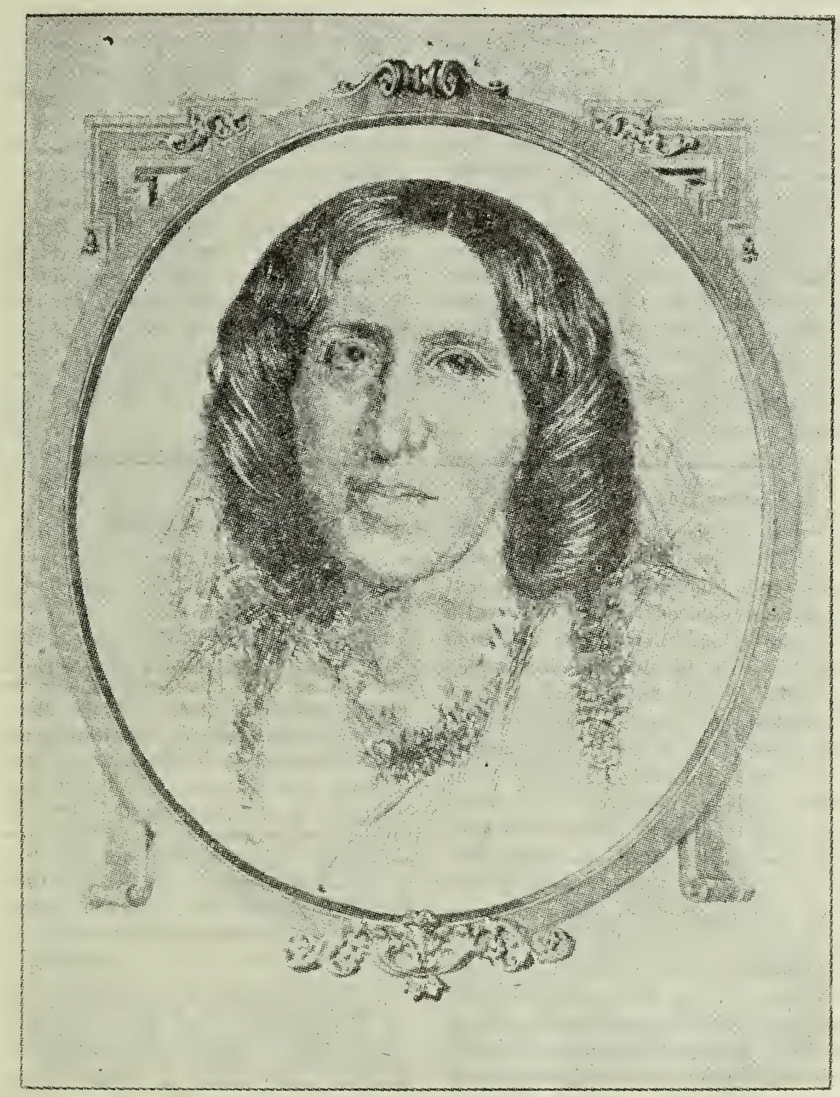
"Mr. Bagehot has told us that the greatest pain man can feel is the pain of a new idea, and the readers of Daniel Deronda have refused painfully to assimilate the new idea of the Mordecai part of the books.

A Shock to Christians

"This idea we take to be that Judaism stands on the same level as Christianity, perhaps even on a higher level, in point of rationality and capacity to satisfy the wants of the religious consciousness, 'the hitherto neglected reality,' to use the author's own words (ii, 292), 'that Judaism is something still throbbing in human lives, still making for them the only conceivable vesture of the world.'

"The difficulty of accepting this new idea comes out most prominently in the jar most readers must have felt in the omission of any explanation of the easy transition of Deronda from the Christianity, in which he was bred, to the Judaism into which he had been born.

"Hitherto the Jew in English fiction has fared unhappily, being always represented as a monstrosity, most frequently on the side of malevolence and greed, as in Marlowe's Barabas and Dickens' Fagin, or, sometimes, as in Dicken's Riah, still more exasperatingly on the side of impossible benevolence. What we want is truth, not exaggeration, and truth George Eliot has given us with the large justice of the great artist.



OUR FRIEND, GEORGE ELIOT
A novelist who defied the prejudices of her day to write of the Jew as he was—and is. In "Daniel Deronda" her representation of Jewish life is one of the greatest achievements of English literature.

Her Characterization Exact

"The gallery of Jewish portraits contained in Daniel Deronda gives in a marvelously full and accurate way all the many sides of our complex national character. The artistic element, with the proper omission of painting and sculpture, in which Jews, though eminent, have not been pre-eminent, is well represented by Klesmer, Mirah and the Alcharisi.

"Ezra Cohen is a type of the commonplace Jew, the familiar figure of prosperous mercantile dealing, the best-known trait of Jews to Englishmen; while little Jacob exhibits in a very humorous form the well-known precocity of Jewish children. The affectionate relations of Ezra Cohen and his mother and the tender respect of Mordecai and Mirah for the memory of theirs, point to the exceptional influence of the mother and the home in the inner life of Jews.

"Then in Kalonymos, whom we feel tempted to call the Wandering Jew, we got the nomadic spirit which has worked in Israel from times long previous to the Dispersion, while all must join in the scorn the author evidently feels for Pash, the Jew who is no Jew. Yet he is the representative of what might be called the Heine side of Jewry—the wit and cynicism that reached their greatest intensity in the poet of Young Germany.

Gideon a Plastic Type

"The more temperate Gideon represents, it is to be feared, a large proportion of English Jews, one not ashamed of his race, yet not proud of it, and willing to see the racial and religious distinctions we have fought for so valiantly die out and perish utterly among men. Perhaps the most successful of the minor portraits is that of the black sheep, Lapidoth, the Jew with no redeeming love for family, race or country to preserve him from that sordid egoism—the new name for wickedness—into which he has sunk. His utter unconsciousness of good and evil is powerfully depicted in the masterly analysis of his state of mind before purloining Deronda's ring.

"To some extent the weird figure of the Alcharisi serves as a sort of companion-picture of female renunciation of racial claims, but the struggle between her rebellious will and what old-fashioned folk call thhe Will of God (Professor Clifford would perhaps name it the Tribal Will) raises her to a tragic height which makes Deronda's mother perhaps the most imposing figure in the book.

"Deronda himself, by the circumstance of his education, is prevented from typifying any of the social distinctions of a Jew, yet it is not unlikely that his gravity of manner and many-sided sympathy were meant by the author to be taken as hereditary traits.

"So much for the outer life of Judaism. The English reader will find here no idea so startlingly novel as to raise opposition to its admission.

"But the new idea of which we have spoken is embodied in the person of Mordecai Brown, the Jew par excellence of the book, the embodiment of the inner life of Judaism. The very fact of this recognition of an inner life, not to speak of the grand personality in which she has typified it, entitled George Eliot to the heart-deep gratitude of all Jews; the more so inasmuch as she has hazarded and, at least temporarily, lost success for her most elaborate production, by endeavoring to battle with the commonplace and conventional ideas about Judaism.

Like All Great Leaders

"Those who know anything of the great leaders of spiritual Judaism will recognize in Mordecai all the traits that have characterized them. Saul of Tarsus, Ibn Gebirol (Avicebron), Jehuda Halevi, Ibn Ezra, Maimonides, Abrabanel, Spinoza, Mendelssohn (not to mention other still more unfamiliar names) were all men like Mordecai—rich in inward wealth, yet content to earn a scanty livelihood by some handicraft; ardently spiritual, yet keenly alive to the claims of home affection; widely erudite, yet profoundly acquainted with human nature; mystics, yet with much method in their mysticism.

"There is still another quality which Mordecai shares with the sages and prophets of the past—he is a layman. The natural thing for a writer describing 'a spiritual destiny embraced eagerly in youth,' a representative of the religious life of a nation, would be to describe some young priest ardently striving for the spiritual enlightment of his flock, some Mr. Tryan, some Savonarola; and it would have been right for all other religions.

Prophets, Too, Were Laymen

"But in Judaism the inner development of the Spirit has been carried on almost entirely by laymen—the Jewish Summa Theologiae, 'The Guide to the Perplexed' (More Nebouchin) of Maimonides, was written by a physician. We shall be using more familiar illustrations when we remind the reader that Moses and, above all, the prophets, were men from the lay community, not members of an organized priesthood. A 'nation of shopkeepers' has produced a Milton, a Shelley, a Newman; a 'nation of pawnbrokers,' if you will, has given birth to a Jehuda Halevi, a Spinoza, a Mordecai.

"To believers in the principle of heredity, this would be enough to give to Mordecai that possibility which is sufficient for artistic existence. English critics, however, seem not to believe in hereditary influences; they have unanimously pronounced him an impossibility. They require, it would appear, some more tangible proof of the existence among modern Jews of a character like Mordecai's than the a priori probability afforded by the consideration of the historic continuity of national character.

A Prototype Is Found

"Even this want could be supplied. The present writer was fortunate enough to discover traces of a Jew who, allowing for the idealization which is the privilege of the artist, might well stand for the prototype of Mordecai. . . .

"We have laid so much stress upon the artistic truth of Mordecai's character because, if this be granted, it is

Theatres Stop Slurs at the Jews

Anti-Defamation League Succeeds in Having Vaudeville Act Censored and Objectionable Advertising Matter Withdrawn From Circulation

WITH the opening of theatres for the winter season, incidents in several performances slurring the Jews or tending to hold them up to ridicule were reported to the Anti-Defamation League, which throughout the summer had waged a signally successful battle against discrimination in summer resorts.

Prompt action to suppress the objectionable scenes was taken, and proved effective.

Glen Edmunds and Rogers Jack in a vaudeville act, ''The Two Black Hawks,'' at the Columbia Theatre, Huntington, W. Va., sought to create laughter by giving an imitation of a Jewish dance in which they stamped their feet and shouted ''Get the money—get the money—get the money!''

Complaint was immediately made to the Gus Sun Booking Exchange Co., through which the act was booked. We quote from their reply:

''At no time is it our intention to have any act defame any religious faith. As you know, it is impossible for us to see more than fifty per cent of the acts personally, but if at any time anything of this kind is called to our attention, we immediately take steps to rectify it, the same as will be done in this case.''

The Indianapolis Star, in the August 12 issue, published a picture entitled ''A Jewish Kiss'' which brought compaints from Jewish residents of the city. Complaint was made to the Shubert Theatrical Company, which replied as follows:

''The cut is obnoxious and objectionable, first because it is indecent and second because it is defamatory. The picture from which this cut was made did not come from this office. We are wiring our advertising agent asking him to explain the appearance of this picture in the press.''

At the same time the League received a letter from the advance agent, expressing regret because of the incident, explaining that he was not responsible for the picture and advising that he would destroy all copies of the pictures in the possession of producing companies.

Upon further investigation it was found that the dramatic editor of the Indianapolis Star was responsible for the appearance of the picture. The matter was called to the attention of the editors of the paper, who expressed regrets and gave assurance that great care would be taken in all such matters in future.

inexplicable that the central incident of the Jewish part of Daniel Deronda, the meeting on the bridge between him and Deronda, should have failed to strike readers as perhaps the most remarkable incident in English fiction.

''If Mordecai has artistic reality, we contend that the meeting on the bridge in Chapter XL reaches a tragic intensity which almost transcends the power of the novel, and would perhaps require the manifold emotive inlets of the Wagnerian drama to do it justice—eye, ear, brain and heart should all be responsive. We boldly deny greater tragic intensity to any incident in Shakespeare.''

In what mood and manner, then, did George Eliot approach this epochal undertaking?

''Daniel Deronda is the most elaborate of her productions,'' says Dr. Edward N. Calish in his book, The Jew in English Literature. ''As she spent months in Florence seeking the material and the atmosphere to create a Savonarola, so she spent months in the study of Judaism and of the Jewish people, their customs and habits of life.

Letter to Mrs. Stowe

''In a letter to Harriet Beecher Stowe she wrote: 'As to the Jewish element in Deronda, I expected from first to last, in writing it, that it would create much stronger resistance, and even repulsion, than it has actually met with. But precisely because I felt that the usual attitude of Christians toward Jews is—I hardly know whether to say more impious or more stupid when viewed in the light of their professed principles—I therefore felt urged to treat the Jews with such sympathy and understanding as my nature and knowledge could attain to.' ''

How expressive of her character were the closing lines of that missive!

In The Mill on the Floss, published in 1860, is to be found a partial exposition; for in the impetuous, proud, highly sensitive Maggie Tulliver, the first necessity of whose soul is a passionate devotion to some one person, there exists the protype of the author. But a wider viewpoint is possible; and it is understandable only with a knowledge of George Eliot's life.

Story of Her Career

Born at Arbury farm, in Warwickshire, the daughter of Robert Evans, agent of the estate of Sir Francis Newdegate, she received her education in the schools of the countryside, where religious principles conforming to the Christian perceptions of the time likewise were inculcated; the latter, however, were more deeply impressed by her father, who apparently was a man of considerable intellect.

Upon the sensitive mind of George Eliot his preachments made a profound impression and, coupled with the fact that she found ample opportunity for study, it followed that she became a devout adherent of her church. But a reversal of her attitude was to occur. Her mother having died and her sister married, she accompanied her father to Coventry in 1841, where she won the friendship of Mr. and Mrs. Charles Bray and Charles Hennell, all of whom were critical toward Christianity.

In the twenty two year-old girl these associates inspired independent habits of thought which led to agnosticism and, it seems, to frequent clashes with her father, whose not always moderate rebukes proved, nevertheless, unavailing. The Brays and Hennell turned George Eliot's attention likewise to letters, and in 1844, with a translation, began her career—a career which was to bring her into association with Herbert Spencer, Carlyle, Froude and Lewes.

Lewes Her Inspiration

Lewes exercised in the life of the novelist the most important of influences, for in him she found the recipient her nature required for the full wealth of its affection. Lewes had separated from his wife in circumstances which precluded divorce, but an intimacy was established, construed by both the novelist and himself as marriage. Whether Lewes' companionship was, as some critics suggest, pernicious in certain directions, it must be conceded to have been the major prop on which the genius of George Eliot rested. It was Lewes who inspired her with confidence in herself; Lewes who shielded her from unpleasant persons and from unfriendly or even inapt criticism, the reading of which would make her ill for days; Lewes to whom she turned for compensation when the informality of their relation alienated many of her acquaintances. And in 1856, three years after their association began, appeared the first of George Eliot's novels, The Sad Fortunes of the Reverend Amos Barton.

One may well conceive the semi-isolation of their life and its effect upon the author's mind—profoundly studious, highly analytical, but, for all of that, more absorbed in the elementals of men's consciousness than in the facets ground by the petty transactions of her day.

That situation accounted in a sense, no doubt, for the failure of Daniel Deronda; it makes plain also the commercial reverses which attended the appearance of Romola, the most ambitious of her work, by some critics declared the greatest historical novel ever written. Its scene was laid in the Florence of Savonarola and the Renaissance, and it represented—as did Daniel Deronda—protracted periods of intense study; yet such Italian scholars as Browning, Rosetti and William Strong pronounced it unreal.

Of late the more enlightened thought of Christians has given to George Eliot's narrative of the Jews the praise to which its merit entitles it.

The Talmud

upon, all went to feed the flames, even Bibles were not respected.

Penalty of death was decreed against everyone who would conceal a copy of the Talmud. This happened under the milder regime of Pope Julius. Worse times were in store for the Jews, when Paul IV ascended the throne of Peter. He has been without doubt the most cruel, the most fanatical, and the most ruthless persecutor of the Jews, from among all the popes. He reduced them to absolute beggary and drove them out of Rome, but he could not longer destroy the Talmud, for there were no more copies left to be destroyed in Italy.

The result was the downfall of learning and intellect. But the Jews could not do then without the Talmud as little as they could in former times. True, the Reformation destroyed the Inquisition in Germany, but the persecution of the Jews remained permanent.

It has taken more than 300 years before the Jews in Germany were emancipated. Still the Jews ventured upon a new edition of the Talmud. A new Pope Pius IV had succeeded Paul, and he allowed the printing of the Talmud with another name instead on the title page, hence the title Gemara on all subsequent editions, and he also insisted on having all the passages left out which had been struck out by the censor. Thus appeared the mutilated Edition of Basel, 1578-80. A book has been compiled in modern times which contains all the passages which were left out in that, and in all the editions which follow it, so many passages were struck out.

Russian Editions Deleted

The changes and alterations in it are often very stupid. Instead of ''Goy'' they put ''Akum'' (worshiper of stars and planets); nay, the whole tractato of Abodah Zarah was entirely left out, as if everything written against heathen in any way meant Christians. With the exception of the edition of Amsterdam all the other editions of the Talmud have retained the imprint of these censors, and the mutilation is continued still in all the recent editions printed in Russia.

The times changed but the spirit of intolerance was still rampant, and over and again new old accusations have been raised against the Talmud. In the year 1700 appeared the monster pamphlet of Eisenmenger, two volumes of about 1,000 pages full of all the legends and tales and sayings he could get hold of, which he twisted and turned, and to which he gave a hostile interpretation.

Unable like his predecessors to appreciate these flowers of poetry from Israel's garden, he was still less able to cull them. He was also assisted by the hands of former Jews. To this pamphlet the modern libelers recur for information, and the modern Briemans, Rohling, Drumond are indebted to Eisenmenger and his predecessors, of whom I have mentioned a few, for everything they pretend to know about the Talmud.

Shortly after the appearance of Eisenmenger's libel and instigated by the renegade, Joseph Jacob, the Government of Kustrin in Prussia ordered the confiscation of the Talmud on the same plea, that it contained blashphemies against the Christian faith. Being appealed to by the Jews, King Frederic ordered the immediate release.

Attacked by Frankists Jews

The century was not to close, however, without witnessing another and, let us hope, the last auto-da-fe of the Talmud. This time the tragedy takes place in Poland. The accusers are the Frankists Jews, who had believed that Sabbathai Zebi was the promised Messiah, whose prophet was a certain Frank and whose sacred book was the Zohar. This they placed high above the Talmud. They formed themselves into the anti-Talmudic sect, who soon resorted to unscrupulous transgressions of the Law.

Being persecuted by the Jews as heretics, the Frankists appealed for help to the Archbishop of Kounenke, alleging that they were almost Christians and that they were believing in the Trinity and they declared that the Talmud was not only a book full of blasphemies, but that it was the cause of the stiff-neck madness of the Jews preventing them from embracing Christianity. Upon these points they wanted to discuss publicly with the Talmudists.

Bishop Dembook convoked a public meeting at Kamenetz, where the scenes enacted were almost a literal copy of those enacted in Spain, when Geronimo de Santa Fe, alias Joshua Lorki, stood up as the public accuser of the Talmud. The result in Poland in the eighteenth century was identical with that in Spain in the fifteenth century. The Bishop declared the Talmudists as vanquished, and the Talmud was accordingly condemned to the fire.

The Frankists, assisted by the monks and police, searched everywhere after copies of the condemned book and many thousands were burned publicly by the hangman in 1757 in Kamenetz.

Concerning Modern Critics

This was so far the last of a long series of attempted destructions. Jewish hands fanned the flames and brought together the wood for the pile on which to burn the most wonderful book in the world, the Bible, of course, excepted.

If pyres and stakes are not built now for the Talmud, it is nevertheless again held up to public execration by men like the renegade Brimanus, and his acolytes and assistants—Stocker, Rohling, Drumond and the host of similar agents of darkness. Their success will be the same as that of their predecessors. Their efforts and machinations are bound to fail in the future as they have failed in the past. Taft's Counsel to Jews is Patience

Former President Addresses Members in New Haven; Tribute is Paid to Those Who Served in War; Medals Bestowed

"IN longing and looking for the day when persecution and prejudice shall be no more, you Jewish people must have patience, patience, patience," was the warning which former President William Howard Taft gave his audience at the Victory night celebration held on Nov. 2 in the ball room of the Hotel Taft by Horeb Lodge No. 25, in honor of its 173 members who served in the war. With one or two exceptions all of these men were present and in addition to having been dined at Harmonie Hall earlier in the evening were given handsome service medals. Honor medals were also bestowed upon Mr. Taft, Col. Isaac M. Ullman and Col. Harry Cutler of Providence.

President Joseph Koletsky in a short speech paid a tribute to the boys who had served in the war, concluding his remarks by asking the returned members to stand by old Horeb as they had stood by Old Glory.

One of their number, George J. Bernstein, failed to return, having made the supreme sacrifice, and resolutions were adopted and a copy ordered sent to his family.

Honor Medal for Mr. Taft

After Charles H. Shapiro of Bridgeport, president of the New England District, had made a short speech, the arrival of Mr. Taft and Col. Ullman was announced and the entire assemblage arose and gave them an ovation which lasted several minutes.

After presenting one of the medals to Col. Ullman, Mr. Koletsky turned to the former president and in tendering another of the decorations called attention to the previous occasion when the Order had asked Mr. Taft to accept its recognition of his services—after the abrogation of the treaty with Russia.

The famous Taft "chuckle" was much in evidence when the former president commenced his speech of acceptance. "For," said Mr. Taft, "while I am deeply touched and greatly appreciate the honor which you have conferred on me, it seems to me that you are making much too much of those who stayed at home. I understood that this was to be a victory night for those who served abroad, and that doesn't include me."

Enemies of Oppression

Continuing, Mr. Taft said that the Jewish race had always fought against oppression wherever it existed, and then gave his warning as to having patience. "The evils are deeply imbedded," he said, "and needed some great catastrophe like the world war to make a change, after which will come a gradual restoration of justice and equality. I long for the league of nations and the ultimate protection of small peoples, and I rejoice for the future, as it is sure to work itself out for the good of mankind. The process may, yes, must, be of necessity slow, and we must not assume that everything is going to be done at once, so once again I counsel patience."

The speaker concluded by saying to the returned boys that the breadth of character which their experiences had brought them had made them better men, better members of Horeb and better citizens. Mr. Taft received another ovation as he left the hall with the colonel.

San Francisco, Calif.

Enthusiastic over the work of the B'nai B'rith lodges in the cities of the Pacific Northwest, Grand President Milton Meyer of District Grand Lodge No. 4 and members of his official party are back in San Francisco after an official tour of the northwestern portion of the jurisdiction.

Accompanying the Grand President on the trip were Mrs. Meyer, Grand Orator Edgar C. Levey and Mrs. Levey. They were away several weeks.

Among the most notable actvities of the B'nai B'rith which won the commendation of the Grand President were the immigrant aid and Americanization endeavors of the lodges in the Northwest, especially in Portland, Seattle and Vancouver. He told of the importance of this work and of the big results it is accomplishing in helping co-religionists who reach America as strangers in a strange land.

Strongly impressed was the Grand President, also, in the fact that in the various cities visited all activities and interests of a Jewish character radiated from the headquarters of the B'nai B'rith and that the lodges were keeping alive the sparks of Judaism.

In all twelve cities were visited by the party. These were Portland, Aberdeen, Bellingham, Vancouver, Victoria, Seattle, Spokane, Butte, Billings, Denver, Salt Lake City and Reno. In each community the grand president and his companions were accorded rousing ovations. Special meetings were called in honor of the grand president and grand orator. Conferences were held with Jewish leaders of each community to discuss B'nai B'rith activities and the work of the Order throughout the district.

Our Race an Asset

"One significant fact impressed me particularly on this trip," said Grand President Meyer. "That is that wherever our people are proclaiming their Judaism they are receiving the highest respect in their respective communities and holding high positions. And where they are indifferent about their Judaism, their position in the community is of no great importance."

Conditions in the cities visited were found to be "unusually good," Grand President Meyer reported, and he declared the Jewish people were taking care of their local problems. He said:

"I was deeply gratified to find that in the various cities all things Jewish are radiating from the B'nai B'rith lodges.

"In cities where no synagogues now are maintained, steps are being taken to provide them, and the inspiration to do this is coming from the B'nai B'rith.

"Our lodges are keeping alive the sparks of Judaism and are bringing our people of all elements together on common ground."

Visit Denver Hospital

The grand president and his party stepped over the bounds of the jurisdiction to visit the Jewish Hospital for Consumptives at Denver, which was established by the B'nai B'rith and since has had the B'nai B'rith for its chief patron. The patients were addressed by the grand president and grand orator.

"It is an institution of which we all can be proud," said Grand President Meyer.

The grand president and grand orator planned to visit Stockton, Sacramento and other cities later.

On Monday evening, Oct. 13, President and Mrs. Meyer were given an ovation by the two San Francisco auxiliaries at the B'nai B'rith hall. The receiption was in the form of a Succoth festival. An interesting program was presented and a large attendance was present.

Ophir Lodge No. 21 gave a dinner dance on Sunday evening, Oct. 26, at the Palace hotel in honor of President Meyer.

Nation's Heroes Feted

Members who have returned from the nation's service were guests of honor at an elaborate entertainment in the B'nai B'rith hall. Dr. Martin A. Meyer delivered an inspiring address. An entertaining program was presented, following which refreshments were served.

Boxes of goodies were sent as Rosh Ha Shonah gifts to Jewish soldiers at the Letterman General Hospital by members of the ladies' auxiliaries of the B'nai B'rith, who received the thanks of the Red Cross for the work.

The October issue of THE UNITY BULLETIN, the monthly publication of Unity Lodge No. 273, is a most creditable number, setting forth the activities of the lodge. It is filled with crisp lines of interest to the members and has a number of important announcements bearing on lodge work.

The lodge announces a whist party for Monday evening, Oct. 27.

McKeesport, Pa.

A rousing meeting of McKeesport Lodge No. 573 was held at Roth's hotel on Sunday morning, Oct. 19, for the purpose of furthering the drive for the Jewish Relief Fund, in which McKeesport lodge has taken a very prominent part. One of the most active members of the lodge, Brother Henry Friedman, is chairman of the Campaign committee.

St. Paul, Minn.

An open meeting of Minnesota Lodge No. 157 was held at St. Paul on the evening of Oct. 13. Miss Duke, formerly associated with the Federated Children's Bureau and now specialist on statistical research, on behalf of the Child Labor Committee, delivered a very interesting and instructive talk on the work of that body.

She emphasized the need of modern and scientific legislation, both federal and state, to correct abuses in the employment of children and urges also mothers' pension laws and compulsory education.

The meeting was well attended despite inclement weather. An entertaining musical program was also rendered. The meeting was presided over by Brother Sylvan E. Hess, chairman of the Intellectual Advancement committee of the lodge. Dancing completed the program.

The meeting was the first of a series of intellectual advancement meetings and social affairs which the lodge will hold during the coming season.

Bridgeport, Conn.

Harmony Lodge No. 711 staged a smoker as the first meeeting of the season, held on Tuesday, Oct. 14, at Harmony hall. Dr. Abraham Anspacher, rabbi of Temple Beth Israel of Hartford and vice-president of the Hartford lodge, delivered a brilliant address.

St. Louis, Mo.

The visit on Sunday, Oct. 19, of the Grand Lodge officers and general committee of District No. 2 was made the occasion of a series of entertainments and receptions.

In the morning Rabbi Leon Harrison, speaking of "The Purposes and Ideals of the B'nai B'rith," delivered a masterful address to the visiting officers and members of Ebn Ezra and Missouri lodges.

In the afternoon an automobile ride was provided for the visitors. The officers and the general committee were the guests of the local lodge at a dinner at the Columbian club in the evening. Following the dinner, a large reception was held in the ball room.

Sidney G. Kusworm, president of the District Grand lodge, addressed the assembly on "The Achievements and Future of the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith." Talks were also made by other officials of the district. The program included several musical numbers.

Spokane, Wash.

More than 300 persons were present at a meeting of Abraham Geiger Lodge No. 423 in the K. P. Hall on Thursday evening, Sept. 11. The meeting was held in honor of the visit of the Grand President and Mrs. Milton Meyer and Grand Orator and Mrs. Edgar C. Levey.

The president, Harry Cohen, introduced the district deputy, Brother Samuel Edelstein, who in turn introduced the district president. The latter was given an ovation.

President Meyer dwelt upon the activities of the Order, listing the institutions maintained and describing the Order's efforts to improve the Jews. Grand Orator Levey spoke on the ideals of the Order, showing the necessity for the existence of the B'nai B'rith, the members of which are able to perform such effective work.

The meeting was followed by a banquet prepared by the Ida Bloom Straus auxiliary. Talks were made by President Harry Cohen of Spokane lodge, Bros. Klinesmith, Capt. Max Newmann, Harry Rosenhaupt, J. A. Schiller and Past President Hyman Cohn.

The banquet was followed by a dance. Abraham Geiger Lodge has outlined an interesting program of activities for the coming season.

At the first fall meeting, held recently, seven candidates were proposed for membership and three candidates initiated. The publicity committee, headed by Brother Abr. E. Kye, announces that the lodge is in a flourishing condition and in excellent financial circumstances.

Springfield, Mass.

Springfield Lodge No. 684 has begun the publication of a lodge paper, THE LIVE WIRE. The paper lives up to its name and promises to arouse enthusiasm in lodge events. It is edited by Brother Isadore H. Horowitz, assisted by Brothers Henry Lasker, Dr. Myron Wessler and Ralph B. Boas.

THE LIVE WIRE announced a meeting on Monday evening, Oct. 13. It listed the petitions for membership and gave the names of those elected into the Order.

An interesting feature of the paper was the president's column, in which he enumerated members who had distinguished themselves in serving the Order.

Ft. Worth, Texas

Isidor Straus Lodge No. 519 announces that its regular meetings will now be held on the first and third Tuesdays of each month at the Hebrew Institute.

New Lodge Founded in California

Residents of Santa Rosa Obtain Charter; B'nai B'rith is Mainly Responsible for Ending Discrimination in U. S., New Haven Members Are Told

THE General Committee of District No. 4 at its last meeting was presented, through Brother Lucius L. Solomons, with a petition for a B'nai B'rith charter from residents of Santa Rosa, Sonoma county, Cal. Twenty persons had signed the document, but the number has since been augmented.

Brother Solomons was the Holy Days lecturer in the community, and it was in response to his eloquent appeal for Jewish ideals and Jewish life that the assemblage resolved to become part of the Order. Most of the petitioners being pioneers or busines men of established position, the request for a charter was granted forthwith.

A majority of the General committee went to Santa Rosa on Sunday, Oct. 12, and met the petitioners in conference, where the latter were made acquainted with the inner work of the Order, what was expected of them and what they might expect from the Grand Lodge. A preliminary organization was formed with Max Rosenberg, a leading merchant, as president, and Dave Rosenberg, his nephew, just returned from service in France, as secretary. The entire project was accepted with sincerity of purpose, and tangible proof was given that as new members they would be ready to shoulder all their burdens and responsibilities. The age and standing of the Jewish community is a guarantee of the permanency of the lodge.

Before the meeting a luncheon was served in the Occidental hotel, attended by the wives and daughters of the petitioners and several prominent non-Jews of Santa Rosa. Addresses were delivered by Brothers Solomons, Edmund Tauszky, Richard E. Gutstadt and Judge Sewell of the Superior Court of Sonoma county. The conference was afterwards addressed by President Meyer, Secretary Aschheim and Brother Newburgh. The installation of the lodge was set for Sunday, Nov. 2.

The selection of a name brought forth a contest between that of "Abraham" and "Bear Flag." The former name was to commemorate a pioneer, now deceased, named Abraham Jacobs, who for many years was the lay minister of the congregation, revered by the entire Santa Rosa population.

Everybody conversant with the early history of California knows of the "Bear Flag" incident at the old town of Sonoma in 1846, when a small party of Americans, with Gen. John C. Fremont at the head, proclaimed the independence of California from Mexico and raised the "Bear Flag" as their standard.

There was a tie vote and the question was allowed to rest with the understanding that, should it be found that an Abraham lodge was already in existence, "Bear Flag" would then be the choice. The gentlemen were informed that the executive committee objects to a duplication of names and declines to issue such charters. Since the meeting it has been learned that there is an Abraham lodge in District No. 1, consequently "Bear Flag" will stand.

Several of the petitioners came from the neighboring town of Petaluma, which now has even a larger Jewish population than Santa Rosa, and it is more than likely that those men will form the nucleus for a lodge in that thriving town.

New Haven, Conn.

That the B'nai B'rith is mainly responsible for the ending of discrimination against Jews in this country; that the aim of the Order is to mako better Americans and better Jews of newcomers to the United States and that every Grand President of the B'nai B'rith has received the commendation of the government for the splendid work the Order has done for the Jews' welfare, were the three principal points emphasiezd in an address delivered by Brother Chas. H. Shapiro, president of District Grand Lodge No. 1, at the first meeting of the fall season of Horeb Lodge No. 25.

The hall was crowded with an enthusiastic audience. While most of the time was consumed with speech-making, an elaborate program was set in motion which will pave the way for a busy season.

President Shapiro, at the conclusion of his talk, read a letter received from Booth Tarkington, in which the noted author said:

"I am much gratified and I should add that I think the work you are doing is of the utmost usefulness. In fact, I believe that just that sort of work is by all means the most important that can be done in America today. This country should be aroused to comprehend the need of it."

Other speakers included Morris D. Saxe of New Britain, Nestor Dreyfus of New London, S. Wagner of Stamford, M. A. Hartshall of Hartford, Benj. Kashman of Hartford, P. S. Silbert of Springfield, Dr. Myron Wessler and H. J. Weissman of Waterbury, Samuel Kampner of New Haven and Maxmilian Stein of Bridgeport.

Past District President Maurice P. Davidson spoke at the meeting of the lodge on Sunday evening, Sept. 28. At this meeting the announcement was made that the President of Horeb Lodge had brought in 130 members during the past three years.

Sunday evening, Oct. 12, was victory night at Horeb Lodge. The members were addressed by Hon. Herman Asher of New York, past president, and now treasurer of District No. 1.

"Horeb Lodge Pep" the paper edited for the lodge by Brother Joseph Koletsky assisted by Brothers Joseph H. Ullman, Abraham N. Friedman, Amster Spiro and Robert E. Hyman, announces in a most striking and interesting manner the various activities undertaken.

Portland, Ore.

Portland Lodge No. 65 held a splendid meeting on Tuesday, Sept. 23, at which Dr. Lawrence Selling, lately returned from France a major in the medical corps, delivered a most interesting and stimulating address.

Julian F. Langner, agricultural editor of THE JOURNAL, spoke on "Production and the High Cost of Living" at a meeting on Tuesday, Oct. 7.

Following the talk, a discussion on the work of the committees of the lodge took place. The speakers' bureau reported that among the speakers who would be in Portland this year were Dr. Martin A. Meyer of San Francisco, Dr. Stephen S. Wise of New York, and Miss Lillian Wald of New York.

A class of twelve candidates was initiated, bringing the membership of the lodge to 700.

Meetings are now held regularly on the first and third Tuesdays of the month. The Tuesday luncheons at the Chamber of Commerce provide excellent opportunities for putting the members in close contact with the work of the Order.

Portland Lodge is planning to inaugurate a state-wide campaign for work in the interest of the Jews. A very ambitious program has been drafted, which will be made public shortly. The following activities are announced at the B'nai B'rith Building:

Monday and Thursday evenings, men's gymnasium classes; Tuesday and Friday afternoons, junior classes; Wednesday night, social night; Tuesday and Saturday evenings, women's classes; Thursday afternoon, junior girls' classes.

All of the classes include swimming. This work is now in charge of an expert physical instructor for men and boys and a capable assistant for the women and girls.

The lodge arranged an exceptional affair in the nature of a Hallowe'en party for Tuesday evening, Oct. 28, at the B'nai B'rith building.

Chicago, Ill.

The regular monthly meeting of Oriental-Hilliel lodge was held on Monday evening, Oct. 6. The meeting was addressed by the President of the Order, Brother Adolf Kraus, and by Judge Hary M. Fisher of the Municipal Court, who appealed to the members for support in the B'nai B'rith campaign for the rehabilitation of the overseas members.

Brother Moses B. Levin, who had just returned from a trip abroad, painted a most vivid picture of conditions in Europe.

A new pace was set for the lodges in District No. 6 at this meeting, when Oriental-Hilliel lodge voted that hereafter an initiation fee of $15.00 would be charged all applicants. The lodge is also discussing the proposition of increasing the annual dues.

Ramah Lodge No. 33 still continues its program of initiating a class of members at every meeting. At the last meeting, on Oct. 13, eighteen new members were inducted into the Order. A number of applications for membership were presented. A letter was read from Brother Seelenfreund, secretary of the lodge, who is now in Europe on business of the Order.

Brother Seelenfreund described some of the conditions overseas and expressed the hope that he would be able to attend the next meeting.

Judge Harry M. Fisher made a stirring appeal for the war sufferers' fund and for the B'nai B'rith fund for its overseas members. The president appointed committees to raise funds for these drives.

David Fish Lodge No. 130 is planning to celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of the founding of the lodge, which will be attended by the two remaining charter members. The plans include a banquet, addresses by prominent members of the Order, and a reunion of all the lodge veterans.

Committees were appointed to raise funds for the B'nai B'rith rehabilitation fund and for the war relief campaign.

The lodge voted to charge an initiation fee of $15.00. It also plans to increase its annual membership dues.

Pittsburgh, Pa.

A huge banquet and entertainment was held on Sunday evening, Oct. 26, at the Hotel Schenley to celebrate the success of the recent membership drive inaugurated by Jericho Lodge No. 44. Brother Marcus Feuchtwanger, president of District No. 3, was tho guest of honor.

The occasion was used also to bid welcome members of the lodgo who had returned from service. The candidates who had been obtained as a result of the membership drive wero initiated.

New York City

Manhattan-Washington Lodge No. 19 conducted an outing to the B'nai B'rith Home for the Aged at Yonkers, N. Y., on Sunday, Oct. 12. A large group of members and their families attended. A pleasant program was provided and refreshments were served to the visitors and the inmates.

The first regular meeting of the winter season was held Wednesday evening, Oct. 22, at which plans were laid for a large membership drive.

Chananiah Lodge No. 165, at its last session, discussed the remodeling and putting into shape one of the rooms of the Yonkers home. This is part of the District No. 1 project to have each of the lodges take care of one apartment, the rooms thus remodeled to be named in honor of the lodge contributing the funds.

Chananiah Lodge is planning an entertainment and ball to be held on Jan. 17 at the Floral Gardens.

Another event of importance will be the memorial services to be conducted on Dec. 7 by Brother Henry Weiss, expresident of the Lodge and chairman of the Memorial Service committee.

Jackson, Mich.

David Heuman Lodge No. 809 held its first meeting of the winter season on Monday evening, Oct. 7. Three members were reinstated into the lodge and one new member initiated.

Rabbi Chas. J. Freund of Grand Rapids, Mich., delivered an interesting talk. The evening concluded with a luncheon and a smoker.

Cleveland, Ohio

Led by A. S. Deutsch, a group of young men and women have formed plans to study French. The course will be open to members of the B'nai B'rith and their friends and will consist mainly of French conversation.

A class in Hebrew and Hebrew literature is being organized for members of the B'nai B'rith at the request of a number of members.

Another course of study to be presented by the Cleveland Lodge will be a class in commercial law, conducted by the chairman of the commercial law committee, Brother Max B. Goodman. While it is not intended to make this essentially a law course, the aim of the leaders, who include some of the most prominent attorneys of Cleveland, will be to present the practical application of important legal principles to present-day business. The course will be presented in the form of round-table discussions.

Success is attending the efforts of the teams taking part in the B'nai B'rith membership campaign. The goal of Cleveland Lodge is 2,000 members. One team captain, Brother R. D. Haas, announced at one of the meetings that he alone had secured fifty new members.

To stimulate interest among the team workers, Brother Joseph Leronge said he would defray the expenses of a trip to Cincinnati to the world's series as a prize for the worker obtaining the largest number of new members.

The membership drive of Cleveland Lodge is under the direction of Brother E. E. Schwartz.

Newark, N. J.

A big initiation ceremony was held by Ezekiel Lodgo No. 90 at tho Temple Assembly hall on Wednesday evening, Oct. 27, to celebrate the success of the membership drive, for which Ezekiel Lodge received the commendation of the Grand Lodge. Brother Abraham Berkowitz, of Philadelphia, chairman of the Social Service committee of District No. 3, was the principal speaker.

The Inevitable Middle Course

A Scrutiny of the History of Judaism, Which, Though It Was Not Written With That Purpose in Mind, May Well Indicate the Manner in Which Political and Industrial Problems of the day Eventually Will Be Solved

By Dr. Max L. Margolis

"THIS TORAH is like unto two paths. The one is of fire and the other of ice. If we turn to the one, we shall burn to death; if we turn to the other, we shall freeze to death. What shall one do? Let him walk in the middle."

The counsel of our rabbis has nothing to do with the philosophers' direction to follow the mean. The latter has reference to the humdrum virtues and failings and savors of the prudential or utilitarian. The Preacher in Holy Writ gave utterance to this wisdom when he counseled men not to be over-righteous or overwicked, overwise or overfoolish. It amounts to diplomacy in morals. It inculcates holding oneself in control, having oneself well in hand. Such behavior insures success.

The rabbinic maxim occupies a higher plane. It has to do with religion. The religious sentiment is borne by enthusiasm, and the enthusiast will not listen to counsels of moderation. It is all in the temper of a man. The rabbis are not concerned with the individual. What they have in mind is clearly the system which is made the watchword of large followings, sects, parties. And the Torah is placed above the parties.

A living religion must have room for diverse courses, interpretations, points of view. The word of God in Israel has always been tripartite. Our collection of Sacred Scriptures is tripartite. The point is that all three are there, bound together in one volume, placed on an equal footing of authority.

The individual Israelite, in moments of uncertainty, in need of seeking authoritative advice, appealed for a decision to the instruction of the priest, the vision of the prophet, or the counsel of the wise man. The priest manipulated the divine oracle, or inspected the multitudinous scrolls for a precedent. The priest is always cool and collected. Everything for him is regulated by tradition. Ultimately he is convinced the rules emanate from the highest authority, from the ancient law-giver who was the mouthpiece of the Deity.

Rituals and Morals Blended.

Rules were laid down for the clean and unclean, the meat that might be partaken of and the meat forbidden, but also for vows and moral obligations, which were binding and which were not. The ritual and the moral were not at all distinguished. In either domain a soul might trespass and forfeit the divine pleasure.

The prophet is the born enthusiast. The priest always belongs to a body; the prophet may and may not belong to a school. Some sort of continuity obtains, but it is of the loose sort. The prophet seeks immediate contact with the spirit. There is something pathological about the gift of prophecy. The hand of the Lord was heavy upon the prophet; he was thrown into a fit of ecstacy which weakened his body. Jeremiah experienced it; Mohammed knew it. The prophet might be consulted by individuals; but for the most part he was the counselor of kings and men in high station, and his word was sought in critical moments of the nation's history.

The wise man is the forerunner of science. He, like the priest, falls back upon tradition, upon the searchings of the fathers. Human conduct was observed by generations. Wise maxims traveled from mouth to mouth and from nation to nation. Backed by experience, the wise man or the wise woman, as the case might be, gave counsel with a sureness and directness which equaled the prophetic insight.

View of Moderns Narrow.

Life is much more complex than the student of history is willing to concede. The great fault of the modern school of Bible scholars is that it neatly arranges the three parts of the Bible in chronological sequence. They really follow tradition, only in a different order. Tradition says, first came the Law, then the Prophets, and lastly, the Men of Wisdom. The modern says, first came the Prophets, then the Law and then the Men of Wisdom.

It were more to the point to place the law last, for when tradition places it first, it does not so much mean first in time as first in importance, and that means that the law succeeded to all the spiritual movements of ancient Israel. For the law held its position at the last; everything else was subordinated to it. The law-giver was prophet also, that is the law took over the greater part of the prophecy. Leviticus is priestly; Deuteronomy is surcharged with the prophetic element. And the same law of Deuteronomy gives itself out as the sum and substance of wisdom and understanding.

What is true, however, is this: that the priest's instruction and the prophet's vision and the wise man's counsel were contemporaneous, crossed and recrossed one another's paths. Bitter battles were fought between the three exponents of the divine will. At times one tendency prevailed, and at other times another. But the field was never held quite by one alone. Each was one-sided and each had an element of truth. But the whole truth was with none alone.

Torah in the Making.

Modern criticism tells us that the Torah is composite. So long as it merely dissects and does not build up, it fails to bring out the force that was operative in the make-up. It was not a mere matter of paste and scissors. The very composition would be proof that the Torah was meant to be an expression not of one or the other tendency, but of all the movements that stirred ancient Israel.

There were those that sought to bring the nation into close intercourse with the neighbors, the pluralists who stood for de-centralization, for treating Palestine as a province in a larger aggregate, and then there were the centralists who would withdraw the nation from all foreign contact and put it upon a footing of autonomous culture; and there were naturally those who worked for a reconciliation of the extremes.

No victory but it carries a partial defeat. If, therefore, centralization won out, it was not without concessions to the centrifugal element. Prophecy would rule the ritual out entirely: to what purpose were the costly sacrifices and the priestly paraphernalia and the hocus-pocus on the fast day? "Wash you; cleanse you; cease to do evil, learn to do good; love mercy, do justly; release the bonds of the oppressed." A sort of ethical culture.

Middle Position Victorious.

The priests answered by adding precept to precept, by telling people to visit the temple and give their best to the maintenance of its worship. The priest won out, you will say. But he had made peace with the prophetic stormers. The law which the scribes about Ezra undertook to teach the people made social righteousness and ritual ceremony alike a matter of concern. It is the middle position that was victorious. And as a sign of the intermediate's victory may be mentioned that from that time on the priest made way to the learned expounder of the law.

This was indeed the great deed of Ezra and the men of the great synagogue. The law was produced from its obscurity in a corner of the temple. It was re-written in a script that the laity could read. It was the people's book. The scholar, the student, the teacher had precedence over the high-priest who might learn his practice by rote but otherwise be ignorant of the plain or deeper meaning of the law.

In time the expositions of the scholars grew to enormous proportions and overshadowed the source. Mountains upon mountains of norms were heaped up, fences within fences were constructed, the pedantic jurists took to themselves the mastery over the conscience of the Jewish people. It was the ancient sacerdotalism in a new garb.

Engrossed in the Form.

In the place of the temple worship there came to stand the synagogue with its worship, and the slender ritual of long ago grew to be a voluminous book, and men were absorbed by the task of codifying the etiquette of public and private worship and the multitudinous rules as to the delinquency in confounding benedictions and the like. The externals were made much of. Yet in all these ages, reaching almost to the present day, there were not lacking the revolutionaries, those who rebelled against authority; and between the two extremes labored successively and successfully the men of the intermediate tendency, they who conformed as the strictest observers would have them do, but who stressed the motive, who dwelt on inwardness, on the duties of the heart.

Philosophers there arose who almost threatened to turn the whole structure of Judaism upside down and to make it capitulate before the wisdom of the Greeks. Again a middle course was found, and between the extreme legalists and extreme rationalists there arose the pietists or Hasidim, who in outward conduct were not a whit different from the rigorous traditionalists, but at the same time gave the religious practices a meaning, a motivation, an inwardness, and relieved observance of much of its gloom by re-investing it with joy, with spiritual elation.

For upward of a hundred years, Judaism has again been torn between two extremes. On the eve of the granting of civil emancipation, there arose, as in the days of Jason and Menelaus, and still earlier in the days of Ahab and Jezebel, men who, with no less good intentions, strove to adjust Judaism to the environment. It is needless to dwell at length upon the history of the movement. We are witnesses of its full blown consummation. We have been, all of us, at one stage or another, attracted by it. Even its antagonists cannot refrain from giving credit to its clean-cut position. Naturally its full intent is revealed in those who style themselves or who are so styled by the more timid radicals.

The Birth of Orthodoxy.

Over against this revolutionary movement, which it was and is, there came the reaction, and it was nicknamed Orthodoxy. The term was borrowed from the Christian Church, but we will let it go at that. The Orthodox clung the more tenaciously to the outworn or obsolete just because of the attack on the part of the radicals. Alas that that camp lacked men of breadth of view and of historical perspective. You will point to exceptions. But they really belong no more to the reactionary wing which the middle body now dubs as the ultra-orthodox.

For a middle body there came into existence. The Breslau Seminary became its most important seat, and a child thereof thrives among us. Schechter was wont to din it into my ears that "Richtung," tendency, "shittah," counted for everything. We also have had, and still have, the so-called "conservatives" among us. I said it years ago that if by "conservative" we mean hats on, the second holiday, organ, mixed sexes, abbreviated prayer-book and the like, the word and the position have no meaning for those of us, who, like them, may seem to occupy a middle position, but who, in reality, mean something entirely different.

A newer conservative type of Jews and Jewish congregations is in the process of development. We shall not curtail the prayer-book, nor are we going to pray in "journalese." We have the historical sense. What has come to be must stay. Prayer-books grow, but they are not made to order. We know that time-honored institutions had a beginning. But we cannot revert to beginnings. In all outward practices we conform. But we are conscious of the inroads which life has made upon certain practices, and we willingly shut our eye to laxities which are forced by circumstances and wait for the day when the properly constituted authority will legalize them.

More than Tradition.

But what is most important is this: we give our acts a motivation vastly different from that which the traditionalist pure and simple allows. If we abstain from forbidden food, it is not because it is so written in Code or the book of Leviticus, chapter eleven. We are men abreast of the learning of the day. We know, and, perhaps, even we do not know, how these taboos originated. But again we are students of beginnings, but we do not ourselves go back to beginnings. We do not believe in retrogression of any kind. For us the motivation lies in what the law-giver (unhistorically perhaps), assigns as the ground of the prohibition, to the intent that we remain a body apart, that in other words we may safeguard the perpetuation of the Jewish people.

What we ask of a new deviation is no more and no less than: will it tend to disrupt us or to keep us intact? And we keep ourselves intact because of the ancient hope and the ancient promises. Our movement is directed along the main current of Judaism, and we steer our craft clear of the rocks on either side. We are orientated as of old toward Zion. But we recognize the miracle "invisible" by which God is working redemption in our own days. We are looking forward to the day when the Jewish people will live its own life on the soil of the fathers; to them we would transmit the heritage of Judaism intact, in order that there it may be transmuted into something which will be imposed not from without but from within, by the throbbing pulsating life of new and wholesome conditions, and from thence we hope that an influence for good will spread to the utmost corners of the earth where Jews will dwell, true to their various fatherlands, but in spiritual contact with the new Jewish culture.

Leases On Life

weight, a healthy color again came to my cheeks, and I felt better than I ever did in my life.

Under Care of Experts

I was under the care and treatment of physicians who are experts in tuberculosis and who had at their disposal laboratories equipped with the most modern scientific appliances and apparatus. Other physicians who are specialists in certain branches of medicine were also called in consultation when necessary. With such advantages at one's disposal, only he who indulges in dissipation or he who in his mind is predetermined to remain sick, fails to show marked signs of improvement.

It has been well said that tuberculosis is a disease of civilization; that it comes as a result of the weakness of the frail human body when it endeavors to achieve tasks in the furtherance of ambitions which are beyond its strength. A specimen history of the lives of most of the patients at this institution would disclose stories which differ from my own only in detail.

The patients as a whole are a group of self-respecting persons whose disease is in the nature of a calamity, since it necessarily involves a long period of debilitation, which sooner or later makes it imperative to have recourse to an institution such as this. This brings me to the most agreeable feature in the administration of the hospital affairs.

The immediate authorities, by their conduct in relation to the patients, by their solicitous interest, and, when occasion arises, by their spoken words, give one the right to feel that his tenancy in this hospital is not a charity, not the receiving of alms, but a privilege and a right which its founders and maintainers recognize to be a just one and a compensation for work done in the past and an incentive for future effort when a cure shall have been attained.

By H. GOODKOWITZ

FATE must have chosen me for her plaything. In the furnace of adversity, I've been tested again and again, finally to be found wanting. I'm a dreamer—and the story is told.

At the age of twenty, after being in the land of opportunity for a little over three years and supplementing my Hebrew learning with an American school education, I set sail in the little bark of my ambition on the high seas of life.

By natural inclination, perhaps by imagined aptitude, I selected engineering as the most promising field of endeavor and looked to destiny to become great. The dreamer assured me success. A year later, however, I surrendered mastery over my destiny by my marriage.

Enters Business Life

Pursuit of a livelihood, or, rather, the necessity of it, startled me into consciousness and for the first time of my life I recognized responsibility. My abilities, however, proved quite plastic, and soon I yielded to parental persuasion to give up my mechanical work and enter the mercantile field, where fortune for a while favored me.

But partnership trouble and credit complications soon convinced me that honesty with limited capital do not quite mate. A year later I retired from business—clean—in the full meaning of the word.

I never cried over spilt milk. Somehow, however, misfortune worked upon me, and, aided by the rapid reversal of my fortune, coupled with a prolonged illness of my dear wife and the ridicule of "friends," I finally broke down.

Despair and hope were in mortal combat, with the odds heavily against hope, when the flame of the "Menorah" dispersed the clouds of despair—the "Menorah," symbol of the B'nai B'rith. Through the generous solicitation of the Weils and Rabbi Meyerberg of Goldsboro, N. C., heads of the B'nai B'rith lodges of that section, I was enabled to enter this haven of rest, the National Jewish Hospital for Consumptives.

On Road to Health

As a result of my sojourn I have obtained a new lease of life. No sun ever shone more brightly than over the heads of those who seek refuge here from the White Plague.

Weary and sorrow-laden, indeed, is he who abandons hope and his dear ones in quest of the fountain of health. All this, however, is forgotten once he steps over the threshold of this blessed home which so fondly and so maternally welcomes him.

The indescribably beautiful scenery; superbly laid out lawns and walks; the perfect buildings; the cozy rooms and comfortable beds quickly imbued me with cheerfulness, and I rested bodily and mentally.

Life may be one disappointment after another—but not here. Here one is surprised but never disappointed. You are surprised to find nearly everyone happy and everyone so friendly to you, from the menial to the superintendent.

dulged in wholesale butcheries which may well be placed in line with those of Poland and Ukraine. The number of victims is given as 3,000, and while round figures are always a little suspicious, the truth, as appearing from individual facts, is bad enough.

Dr. Toszeghy, who lived in a summer home on the Plattensee, had discharged a servant who out of spite went to the police and denounced her employer as a communist. A patrol was sent to his house to arrest him, and his wife, apprehending the worst, rushed in an automobile to police headquarters. When she returned she saw her husband hanged on a tree in front of his villa. She cut him loose but the police threw her into a room of the house which was locked and from which she had to witness the second hanging of her husband.

Count Zichy, the son of the former minister, boasted that he had killed three Jews with his own hand. The reports come from all sections of the country, from Slovak districts, as Tapolcsa, and from Magyar districts, as Zala, which saw similar events in 1883 when the dimsissal of the Tisza Eszlar ritual murder charge caused serious uprising in the country. In those days, however, Hungary had a strong government and a liberal premier, Count Tisza, while at present the country is in a state of anarchy aggravated by the Rumanian invasion which is to win cheap trophies that it could not obtain in the war.

The clerical character of the disorder is clearly seen in a report published in the Ohio "Waisenfreund," a Catholic paper of Columbus, O., which holds the Jews responsible for the Bolshevist government and closes its report with the remark that Hungary might get along without the Jews.

Fear and Facts

An American Jew, who was kept in Germany during the whole period of the war, writes from Berlin that the Jews stand in fear of pogroms such as the riots in Berlin indicated. Our correspondent adds that he believes these fears unfounded. Nevertheless, the tendency of the reactionaries, who still hope for a revival of the Junker government, is a factor which has to be taken seriously.

The attempt on the life of Hugo Haase, who was shot Oct. 8 in front of the parliament building in Weimar, can only be interpreted as an attempt to discredit radicalism as Jewish. Haase, who was a member of the Reichstag with a short interruption since 1898, and minister of foreign affairs in 1918, might have been selected for such purpose. The Hansabund, a reactionary political organization, issues an appeal to boycott the "Jew-papers," "Tageblatt" and "Vossiche Zeitung." While the former is owned by the Jew, Rudolf Mosses, the latter went so far in its desire to keep liberalism free from any Jewish suspicion that it would not employ a Jew on its editorial staff.

One suggestion of the Hansabund deserves serious consideration. The organization claims to have proof of a secret understanding between Rumania and Hungary, which would be joined by Italy for the sake of securing the preponderance of this new Balkan federation over Jugo-Slavia. Such a federation would seek the support of Germany against interference by Great Britain. One can merely say that more surprising things have happened in the shifting of alliances since the Crimean war, and an alliance between Great Britain, Russia and Japan looked far less probable at the time of the Dogger Bank incident in 1904.

At the head of the movement to bring junkerdom back into power through an anti-Jewish agitation, is, naturally, the officers' corps of the old regime, and even Max Harden (nee Witkowski) who likes to parade his disinterestedness in Jewish questions, sounds a warning in his "Zukunft." It has to be noticed, however, that the official Germany is so far just to the Jews. The Prussian government has allowed the Polish refugees to remain in Germany while the pogroms in their homes last, acting in marked contrast to Austria, as we shall see.

On the Blue Danube River

The American is used to associate Vienna with Strauss' waltz music, and the student of literature with Schiller's designation of it as the city of "the Phaeacians." It sounds like a cruel satire today to repeat Schiller's "Immer ist's Sonntag, es dreht immer am Herd sich der Spiess."

Vienna is starving. Three ounces of meat and two pounds of potatoes are allowed per person per month, but so far they are only promised because they are unobtainable except for the rich, who get it through "Beziehungen," as the typical Austrian institutionalism calls what we term "pull."

It is therefore no wonder that the Galician Jews, who came to Vienna as refugees at the beginning of the war, are now more unwelcome guests than ever before. Their repatriation, since they have become aliens, has been ordered several times but always postponed. The Austrian government has no trains and no coal to move them. The Polish government is in no hurry to receive the refugees whose homes have been destroyed years ago by Russian shells. The situation furnishes an effective plank for the antisemitic platform which charges the government in which some Jews, Otto Bauer, former secretary of state, Deutsch, secretary of war, and a few others are represented with pro-Jewish partisanship.

A public indignation meeting was held on Rosh Hashanah, perhaps purposely selected, in front of the Rathaus but the government remained master of the situation. Meantime new fuel is furnished to the antisemites in the number of Hungarian Jews, especially young women, who are fleeing from the White Terror.

The situation is simply desperate. It is, as stated above, by no means so for the Jews alone. The Alpine countries, which in former years drew a considerable part of their income from the tourist traffic, are now treating every visitor as an intruder preying upon their meager food resources. The Jews come in for additional abuse in these priest-ridden countries which, especially in Tyrol, hold to the Spanish principle of harmonious faith (Glaubenseinheit) which they defended against the constitutional grant of religious freedom in the shortlived German national assembly in 1848.

The severity of the distress, especially in the case of infants, may be seen from the fact that Anita Mueller, the indefatigable social worker, took 750 Jewish children to Copenhagen for a few weeks to protect them from starvation.

Quatre Vingt Neuf

France was the first country in Europe to place the Jews on a footing of full civic and political equality. Theodore Reinach demands in his "History of the Jews" that every Jew consider France as his second fatherland. He had a taste of his own medicine when Barres interrupted him in the chamber of deputies (Oct. 31, 1907) with the remark: "Il est de Francfort, chaqun a sa place." The same Barres in his "Le Judaisme Francais et la Guerre" pays the Jews some lefthanded compliments.

French public opinion regarding the Jews can better be ascertained from an essay on Bolshevism and the German revolution by the Polish count, Prozor, published in "Revue Contemporaine." Count Prozor, to quote just one typical remark, says the Jews are responsible for the revolutionary spirit, and he suggests as the only remedy to vaccinate the Polish, Russian and German Jews with those of the "civilized countries," just as a serum is the poisonous germ rendered innocuous and used to fight a plague. It is surely not to the credit of French Judaism when "L'Univers Israelite," in a polemical article, says that there is no relation whatever between "un Francais Judaique" and "un Allemand Judaique." One is reminded of Anatole France's novel, "L'Anneau d'Amethyste," where the Jewish prefect, M. Worms-Clavelin, boasts: "Je n'ai pas d'attache dans le monde juif."

The satire is evidently drawn from life. Anatole France recently headed a list of notables who signed an "Appeal to Civilized Humanity" against the Polish pogroms, though the Poles were not directly named. France, who was a strong Dreyfusard and condemned antisemitism, gave in his novels considerable support to antisemitism if his M. Worms-Clavelin, his Baroness de Bonmont and various other figures are true to life. We may believe they are, as are also the members of old-fashioned "legitimiste" aristocracy with their antisemitism.

In this respect Madame de Laboulaye gave us a specimen. The lady having been in charge of a Catholic hospital for wounded soldiers, situated in Sainteville in the Pyrenees, a location equally conducive to the recuperation of the patients and to the safety of the aristocratic nurses, published a book on her experiences in which the story is told of a rabbi, who came to the hospital as a visiting chaplain to look after Jewish soldiers "who naturally did not exist there, because they were found in no place where danger was incurred." The rabbi, she relates, was afterward unmasked as a German spy. The war record of the Jews, Dr. Bernheim can see from this instance, is important for Jews here as well as abroad.

As Mother So Daughter

In Algeria quite recently a society for the protection of the Jews against antisemitism under the pseudonym of "Comite Algerien des Etudes Sociales" was formed. The society enumerates some disabilities of the Algerian Jews of which we never heard before. Jews are excluded from grants of government land; they are, unless naturalized, excluded from voting and have to register at the consulate as aliens, and even those who are naturalized can not vote until they are 35 years of age, while other French citizens may vote at 25.

It so happens that Maurice Barres in his recent book, mentioned before, tells us again the story of Cremieux, who used his chance when he was minister of justice to railroad a bill enfranchising the Algerian Jews, through the chamber and signed it promptly, in this way driving the Algerian Arabs to revolt.

The story, like its companion story of the foundation of the Alliance Israelite by Cremieux, is a legend. The naturalization of the Algerian Jews was a measure executed and passed by the government of Napoleon and retarded on the ground of a formality until Napoleon was overthrown. It so happened that Cremieux became minister of justice when a housecleaning of such bills was ordered, and he put his signature under it.

The sentiment of France is also illustrated by the "Temps" which publishes a Bucharest dispatch, relating that the soviet government of Tamboff, consisting of Jews, voted an appropriation for a monument to be erected in honor of Judas Ischariot. One can understand the shudder which this story will produce in the convents "Du Sang Precieux" or "Du Sacre Coeur" and in the chateaux of the Bourbon vassals.

The Ends of the Earth

Czecho-Slovakia has an enlightened president, a consistent liberal in Professor Masaryk. The clericals hate him, but they can not antagonize him, especially as there seems to be a Husite movement among the Czech clergy, who demand from Rome concessions, among others the right for priests to marry. This movement seems to gain in strength and to be popular with a part of the Catholics. Masaryk favors it, and the clerical press ascribes his sympathy, as it did his advocacy of Hilsner, to Jewish slush money.

There is naturally a great danger for the Jews in the purely German and in the nationally mixed districts, as we may see from one typical instance. In the city of Eibenschitz, which is a town of about 5,000, the Germans won in the municipal elections through the Jewish vote. In individual questions, as in the maintenance of German schools in cities with preponderantly Czech populations, like Prague and Pilsen, either support of or the opposition to such a demand will cause trouble.

The temper of the population may be judged by the following incident reported from Prague. Two French women, members of the household of a French commissioner, entered a fruit store and asked for the price of some goods—probably in German, although this must not be reported. They found the price too high and one of the ladies said to her companion: "C'est une voleuse" ("This is highway robbery"). The Czech woman who kept the store claimed the woman had said: "Ceska holota" ("Czech rabble"), and believing the customers to be Polish Jewesses, she started an outcry about the impudence of the Jews who had insulted the Czech nation.

Fortunately some French officers came along who identified the women and told the police that the allegation could not be true, as these ladies did not understand one Czech word. One may imagine what would have happened, if accidentally these women had been Jewesses.

It is very far from Bohemia to Asia Minor, but just for that reason it shall be mentioned in this connection that the city of Aidin near Smyrna was burned by the Turks and that the Jews fled to Smyrna where the local community took care of the homeless the best it could. The statesmen who solve the Jewish question by the declaration that the Jews must not have a separate nationality are requested to advise the Jews in this section whether they shall be Greeks, Armenians or Turks in Aidin, Germans or Czechs in Eibenschitz.

In Rumania

The latest unofficial but highly credible report informs us that the allies are willing to concede to Rumania the right to settle the Jewish question as a strictly internal affair. This would save the diplomats of Bucharest the trouble of inventing arguments to show that they did not make the Treaty of Versailles a scrap of paper as they made of the Treaty of Berlin. Diplomats in our days need their imagination in so many other directions.

The probability of the report lies in the threatened new combination in the Balkans of which mention was made before. Should this concession really have been made, the Poles will certainly take advantage, and prove that if the Rumanians occasionally drowned Jews in the Danube, Poles can and did use the Vistula just as effectively, and have the same right as their neighbors to demand that such sport be left in the jurisdiction of the national authorities, just as is football in the United States, and polo in England.

Rumania receives encouragement from such an undisputed authority as Houston Stewart Chamberlain who advises her not to grant the minority rights. He receives a hearty response from the leader of the Rumanian anti-Semites, Professor Cusa, who bluntly said to a Jewish newspaperman: "I have not changed my views on the Jewish question except in one point. The Jews are now, since we have annexed other territories inhabited by Jews, a greater menace than they were before, and the only solution of the Jewish question is to send the Jews to Palestine. We shall work to this end, making it so hot for them in Rumania that they will be glad to go."

The well-tried Jews of Kishineff, now part of Besarabis, under Rumanian rule, have a taste of the blessing of the new regime, and they declare that under the czar's government they had at least a breathing spell between one pogrom and the next, while now the graft of the underpaid officials and the brutality of the army officers never allows them a rest.

Whither?

The question "Wohin?" which is usually attributed to the late chief rabbi, Hermann Adler, though he quoted it from Hirsch Hildesheimer, and the latter probably from Leon Pinsker, is as pressing now as it ever was before. Palestine, to which Professor Cusa wishes to send the Rumanian Jews, whose number will be about half a million after the war, is not ready to receive them.

Emir Feisul, the somewhat operatic "King of Hedjas," stated to the "Jewish Chronicle" that the Jews may be as happy in the new Arab empire as they were in Andalusia at the time of Judah Halevi but they can have no souverain rights. Immigration of Jews will be welcome, but it will have to be regulated. The claim of the Jews on Palestine is not solid because the Arabs took it not from them but from the Romans, an argument similar to that which the Talmud puts into the mouth of a Jewish apologist when the Canaanites claimed Palestine back from the Jews.

In spite of the message sent out by the Zionist bureau that these statements must not be taken so seriously, the outlook is by no means rosy. The "Wiener Morgenzeitung," in an article which shows solid information, points to the trouble arising from the rivalry between France and England. The former, which claimed in 1840 the heritage of St. Louis, was willing to believe, as M. Thiers assured the Greeks of Damascus, in the truth of ritual murder charge, if the Christians of the Orient would in turn believe in a French protectorate; the latter, however, would now not even concede Galilee which France is willing to accept as a compromise, leaving Judaea to England, and thus repeat the policy of Jeroboam and Rohoboam.

The bishop of England in a meeting of a missionary society, declares the famous Balfour Declaration has to be "properly understood," but the Arabs seem to understand it in their own way and started a massacre of the Jews in Yemen, as they used to do in olden times, when these people had a chance of fleeing from Arabic to Turkish dominion in Palestine. But now the "whither?" stares them in the face.

In this connection another disillusionment must be mentioned. American citizens, members of the Jewish Legion, who went to Palestine as crusaders with the British army and found themselves disappointed, were court-martialed for demanding their discharge and sentenced to five years in the penitentiary at hard labor. The sentence was reduced afterwards to two years. Is American Jewry willing to let these enthusiasts suffer for their honesty?

Miscellaneous

The war has created the belief in the incredible. We had been told that the destructiveness of modern instruments of warfare was so terrible that a war could not last long. The instruments of warfare, however, still improved, their destructiveness still increased, but the war lasted over four years. We have the satisfaction to point to the incredible in works of charity which the war stimulated, and the latest is the plan of the Joint Distribution Committee to raise $10,000,000 for constructive relief work.

We believe the sum which before the war would have appeared utopian will be found, and we can merely hope that the Poles, Ukrainians, Rumanians e tutti quanti will not treat this money like the food packages sent from the United States, and will give the Jews a chance to use it for the benefit of their respective countries.

It may be mentioned too that the Bene Israel community of Bombay is about to establish a home for its destitutes and orphans. It is a sign of modernism in this isolated community which does not receive the attention which it deserves. We are not a missionarizing people, not even missionarizing among our own.

The publication of a new Jewish paper in London has been announced. It is entitled "The Jewish Guardian," and is financed by Lionel de Rothschild, Lord Swaythling and others as a protest of the British aristocracy of the Mosaic persuasion against the Zionist leanings of the "Jewish Chronicle" which has held the field since 1841.

Poor Hilsner is a type of fate's dupes. After having spent eighteen years in prison innocently, he was pardoned, and lived in Vienna, being probably supported by charity. Now he is expelled as a citizen of Czecho-Slovakia. The eighteen years in an Austrian prison were mere hospitality extended to him. As Masaryk, his defender, is president of the republic, he probably will be protected from mob violence.

This review shall close with a pleasant notice. Frau Henriette Goldschmidt, who will be 93 years old Nov. 23, just published a book "From Kindergarten to the Academy," reviewing her activity in the cause of the Kindergarten and of woman's rights. She lived to see woman's suffrage legalized in Germany. Frau Goldschmidt is a native of Krotoschin, now Poland, and the widow of the rabbi of Leipsic, Dr. A. M. Goldschmidt.

Adolph Brand

Adolph Brand, formerly field secretary for District No. 5, I. O. B. B., and past president of Argo Lodge No. 413, died Sept. 8 at the age of 49.

Brother Brand was one of the most expert chronologists in the country, in so far as this science relates to the Jewish calendar. His great talent gained for him the admiration and personal friendship of the late Theodore Roosevelt. He was the author of "How the English Got the Bible." He was also an inventor of merit and obtained recognition in the Patent Office.

But his soul was always wrapped up in Judaism and especially in the principles of the B'nai B'rith. He was an ardent and indefatigable worker for its welfare. Just before his death he wrote a very thorough history of the Order which he left in manuscript form. His death has deprived the B'nai B'rith of one of its hardest, most earnest, and most faithful workers.

In accordance with his wish, his body was conveyed to Boston for burial in the family lot. A simple but very impressive funeral service, attended by many members of Argo lodge, was held prior to the taking of the body to the station. Brother Abram Simon and Rabbi G. Silverstone delivered eloquent eulogies. The funeral prayer of the Order was recited by an officer of the lodge. Brother M. G. Pressler accompanied the body to Boston as the lodge's special representative.

London is Mecca for Diplomats

City is Second Only to Paris as Political Center; Jews Have Many Prominent Posts; Knighting of Sir Leon Levison Assailed; Lodge Prepares an Elaborate Program for the Winter; Other English News

By DR. M. EPSTEIN

London Correspondent of the B'nai B'rith News

London, Sept. 15.

THE present political situation tends to make London an important diplomatic center, second only to Paris. Most of the new states, and others as yet in embryo, have their missions here as well as on the Seine. One result is that a goodly number of strangers are in the English capital, including a fair sprinkling of Jews.

Dr. Yahuda, of Madrid, has already been noted in this column. He is still with us, winning fame as a speaker and in private life. Others have arrived, principally from Russia, and perhaps the best known of the latter is Dr. Vishnitzer, secretary of the Ukrainian Mission to London and famous as a Jewish historian and writer.

It has been observed that Jews are to the fore among the diplomats of the Ukraine. The explanation is simple. The population of Ukrainia is composed for the most part—possibly even 98 per cent—of peasants; and while they constitute a healthy element in the country, their standard of culture is somewhat low. Good soldiers the country has in abundance; good administrators are few, and the higher standard of education among Jews fits them eminently to serve their country in this sphere.

Many other Jewish visitors from Russia are in our midst. Some cleave to the Cadets; others are working for the new Baltic States. The appearance of these men gives the lie direct to the accusation that all Russian Jews are Bolsheviks. Then there are others. The Zionist Office has attracted a number of young men from all parts of the world to participate in its administrative work, and the new arrivals include brilliant American university men, experienced workers from Palestine, specialists on the Jewish question from Poland, and administrators of ability from England itself.

Budget Is Criticized

The Bureau recently published its Budget project for the current year. The wave of querulousness at public expenditure which is passing over the country must also have affected certain Jewish quarters; and it was not surprising, when questions were being asked about national expenditure, that questions should be asked about the Zionist expenditure.

The spokesman of the economy advocates was Mr. Neville Laski, who, it may be mentioned incidentally, is the son-in-law of Dr. Gaster. He received a detailed reply from Mr. Boris Goldberg, the treasurer of the Zionist Organization, and on the whole the demand for information and the information vouchsafed gave satisfaction.

Equally general appears to have been the satisfaction occasioned by the appointment of Professor Geddes to assist in planning the new Jerusalem and the proposed university. Professor Geddes is well known in this country as an authority on town planning, and it is cheering to the Zionists to think that Jerusalem may soon again be "beautiful in situation, the joy of the whole earth."

If hope is dawning in Palestine, there is still hopelessness. Reports of pogroms are still being received and the position remains critical. Perhaps it is a case of the leopard not being able to change his spots. "Polen-Wirtschaft" is proverbial. It still exists. It looks as though the stupidity which marks the anti-Jewish excesses also characterizes the general policy of the country.

Stories are told of political deals which sound as though they came out of a Gilbert and Sullivan Opera. One story, for instance, relates that when an appointment was made to a ministerial position recently, the notification was accidentally received by the nominee's brother, who actually entered upon his new duties, and it was not before some days that the error was discovered.

A Venerable Failing

The Poles were never famous for political efficiency. Their political inactivity for so many years seems to have blunted what political capacity they ever had.

It is a curious thing, moreover, that the ill treatment of the Poles in Silesia at the hands of the Germans should be advertised to the world in the press as an act of unspeakable cruelty and barbarism, whereas the ill treatment of the Jews by the Poles, which on all hands is recognized to be a hundred times worse, has to be trumpeted forth by protest meetings and the like.

The answer of the responsible Polish authorities is that the anti-Jewish excesses do not exist or are not as bad as they are made out to be. Fortunately, this can be tested. The American Mission under Mr. Morgenthau will doubtless do good. Now a British official mission is being sent out, and it was a wise step to put Sir Stuart Samuel at its head. Sir Stuart is a leading Jew in the community, and his connection with the British Mission will inspire confidence in its report.

Such reports from Poland as have already come through to the world—Mr. Israel Cohen's and Mr. Brailsford's, for instance—show a pretty black picture. It is to be hoped that the influence of Mr. Morgenthau and Sir Stuart Samuel will open the eyes of the Paderewski Government to the folly and the wickedness of their Jewish policy.

Sir Leon Is Assailed

Every year as the King's birthday comes 'round, a number of distinctions are conferred on men whom the King delights to honor. For the most part the recipients have won fame in one or another branch of public work. This year the list contained a puzzling surprise.

There is in Edinburgh a converted Jew called Leon Levison, who differs in no marked way from other members of the fraternity of the converted.

During the war he collected money for what he termed the Russian Jews' Relief Fund. There appears to have been some unpleasantness about this business, and Mr. Levison's name was frequently mentioned, both in the local and the London press, in no complimentary terms.

Judge of the public surprise, therefore, when the King's Birthday Honours List contained the name of Mr. Leon Levison, upon whom a Knighthood had been conferred. Sir Leon Levison! People rubbed their eyes in wonder. As for the Jewish community, it was amused, not because the man was a convert, only that he was futile and insignificant. Perhaps the most apposite characterization of the incident appeared in TRUTH, a well-known weekly of repute. TRUTH wrote:

> "Whatever honour this may be to Mr. Levison, it is none to anybody else concerned. Mr. Levison is knighted, says the official announcement, for his work in connection with the Russian Jews' Relief Fund. This simply means that during the war he has collected and disbursed money for this object. The operation is open to some criticism, which has appeared lately in the columns of Truth, but there is no occasion to go into that again. The essential fact is that Mr. Levison is a professional charity-monger. A knighthood, or any such honour purporting to be conferred by the King, is a valuable asset to anyone engaged in this kind of business, and I protest against the prostitution of such honours to such uses.
> "Whether it is any additional objection to Mr. Levison's selection for this distinction that he is a converted Jew and that his officious labours on behalf of the unconverted are consequently most offensive to the Jewish community, is a matter which, I presume, the advisers of His Majesty have considered, and decided, rightly or otherwise, to disregard."

Homage for Chief Rabbi

The Chief Rabbi spent his summer holiday at Margate and the local community, aided by the numerous Jewish visitors, made the occasion one of demonstration of affection and esteem. The Chief Rabbi preached at the local synagogue, and the reception arranged in his honor was attended by the Mayor of Margate.

The congregation does not possess a permanent synagogue, and efforts are being made to build a worthy House of Prayer. It has been remarked in some quarters that the Chief Rabbi's visit to Margate marks the democratic tendencies which are showing themselves in the community. No one would ever have imagined the late Chief Rabbi spending his vacation in Margate, and it would have been surprising if he had preached there.

But "we have changed all that." The people are making themselves felt in communal politics, and a thoroughly democratic Chief Rabbi is very much in place.

Important Jewish Conceptions

It has often been pointed out that modern thought at its best is developing in the direction of the Jewish standpoint. Is not the League of Nations essentially a Jewish conception? And are not the movements in support of Brotherhood?

The great problems of reconstruction have not been limited to the material aspects of life. Man does not live by bread alone. The spiritual reconstruction of society, the revitalization of religion and faith, appear to be occupying thinkers a good deal, and Mr. Stanley Cooke, of Cambridge, has been ventilating his opinions in THE TIMES. A somewhat remarkable letter from his pen appeared in that journal on August 29 —remarkable because of its thoroughly Jewish point of view: "Let men know that God and men need each other; that every individual is dear to God and indispensable for the ultimate purpose, and that everyone has immediate access to God, if he truly wants Him." Thus Mr. Cooke.

He might be a Jewish preacher. He emphasizes Jewish doctrine. On this basis he pleads for reconstruction of thought and conduct. He wants more than Christianity. Possibly, without knowing it, he wants Judaism.

The New Year Holidays are nearly with us, and until they are over the "Communal Season" cannot be said to have commenced. When it does set itself going, it will be interesting to observe any new developments.

It will be the first season of activity of the peace period. Will we get into the same old rut, or will there be imagination and courage enough among us to tread new ways and wander in fresh pastures? For the present, the Communal Scheme is on the shelf, to be taken down after the Holy Days. Even before then we are to have a new communal organ, THE JEWISH GUARDIAN, the first number of which is promised for October 3.

The London Lodge is also "on vacation," and it is to be hoped that when it reopens after Tabernacles, it will generate huge activities. Lodges should be founded in a number of provincial centers, and in London the membership ought to be increased. But it is cheering to know that Brother Paul Goodman, our president, is fully alive to the needs of the day, and it is not too much to say that the council are as one with him.

A Protest

PARADES, mass meetings and other forms of peaceful demonstration against excesses committed at the expense of the Jews in Europe have been staged of late in many American cities, includ-Chicago, whose protest is pictured above.

The order's official report on the foreign situation, observed by its Secretary during a three months' tour, begins on page two of this issue.

Situation of the Jews in Europe

A Report by the Secretary of the Order After a Three Months' Tour of Inspection Among Lodges in War-Stricken Lands; Death Toll in Ukraine Reaches 50,000; Germany Hot Bed of Antisemitism; Distress is Universal

By A. B. Seelenfreund

ALMOST a year has passed since the signing of the Armistice, and the long looked for peace is still far off. The Balkan situation, the boiling chaldron of Europe, has not undergone any material change, though boundaries have been altered and old landmarks have been obliterated. Instead of the hoped for goodwill among men and friendship between nations, increased hatred and deeper animosity is the order of the day.

Instead of righteousness supplanting tolerance, injustice and persecution have raised their hydra head. And as previously, so at the present time, the Jew is the chief victim. At him the shafts of contempt and ridicule are hurled, he is made to suffer for the misfortunes of peoples, the ruin of nations. He is blamed for the fortunes of war, the responsibility for defeat and disaster is placed upon his shoulders.

That the interim between the promise of true peace and its still-awaited fulfilment has filled the lot of the Jew with more sorrow and anguish than the rest of mankind is evidenced by the fearful and bloody sacrifices demanded of him. These sacrifices can best be reviewed by nations and peoples, but as a whole, while the means used for oppression may be varied, the results achieved have been of the same general type.

Starvation Is Widespread

The Jew is going through an economic crisis in enlightened and so-called civilized countries as well as in benighted lands; in Germany, Austria and Czecho-Slovakia, no less than in Poland, Russia and Roumania. Thousands are suffering from hunger and cold; while statesmen are bickering over the spoils of war presumably to establish peace, instead of realizing that a prompt solution of the food and fuel question is the greatest aid to a lasting peace.

Food is so scarce in Central and South-eastern Europe, that the people are subsisting upon rations, the quality and quantity of which is wholly inadequate to nourish the body. Women and children are in particular the sufferers; undernourishment is arresting their growth and development; the yellow pallor in their faces bespeaks famine; their distended stomachs certify to the lack of food for long periods. Children are dying in Vienna by the thousands for want of milk; tuberculosis is increasing appalingly; malnutrition has swelled the mortality and is the cause of new diseases.

Boycotts, fostered openly by semi-public officials, are being waged with hatred and bitterness, for the purpose of preventing all trade and commerce with Jews and their eventual extermination, or enforced emigration, from lands in which they and their ancestors have lived for many centuries.

The pogroms have deprived thousands of Jewish families, who were formerly in comfortable circumstances, of all they possessed. Their homes have been destroyed, their shops plundered and a large number of them were even denuded of their wearing apparel. The authorities, furthermore, instead of defending the Jews, have remained either passive or participated in the excesses. The victims are wandering aimlessly in the fields and woods, starved and almost naked, and the highways are lined with graves of women and children who have literally died from exposure and starvation. The situation has assumed such tragic dimensions as to baffle all description.

The Ukraine

The position of the Jews in the Ukraine is terrible. Pogroms have occurred in hundreds of places, and these massacres and excesses are unparalleled for brutality and savagery. It is estimated that more than 50,000 Jews were tortured and murdered in cold blood, not including thousands of victims who succumbed to wounds and as a result of ill-treatment. Women have been violated, old men tortured, children quartered and crucified to satiate the human ogres in their desire for blood and lust.

Jewish homes were pillaged, their shops robbed and ruined and even their sanctuaries, the synagogues, fell victims to the wild and cruel orgies of the fiendish mobs. As these pogroms are the work of soldiers and Cossacks solely, instigated by agencies which have the approval of those in authority, forcible resistance is out of question. The peasants as a rule abstain from massacring, but, hyena-like, they indulge in pillaging after the soldiers have done their bloody work.

In Elizabethgrad, with a Jewish population of about 15,000, the pogrom lasted three days, with the result that not a single Jewish house or establishment was left unpillaged. The fiends were so methodical and painstaking that they searched even cellars and garrets. The carnage resulted in over 2,000 maimed and killed and property damage is figured in hundreds of millions.

Child Sees Mother Slain

In Rosovo the pogrom netted 27 persons killed in blood-curdling circumstances. One Jew was tortured by forcing a bayonet into his neck, after which he was made to chew earth. His father-in-law was likewise compelled to chew earth. Then members of the mob violated the wife before the eyes of her husband and father. Their child was present and began to cry on seeing its mother killed, whereupon a revolver was put into its mouth and the trigger pulled, bursting the child's head into fragments. The exact number of killed is not known, as a number of victims were buried by the assassins.

In Filstine the tragedy began after a large body of Ukráinian soldiers entered the town. The Jewish population was aware of what was in store and as the women and children were seeking safety in flight, they were butchered on the streets. The atrocities were manifold. A Jewish boy after being horribly maltreated was thrown into a cellar where a large number of dead bodies were decaying. He went mad. An old man mortally wounded was left on the street where he fell. Pigs came along and began to devour his body while the old man was still alive but unable to drive the beasts away. The soldiers stood by laughing.

At Ovrutch, General Petlura's troops initiated the bloody carnival by violating Jewish girls. A delegation of prominent members of the Jewish community called on the Hetman Syrks and pleaded for protection from the soldiers. They were beaten with "nagaikas," leather whips weighted with lead, and afterwards killed with bayonets.

Refugees Tell Own Story

A pogrom lasting two days was carried on in Kief after the city was taken by General Denikin's troops. The names of twenty-seven Jews were reported in the local papers as having been killed. A large number of Jewish places were plundered and burned to the ground.

The aforementioned incidents were reported to me by refugees from those cities while I was in Constantinople, and many facts in their reports were corroborated by the Committee for the Aid of Pogrom Victims in the Ukraine in its recent report dealing with the outrages. In some quarters it is claimed that the reports of pogroms are exaggerated with the intention of bringing about an opposition to the granting of further aid and support by the entente powers to the anti-bolshevik forces. But the facts remain and cannot be denied. Even a paper of Tiflis, favorable to Denikin, protests against the pogroms in its editorial columns by saying: "The excesses against the Jews in Charkow and Ekaterinoslaw, even if they were provoked by irresponsible reactionary elements, are a shameful stain on the character of the Russian fighters."

Poland

Several commissions have already submitted their report on the pogroms in Poland, and particularly with reference to that part of the country formerly known as Galicia.

Pogroms have taken place in Pinsk, Vilna, Lida, Lemberg, Przemysl, Killier, Kaliez, Jaroslaw, Stanislaw, Krakau and in a number of smaller cities. But as the American commission, headed by Mr. Morgenthau, and the English commission, in charge of Sir Stuart Samuel, have not as yet presented their findings, I deem it best to await the result of their investigation.

The Polish press, iucluding the anti-semitic journals, have treated the Morgenthau investigation courteously. As to the Samuel mission, however, the situation is directly the opposite. Polish papers greeted Mr. Samuel upon his arrival with abuse. One anti-semitic journal headed an article ''Sir Schloime Samuel.'' It ridiculed him and also warned him to keep away from the larger cities, as the working people, made nervous by unemployment and hunger, might do somethiug rash and silly.

Much more serious was an article which appeared in the leading conservative journal of Cracow. It impugned Mr. Samuel's fitness as head of the mission and quoted the reproach previously directed against him that he was not a gentleman because he ''had to leave Parliament when he came into conflict with the law prohibiting Parliamentary corruption.'' It further charged him with being a Zionist and insinuated that he came to Poland not in the confidential capacity of the British government, but rather of the English Zionists. And it also quotes ''The Morning Post,'' which stated that the mission ''was low, unjust and insulting to Poland'' and declared in view of these circumstances ''The Post'' appears to be correct.

Poles Admit the Pogroms

The article concluded with the following significant statement: ''Neither the interests nor the self-respect of the Poles permit the creation of a precedent by having our internal affairs interfered with from without.'' While pogroms on a large scale have for the present ceased in Poland, discriminations against and persecution of the Jews have not abated.

As already stated, Jewish nationalists are disqualified as officers in the army. This abnegation of the law on the part of the Polish War Office has been officially sanctioned in a letter from the War Office to the Jewish Deputies in the Polish Parliament, wherein it is stated 'all officers called up are required to be of Polish nationality in addition to their being subjects of the Polish State.

All Jewish students of the seventh and eighth classes of the Przemysl high school have been expelled without any reason. The Polish school children of Przemysl have organized a boycott of Jewish stationers aud booksellers. The eighth class of the Polish Gymnasium had to be dissolved because the Polish students would not sit with their Jewish colleagues. In the other classes Jews were seated separately. In the girls' schools, obstacles were put in the way of admitting Jewesses. In Minsk 23 Jews were expelled from the city and interned in a concentration camp.

Government Fears the Jews

The Polish government, as now constituted, is inimical to the Jews, for the reason that it fears them both ou account of their numerical strength and also for their intellectual and commercial superiority. As soon as the Poles took hold of the government all state employees and officials other than Catholic Poles were summarily dismissed. Corruption, bribery and smuggling are being generally practiced and indulged in, from the highest official to the lowest; and as a result the Jew must bribe and corrupt, if he wants to enjoy the rights and privileges of a citizen as guaranteed by the Peace Treaty and the law of the land.

Roumania

As in Poland, so in Roumania, but even in a more aggravated form. Open violations of the law and bribery are being practiced with impunity, and ''Bakshish'' has become the ''Shiboleth'' of the people. Every transaction, whether of a private or official character, is impregnated with corruption and without ''Bakshish'' not a wheel moves.

The national government is in the hands of a small coterie of men, led by M. Bratiano, and this group endeavors even to secure the control of the principal industries by means of the gigantic and elaborate banking system which it [illegible] and governs. Politi[illegible] [illegible] government is [illegible] large parties and a few, in themselves insignificant, small factions.

These parties and factions are continually at strife with each other, but they act as a unit as far as opposition and enmity toward the Jews is concerned. The Jew is hated more than in any other land, and while the natural and inherent cowardice of the Roumanian retards him from an indulgence in pogroms, he mistreats and persecutes the Jew in all parts of the country.

Officially the Jew is boycotted. He cannot secure any position, no matter how unimportant, in any governmental department or private institution controlled by the governmental leaders. The Roumanian banks, after having largely augmented their capital, have outlined a program of economical and industrial activities, from which the Jew is totally barred.

Bankers Organize a Boycott

The doors of these financial institutions are closed to the Jew, and it is evident that they intend to cripple the credit of the Jewish manufacturer and merchant—a sure means of driving him out of business. As the bulk of the Jewish population is engaged in trade and commerce, the baneful results and consequences which naturally must follow can easily be imagined.

In academic and professional circles the Jew is also being discriminated against. Only recently several deputations of university students called on the Minister of Education and demanded that the Jewish students, of whom nearly eighty percent are still in the military service, be debarred from further attendance at the university. While in former years anti-semitism was known to exist only in the higher and educated circles, it now has infested all classes of the population, and this was principally due to the agitation carried on by the government against the [illegible] of the Versailles Tr[illegible] [illegible] the rights of [illegible]

In Bukoviua, the territory ceded to Roumania, the Diet until recently recognized the equal rights of all nationalities, and the Jews had nine deputies out of a total of sixty-three. The Jews were also represented in the Executive Council of the province. The Roumanians, after they entered the country as the occupying power, at once began their customary petty means of persecution. They invented ''aliens,'' issued decrees of expulsiou, closed the country to all comers, and tried to provoke resistance by provocative actions.

Barred from the Assembly

Recently the Roumanians, by the issuance of a decree, regulated the elections to the Constituent Assembly. To acquire the right to vote it is necessary to produce a number of certificates, as laid down in the decree on the naturalization of the Jews. In addition, the constituencies are so large that a representation of the majorities will scarcely permit any Jewish representation.

The Jewish schools are particularly in a critical condition. The bulk of them formerly received their support from the Jewish Colonization Association through its Vienna office; but as Bukovina has become part of Roumania, the support from Vienna is no longer available and as a result more than half of the Jewish schools have been closed on account of lack of funds.

The Roumanian authorities have the same anti-semitic policy in other departments of life as they manifest in legislation and administration. Salt and tobacco have been placed under the control of the state and the Jews were immediately prohibited from dealing in these commodities. Jewish officials in many state departments were dismissed or their juniors promoted over their heads. Such proceedings the Roumanians justify as necessities occasioned by a state of war.

Greece

Until the acquisition of Saloniki by the Greeks there was no Jewish question in Greece, since the Jewish population was insignificant. Saloniki is the largest and mo[illegible]ous city of Greece, its principal [illegible]rt, and noted for centuries on account of its commerce and industry. The population is composed of Greeks, Armenians, Turks, Spaniols, Bulgarians and Jews, the latter however, forming more than sixty percent of the city's inhabitants.

As may be expected, the bulk of the trade and commerce is in the hands of the Greeks and the Jews, the latter predominating. It is now the intention of the Greek government to bring about a change of existing conditions and to secure for the Greeks supremacy in the principal vocations of life.

The great conflagration two years ago reduced to ashes almost the entire Jewish section of the city, which is the most important portion of the city from a geographical and commercial standpoint. To prevent the rebuilding of this section by the Jews, and thus handicap them in the pursuit of trade and other vocations, the government has introduced a bill in Parliament authorizing the government and the city authorities of Saloniki to acquire by condemnation proceedings the burnt area for public purposes.

The Sabbath Is Attacked

If such measure becomes a law, its principal tendency will be to drive the Jew out of the business section and by underhand means to turn the valuable land over to the Greeks. There is also a measure before the city council designating Saturday as the day for holding markets, fairs and bazaars. The veiled purpose of such measure is obvious. Another proposed measure is intended to enforce rest on Sunday, to the great detriment of the bulk of Jews, who are strict Sabbath observers.

The Jewish Kehilla of Saloniki, through its "Sanhedrin," composed almost entirely of members of the B'nai B'rith Lodge, has submitted to the Greek government a memorandum containing a request for official recognition of its ancient rights to a certain autonomy in the administration of its internal affairs. The claims made by the Jews of Saloniki for themselves are as follows:

> Recognition of the Jewish community as a corporate body with the right to the free exercise of the Jewish religion.
> Right to found and administer institutions for religious, educational, philanthropic and social purposes.
> Recognition and acceptance by the state of the diplomas and certificates of the educational institutions of the Jewish community as equal to the diplomas of state schools of the same standing.

Demand Religious Rights

> Jews who close their business and offices on Saturday and on Jewish holidays shall not be obliged to rest on Sunday and on non-Jewish religious festivals.
> The recognition of the right of Rabbis to act in all matters relating to marriage, divorce and all other questions which have a religious character.
> Right of the Jewish community to levy and collect the taxes and fees imposed on every Jew according to his means, for the maintenance of communal activities.
> Recognition of sacred places, such as synagogues, cemeteries and schools as inviolable and unseizable.
> Exemption from taxation of all properties, the income of which is devoted to the maintenance of communal activities.
> A subvention to be granted by the state and the municipality to the Jews for the support of their religious, educational and benevolent activities.

The foregoing memorandum asks only the recognition of the pre-war situation and of rights and privileges possessed for centuries, the deprivation of which would harmfully affect the Jewish Community of Saloniki and prevent the continuance of its traditional life.

Czecho-Slovakia

The situation confronting the Jews is an unenviable one. As is well known, the Jews were absolutely loyal to the Dual Monarchy, subscribed out of proportion to war loans, and in all manner possible aided the government. The Czechs cite those facts now against the Jews to prove that they were not and are not now true and loyal citizens of the new republic. The hatred and hostility toward the Jews is fierce. They are being discriminated against in all manner and form possible.

A Jew cannot obtain a passport to go to any of the entente countries. All former Jewish public officials were summarily dismissed. Their private school buildings and institutions were commandeered and utilized as barracks for soldiers. In commerce and industry, in political as well as social life their lot is made as unbearable as possible, and it is the purpose of the Czechs to make it so unpleasant for the Jews that they will feel obliged to leave the country.

In many cities of the country meetings were held, at which resolutions were adopted demanding the expulsion of the Jews. Remarks that Jews, if found after September 15, would be hanged were vociferously applauded.

The Czech hates the German, but the Jew he detests. Wishing to express contempt for a person, he calls him "Nemetzki," German, and for absolute hatred he uses the word "Zid," Jew. Practically the Jews are all considered to be Germans and are treated accordingly; they are being doubly hated for being Jews and Germans.

Anti-Semites Riot in Prag

Excesses aimed against the Jew took place in a number of towns, and even in Prag an anti-semitic demonstration on a large scale was arranged. A mob numbering in the thousands formed on a certain holiday on the principal square of the city, a large percentage being soldiers in uniform. They marched through the main streets breaking show windows of Jewish shops and looting their contents. The mob increased rapidly in numbers, the police were either powerless or indifferent, and the situation became tense and fraught with danger, when, upon orders of the government, mounted troops were dispatched to disperse the rioters.

Seeing themselves frustrated in their holiday diversion, the mob marched to the "Hradzin," the residence of President Massaryk, and demanded that the authorities take steps against the Jews. President Massaryk appeared on the balcony and, addressing the mob, ordered it to disperse. He upbraided the Hooligans for their conduct and hurled defiance at them by stating that mobs and lawless demonstrations could not dictate to him or to the government any specific course of action. President Massaryk, however, though well intentioned, is powerless. He is merely a figurehead and thé chauvinistic element is in the saddle.

Corruption in Cabinet

The cabinet is composed of an element unfitted by training and unsuited as to their standard of morality and decency to govern. Their ability consists solely in enriching themselves by means of corruption and bribery and to divert criticism from themselves they engage the attention of the populace by appealing to its passions and fomenting attacks against the Jews.

Outside intervention seems futile, as the government and the country, being considered an ally of the Entente and particularly a protege of France, feel secure and may dare anything, well knowing that political conditions will preclude their being called to account for their misconduct, internally, as long as they present a hostile front to the common enemy.

What the final outcome will be it is hard to tell, except that the lot of the Jew will be a hard one.

Germany

The situation with reference to the Jews is depressing. The pogroms in Poland, Galicia, Russia and the Ukraine, affecting the world with fear and horror and surpassing the atrocities of Kishineff and Homel, are having an undesirable effect also upon other people. Slowly but steadily a tremendous wave of Jew hatred rolls onward from east to west, fanning the anti-semitism of Germany to increased fury. Numerous political parties which already before the war secretly agitated against the Jews have during the war and particularly of late materially increased their ranks and do not hesitate now to appear before the public with their demands "to make an end with the Jews and to do it by force if necessary."

These parties are recruited mostly from an element which sees in the proposed pogroms an opportunity for personal benefit and material gain. The means for their propaganda against the Jews is manifold, such as standard newspapers, temporary journals, placards, pamphlets and circulars. The printing and distribution of same is done in the smaller cities and provinces. "Der Deutsche Volksrat," published in Leipzig, is exclusively devoted to anti-semitic propaganda. In a continuous article entitled "The Pogrom Movement" the following statement appears:

"The German people prefer to be ruined and to commit suicide rather than to kill the Jews. * * * Order cannot be reinstated in Germany until the Jew plague is abolished."

Papers Threaten Pogroms

Even a reputable and leading newspaper like "Germania" is not abashed to openly threaten the Jews with pogroms. The following is quoted from one of its recent editorials:

"Jewry must earnestly come to the realization that 'pressure begets pressure.' That it is not our desire to further anti-semitism we need not aver, yet it is our desire to call attention to certain results which must follow naturally, nay, will surely appear as soon as the world rids itself of bolshevism. These words are not intended as threats, but we would be unfaithful to the interests of humanity and even to Judaism, were we to abstain from pointing out certain possibilities."

The circulars and pamphlets are still more outspoken in their hatred toward the Jew. There is not a town, no matter how small it may be, where this sort of literature is not freely distributed. The tracts are being mailed to homes and offices and also find their way into factories and workshops. A pamphlet printed in Sangarten, Brandenburg, contains the following sentence with reference to the Jews: "Auf die Mistgabel werden wir Euch spiessen!"

The "Grossdeutscher Frauen Schutzbund" contains the following appeal: "Young men of Germany, are you satisfied to see your sisters ravished by the Jews and that your wives to be are plain prostitutes? Are you too cowardly or lazy, or have you sunk so low that you care not to uphold and protect German womanhood? If so, then we shall act and furnish you an example such as the world has never witnessed before."

Another circular calls attention to the fact that in Berlin alone more than two hundred German children have disappeared and are missing, and insinuating "Ritualmord," it says: "Comrades, shall we be blind to the dangers of the Moloch which daily and for centuries has swallowed up untold numbers of innocent children? Can't you hear this innocent blood calling for vengeance? Are you satisfied that your children shall meet with the same fate? Awaken ! Destroy and kill off all those who delight in destroying the Divine order of things!"

Pogrom Guard Recruited

A member of the "Deutscher Volksbund" writes in a circular: "We shall within a few weeks rid ourselves unceasingly and mercilessly of these blood suckers, the Jews!" The anti-semitic propaganda is assuming also other forms. Arrangements are being made to organize a "Pogrom Guard!"

Recently a meeting with closed doors was held in Berlin, under the ausipces of the "Committee to Educate the Masses," at which meeting government officials and army officers demanded that active and definite steps be taken against the Jews and called attention to the voluntary recruiting bureau, sanctioned by the war department, which should be used to secure recruits for the "Pogrom Guard." This Guard, at the opportune time, will let loose against the Jews and, beginning with plunder and robbery, it will, as always, end with bloodshed.

It is noteworthy that during the riots in Berlin, Munchen and Kolberg, only Jewish shops were attacked and that the majority of stores plundered and robbed in Frankfurt and Oder were also Jewish. Even the B'nai B'rith is being considered by these agitators as dangerous to the welfare of the country. In one of the circulars, speaking of the bolshevistic leader, Dr. Eugen Levine, it says: "All these crimes, these German pogroms, are due to the machinations of one Dr. Eugen Levine, a Russian Jew, and possibly also a member of the secret Jewish order, the B'nai B'rith."

Blame B'nai B'rith for War

Some Berlin newspapers have editorially declared that the war was brought about by the B'nai B'rith of Germany, who secretly connived with their brothers in England and America to overthrow the German government and to enrich themselves as a result of the cataclysm.

During my visit in Berlin, in the early part of September, I heard fears expressed that the Jewish high holidays may be opportune days for pogroms. A great number who had already provided themselves with seats in the synagogues canceled or returned the same, as they feared to make use of them.

From several sides it was proposed that a "Judische Volkswehr" be organized to offer protection to the Jews. Even before definite steps had been taken in that direction, many hundred demobilized Jewish soldiers organized themselves as flying squads to be ready for service at a moment's notice. Even the government seemed to realize the gravity of the situation by sanctioning the movement and permitting these returned soldiers to possess arms.

The government is not only unfriendly to the anti-semitic agitation, but even assists the Jews in their attempt to nullify the work of the agitators. The authorities, however, are also powerless, and have their hands full to steer the ship of state free and clear of the shoals and rocks. The proletariat is all powerful, and respect for constituted authority is a thing of the past. Thus not only can it not be denied—but it is almost certain from present indications—that times fraught with danger are in store for the Jews of Germany and the possibility of pogroms becomes more and more threatening from day to day.

Austria

Anti-semitism, which for some time, or at least for the duration of the war, had lain dormant, is now again attaining its former virulence. The temperament of the people has undergone a radical change, and, instead of servility and obedience to law and respect and deference to culture and intellect, surliness, arrogance and defiance have become the "Leitmotif" of the populace.

All the ills of the country are attributed to the Jews. In the latter part of September a monster demonstration took place in the principal square of the city, in which over 10,000 people participated. Banners were displayed upon which were written demands in unmistakable language that Jew rule must cease; that the Jews, being profiteers and exploiters of the people, must be driven out of the city.

The affair became threatening, but, luckily, at the energetic action and remonstrance of the American Mission, the Burgomaster caused the dispersion of the mob by means of mounted police and soldiers.

A few days later, on Sunday, October 5, a new demonstration took place. This time it was held under the auspices of the German Schutzen Verein and had for its object to secure a concerted demand for the expulsion of the Galician Jewish fugitives. There were many thousands of people assembled in front of the Rathaus. All the speeches delivered at this meeting were full of vulgar abuse. The resolution adopted read in part as follows:

"Should the expulsion of the undesirable Jews not be completed within a month, and the population have to suffer further under the pressure of Jewish exploiters, we repudiate all responsibility for the further development of the anti-semitic movement, and will proceed to self-help."

Want Jews as Hostages

At the commercial academy in Vienna, the lecture course was to be opened on October 8, but the Christian students refused to remain with the Jewish students and left the lecture hall in a body.

A notorious anti-semitic paper, "Wiener Stimmen," advocates that Jews be held as hostages. It claims that in doing so the Jews of the world will give the Austrian people everything they want in order that the Jews held as hostages be spared from harm.

The fact that the people of Austria depend entirely upon the good will of the entente nations for food supplies and coal is the only deterrent against their calling pogroms into life. On the other hand, the populace is so ruined economically that it has but little at stake, and for this reason the fear for persecution and even of pogroms is well justified.

Where the Arabs Dispute the Jews' Claim to Sovereign Rights.

By DR. G. DEUTSCH

OUR forefathers, saturated with religious literature, expressed themselves in quotations. This habit made their expressions both brief and impressive. With the humor which is the comforter of people living under disadvantages which they cannot remedy, they would characterize their situation in three Hebrew words, two of which are monosyllables: "U-bekhen mi lo." The words are taken from Jeremiah, 10:7, and, if translated in the sense of our grandfathers, mean: "Who is not?" They occur as the caption of a long prayer in the morning service of Yom Kippur, and therefore were familiar to the average devout Jew, even if he was not a scholar.

When he learned of a new order of the government, restricting his already much restricted livelihood, when he heard of persecutions in countries which had been considered friendly, when the relative merits of living in a Catholic or a Protestant country were discussed, when a supposed liberal came forth with a denunciation of the Talmud, of Jewish aloofness, of their economic undesirability, the Jew would shrug his shoulders and say: "U-bekhen mi lo."

Cossacks of Different Colors

The latest news, which even in these days of uncertain press reports we may accept as a fact, indicate progress of the Bolsheviki and a decisive defeat of the "loyal Russian" armies of Kolchak, Denikin and Yudenitch. Deniken lost Czernigov to the Bolsheviki, and before evacuating it, his troops won a decisive victory over the helpless Jews of the city. Petlura, Denikin's rival for the control of the Ukraine, lost Kamenetz Podolsk to the Poles, and before evacuating it, his soldiers took revenge on the Jews, butchering several hundreds of them in a pogrom that lasted two days, November 2-3.

The Poles trying to secure the permanence of their occupation of Lithuania and White Russia, are evidently trying the czarist recipe of winning the sympathy of the oppressed people by persecuting the Jews. A fugitive from Minsk reports that the butcheries, of which Mr. Morgenthau will be able to furnish us authentic information, have given way to a relentless persecution by means of "legal measures."

The Letts in Courland, fondled, as are the Poles, for their usefulness in fighting both Germans and Bolsheviki, had to be prevented, as the enigmatic report reads, from pursuing the Germans because this would have led to a pogrom. The Rumanians can surely not afford to lag behind. They ordered the expulsion of the Jews from Transylvania, where the latter had for centuries a secure home under Turkish and Magyar rule, and where there is even a section of them of pure Magyar blood, descendants of Unitarians who in the sixteenth century have adopted the Jewish religion.

A cable to the London "Times" of Nov. 12 surprises us with the report that a new organization in Turkey, calling itself "The Red Sword," came forth with a proclamation against the Jews of Salonica as having corrupted the Turkish government. The greatest surprise comes from Egypt, where demonstrations against the unpopular British rule led to a murderous attack on the Jews, in the course of which one Jew was killed. It will be remembered that one of the causes for the courtmartialing of the Jewish legionaries and their condemnation to severe terms of imprisonment was their protest against being used to quell riots in Egypt. Nevertheless the Jew in Egypt is supposed to be British, in Turkey to be Greek, in Transylvania to be Magyar, in Lithuania to be German, in Minsk to be Lithuanian, in Ukraine, according to the needs of a pretext, either Polish or Russian or Bolshevist international. "U-bekhen mi lo?"

Stable and Other Governments

The Slovaks, for centuries subjects of Hungary, are now feeling themselves as masters of their destiny and are practicing autonomy on the Jews. One of the charges is that the Jews are trying to drive a wedge between the Slovaks and their Czech brothers. A boycott is preached in their organs, and the situation must be quite critical because President Massaryk refused to receive a committee of Jews, wishing to present to him their grievances. The officers of the French commission are backing this movement to such an extent that they prohibited Jewish societies for self-protection.

The depression of the Magyars, who next to Austria, have suffered the most crushing defeat of any nation in the war, works on the Jews as badly as the exuberance of the Slovaks. The Magyars have a case which, granting the anti-semitic premise that the Jews as a class are responsible for the acts of individuals cannot be denied. The short Bolshevist regime in Hungary had a considerable Jewish following, and its downfall brought clericalism to the front.

Bishop Prochaska of Stuhlweissenberg —an old antisemitic center from which up to 1848 the Jews were excluded— states with undisguised brutality that Hungary has too many Jews, and Wekerle, the liberal premier of former times partly agrees. He is not in favor of violent measures. Hungary needs the Jews in the development of her economic life, but by and by the Magyar youth must be led to such activities that the Jews can be displaced.

The present premier, Stephen Friedrich, is an out and out clerical and monarchical reactionary. He openly appealed to the population to boycott the Jews, and to make a beginning with a boycott of all banks in which the Jews are interested. He also received a committee headed by the woman president of a Catholic society, which demanded that a cross be placed on the roof of the parliament building, and judging from the comments of the situation in Hungary, found in the "Ohio Waisenfreund," a Catholic weekly of Columbus, Ohio, which once established a record by declaring that the Jew has no more right to live than the vermin infesting our beds, Hungarian antisemitism is strictly or preponderantly clerical. These comments in the "Waisenfreund" of Oct. 29 are by the way about the meanest antisemitic trash which ever disgraced the country of religious liberty—of which a Catholic paper, and especially one published in the German language, should be more careful.

Declining Idealism

England, for centuries the haven of liberty for the persecuted of other lands, the England of Cromwell, who listened sympathetically to Manasseh Ben Israel's plea for the victims of the Inquisition, the England of the memorable Mansion House meeting of February 1, 1882, protesting against the Russian atrocities, seems to become a remote memory.

Mr. Kennworthy on November 6 interpellated the foreign office on the White Terror in Hungary and the persecution of the Jews. Captain Guest declared the rumors were greatly exaggerated and usually unfounded. We would have liked to see this diplomatic language turned into the plain statement that, while some of the rumors are exaggerated, there is enough well-established truth in them to warrant action on the part of Great Britain for the prevention of further atrocities.

The honorable and gallant gentleman —as the phraseology of the British House of Commons runs—has peculiar notions of continental affairs as concerns the Jews. The Foreign Office employs a Mr. Namier, originally Bernstein, afterwards Namierowsky, and now Namier, as expert on Polish affairs. The Polish press dislikes him most heartily and calls him "the Englishman from Przemysl." Mr. Raper, the antisemitic member of the House of Commons, wanted to know more about him, and Captain Guest in his reply (November 13) told most wonderful romance: how Mr. Namier, who was born in Warsaw of a family called Namierowski and for centuries living in Russian Poland, was brought by his father to Galicia, where the latter, in order to secure an interest in property to which his wife had become heir, was compelled to become an Austrian subject, and on the ground of a policy inforced by Russia, "the partitioning power" of Poland, was compelled to assume a German name.

We have to admit that the pedigree of Mr. Bernstein Namierowski Namier is not known to us in all its ramifications, but it sounds more probable that Mr. Namier is a native of Przemysl by the name of Bernstein, as the Polish press has it, who was metamorphosed into a Pan Namierowski of the Mosaic persuasion and as a Britisher dropped the "ow" and the "sky."

Weightier Matters

At this writing the new anti-Alien bill is still before the House of Lords with an almost certain prospect of passing. This drastic improvement of the act of August 11, 1905, was prompted by "Jew-baiting," as Major Ormsby-Gore stated (October 24); and Colonel Wedgewood (October 26) said plainly in the course of the debate that the bill dishonored the English name. Mr. Lionel de Rothschild, the president of the United Synagog, introduced an amendment which should give to a rejected alien the right to demand a trial. This was defeated but a severe provision for deportation was passed, and the cabinet, originally opposing it, yielded in order to save the bill. Except for the amendment offered by Mr. de Rothschild, the Jewish members remained silent, leaving the plea for the immigrant and the denunciation of the bill to the few liberals, one of whom, Mr. Jones, had the courage to state that anti-aliens should inquire into "the descent of the highest in the land." The bill was passed in the House, November 21, and the Northcliffe papers helped to create sentiment for it by the constantly reiterated cry of Jewish Bolshevism, which was ingeniously used in the "Times" (November 10) when that paper suggested that Mr. Lloyd George's feeler directed toward an understanding with the soviet government—denied by him but upheld by Mr. Bullit before the United States senate commission— was due to the influence of American Jewish financiers who are interested in Trotsky.

In other words, the Jewish feeling of the American financiers is so strong that they invite the success of Bolshevism, which means the confiscation of their wealth, out of sympathy with the Jew Trotsky who declared that he does not consider himself a Jew.

Liberte, Egalite, Fraternite

It was previously mentioned that officers of the French commission in Hungary are supporting the Slovacks in their antisemitic policy. It is even reported that French troops of the army of occupation in the German Rhineland have participated in or at least tolerated a pillage of Jewish stores in Saarbruecken.

The Berling "Boersenkurier" (September 17) tells the most atrocious stories of brutality in the treatment of the population so that one will not be surprised to hear that the outraged sufferers fall back on the handiest victim of all national calamities. Foreign rule, economic distress and a weak government, meeting with open hostility by the lovers of the old order, including the religious element, are bound to arouse the cry for the fleshpots of the kaiser's rule, coupled with a denunciation of Moses' kinfolks.

Germany is in severe straits. The ruling socialist party is hopelessly divided, the rate of exchange makes the buying in foreign markets almost impossible; the people are starving, and the great pride of the old Fatherland, the efficiency and incorruptible honesty of its officials is, as we are reliably informed, passing with the insufficiency of salaries.

The government of Ebert is tottering. Hindenburg and Ludendorff were prevented by a mob from appearing before the commission of the Reichstag before which they were to testify on the responsibility for the war, and out of the crowd cries, "Down with the Jewish government" were heard (November 14). Karl Helfferich, the former vice-chancellor, refused to answer questions of Dr. Oscar Cohn, socialist member of the Reichstag, claiming that Cohn had received money from Adolf Joffe, the first ambassador of the Russian republic to Berlin. The papers claim as his real reason that he would not answer the questions of a Jew.

Paul Hirsch, a socialist member of the Prussian diet since 1908, and now premier of Prussia, denounced the conservatives for using the students of the universities in street demonstrations against the government. Maximilian Harden, the apostate Jew, who likes to pose as disinterested outsider, warns the government against encouraging reaction by giving the Jews such prominence. A "Schutz-und Trutzbund," which has its branches among the high school students all over the country, indulges in monarchial and antisemitic demonstrations. A protest by Professor Gerland in the "Berliner Tageblatt" (November 5) against this government which will discredit Germany, seems to be a voice in the wilderness.

Conditions in German Austria are still worse, it seems, and in view of the distress prevailing in Vienna, where, according to "Neue Freie Presse" (October 16), the population is assigned— but so far only promised because the amount is not available—one kilo (2 pounds and three ounces) of coal per household a day, the outlook for the Jews is critical. Strafner, a nationalist member of the parliament, said, seeing the Jews in kaftan and Peot, he felt a yearning for the executioner. It is discouraging for the believer in the ideals of humanity to learn that even in free Switzerland Jewish students from Vienna, mostly wounded and sick soldiers sent there for recuperation, are threatened with expulsion.

Paradisus Judaeorum

The situation in Poland is tersely characterized by Dr. Boris Bogen, in charge of the relief work of the Joint Distribution Committee, who said in an interview with the London "Jewish Chronicle" (October 10): "There are not merely pogroms in Poland. There is one continuous unceasing, unrelenting pogrom." This authorized public statement sets at rest all the rumors in the Polish Yiddish press that Dr. Bogen, as member of the committee to investigate the conditions, had indorsed the supposed report of Ambassador Gibson, exonerating the Polish government.

The view of Dr. Bogen is confirmed by refugees who came to this country. The "Jewish Courier" of Chicago publishes a statement of Miss Kestenbaum who recently arrived in that city from Lublin and who plainly says: "The Jews have nothing to look for from the Poles."

Under these conditions it is practically immaterial how much truth there is in the recent reports of new pogroms in Minsky and Wilna, in the brutalities perpetrated on the Jewish recruits in Tarnow, in the arbitrary taxes imposed on Jewish merchants, in the expulsions from individual cities, and in the daily excesses of General Haller's soldiers.

The difficulties in obtaining definite information may be inferred from the following case reported from Minsk. A deaf Jew was beaten to death on the streets by soldiers in uniform for having refused information asked of him which he, of course, could not give because he did not hear the question. The fact of his being killed is admitted in the report of the American commission, but the fact that he was deaf is suppressed. It is admitted that numerous Jews from Wilna, deported when the Poles entered the city, are still kept in internment camps. It is impossible to know whether they were guilty of any offense because nobody is allowed to see them or even to know the place of their detention.

The Advocates of the Jews

Judging by the continued bitterness of the Polish press and by its antisemitic backers in England, Sir Stuart Samuel, the head of the British commission for the investigation of the pogroms, is not going to join in the white-washing process which (according to rumors so far not authenticated) is the tenor of the report written by Mr. Morganthau and General Jadwin. The New York "Morgen Journal" (Yiddish) reports (October 30) that the police of Warsaw made an attempt to search Sir Stuart's office to which he strenuously and successfully objected.

Rabbi Perlmutter, member of the sejm, is bitterly attacked in the Yiddish press of Poland, which claims that his mission to London, ostensibly in the interest of relief work, was actually managed by the government in the hope of using him as crown witness. This is supported by the fact that he voted for the exclusion from the sejm of the radical member, Noah Prilucki, who has made himself obnoxious to the government by his fearless exposure of its responsibility for the pogroms.

For the same reason the government urges the unseating of the delegate Nomberg, and demands the prosecution of the delegate Gruenbaum, who criticized it in the Zionist organ, "Der Kaempfer," which, like another Yiddish daily, "Hajnt," a journal that existed even in the czarist times, was suppressed.

Infernus Rusticorum

The same couplet which calls Poland the paradise of the Jews calls it the hell of the peasants, and herein lies the most important solution of the puzzle why new Poland indulges in the policy, introduced by the Jesuits in the sixteenth century. Just as at the time the exploited peasantry was to be kept in the leash by the scare of heresy, so today the imminent

SUPERGOVERNMENT

THE opponents of the League of Nations Covenant in the Senate have raised the cry that it stands for supergovernment. It is possible, of course, that other motives played into the impasse which was created at the time that the upper house adjourned. Somehow the executive and the treaty-ratifying body have not worked in harmony. At any rate the narrow margin by which the balance of power in the legislative body switched to the other party was taken as a mandate from the people to effect a change in our foreign policy.

The chief objection contains an appeal to the voters to weigh well a departure from what is called Americanism, and supergovernment is the bugbear. If indeed the issue were clear-cut and we had to choose between an American and an un-American policy, there would not be a moment's doubt as to the position which all true lovers of America should assume. Probably, however, it is a case of a lack of foresight as compared with the large vision of the advocates of the Covenant, chief among whom is the President himself, with ex-President Taft a worthy second, no matter how these two worthy Americans may differ in detail.

The truth is we must come to an understanding with that thing called supergovernment. America went to war on the side of the Allies because with them it was determined to lay low not so much the military machine of the enemy, but the spirit behind it which said and acted out the doctrine that the state can do no wrong and that necessity knows no law. As our soldiers with grim mien threw themselves against the iron wall they felt that they were battering down more than the wall itself, they were dealing the death blow to a false conception of the omnipotence of the state.

The state can do wrong. Just as little as the individual may with impunity put self-interest above right, can one state assume an utter disregard of other states. It is true our hands are sometimes not clean. The impression right now is that the treaty-enforcing powers look to their own selfish interests and ruthlessly invoke might against right. We have ourselves imperceptibly been inoculated with the poison which we started out to destroy. Obviously states can be suffered to run as little amuck as individuals. The actions of a state must be governed by the opinion of the world.

That high tribunal has always existed. It was the superbody which curbed the greed of states. The Covenant of the League of Nations would set up the machinery for the corporate expression of the world's best opinion. It would legalize the supervision and superjudgment which in a measure are already in force. It is not, "My country right or wrong," but, "My country because she is always in the right."

If the state refrains from selfish actions which are bound to jeopardize the safety of weaker states, it has avoided the clash with a superauthority. That is the true conception of Americanism. America can never be wrong, not because it has the power to enforce its will, but because its will is always righteous, considerate, selfless. Does that mean that we must always yield, forestall the decree of the League by abiding by it beforehand? Not indeed, if we are in the right. But if for a moment we should have been blinded by a hasty judgment, by passion, it would become us to recognize the error of our ways.

We Americans just because we are strong enough must teach other nations, and be they the mightiest, the lesson of self-control.

America cannot remain isolated. That policy of splendid isolation died with the war. We entered the war after due weighing of the consequences. We might have said then, the quarrel does not concern us. We might have left Europe to bleed itself to death. We interfered to save civilization. Had we then thought that Americanism counseled the policy of hands-off, we would have kept intact the lives of so many Americans and our treasure, but we would have incurred not merely possible disaster at our own doors, but what is worse, the just condemnation of mankind; and our own conscience would have branded us as guilty.

In other words, we then chose to cast our isolation overboard and to listen to a higher authority to which we were constrained to yield obedience. That is to say, we believed ourselves mandatories appointed by a League of Nations as it might have been but was not, because perforce it had to pass through the crucible of carnage and destruction. We were not laggards then and we cannot be recreant to our duty now. We left our isolated position and we cannot return to it, simply because of our participation in the war which in its inception was European.

It is not that we expect any benefits to accrue to us when we join the League. We stand in need of no help from anybody. But the world needs us sorely. The voice of free America must not be silent at the conventions of the League. We are the only disinterested nation, disinterested so far as we ourselves are concerned. Ours therefore is the unique privilege to inject into all future deliberations the spirit of fair play, of justice to all concerned, of protection to the weakest member, of help to young and struggling nations.

If we are out of the League, or even slow in entering, we shall lose our prestige and with it that moral force which has made a world look up to us for guidance and sustaining power. Those who think that they are making the treaty American by cutting out its vital provisions which simply transplant to other continents and states the spirit of our own free institutions, are in truth only making it less American.

And the specious plea that we are surrendering sovereignty in favor of supergovernment will not mislead true Americans who recognize the peculiar conditions of today and believe in a measure of adjustment to meet circumstances which, had our fathers been confronted with them, they would have met in the same resolute and generous spirit.

The Aftermath

An Analysis of Post-War Conditions in America and a Prediction in Favor of Sanity

By DR. MAX L. MARGOLIS

IT was to be expected and it should surprise no one that when the world war came to an end its effect would be felt for some time to come. Of course, the waste which that gigantic slaughter entailed could not be repaired in less than a generation's time. Justice demanded that what the enemy had destroyed should be made good in so many dollars and cents. But to make him pay is to make it possible for him to pay, and nothing that happens beyond what was the line of battle can fail to affect us all on this side.

Of all the lamentable sequences to the war nothing is so disastrous as that breakdown of moral restraint which somehow has appeared even among ourselves with our much vaunted stability of conditions as well as of temper. It shows itself in haste to acquire wealth; in making the most of an abnormal situation; in cornering the market; in storing food for profit, in gouging and profiteering. The laboring man would seem to be doing well; but on all sides the complaint is heard that the work done is of an inferior grade, that men will shirk, and worst of all that they are slothful and that there is a reluctance to exertion.

Spend Less, Produce More

The statesmen and responsible leaders tell us that the speedy rehabilitation of the world depends upon spending less and producing to the utmost capacity. Yet we hear that men and women spend lavishly and on the other hand that the output in the factories lags behind. Demagogues are fanning the flame of class hatred. Strikes are engineered against previous agreements and contracts are broken at the bidding of mischief makers.

Not that justifiable grievances should not be adjusted. But the weapon of coercion is a dangerous one. It destroys all sense of proportion, it deadens a minority to the disastrous effects which the walk out must have upon millions and millions of fellow citizens. And out of this struggle between the haves and the have-nots which is not of yesterday there results in a community like ours the pernicious onslaught upon the alien.

Because of a few "reds" in our foreign population the native is apt to take to himself the unction that all would be well in the land were it not for the accursed foreigner. The "red" agitation is abominable. It must be stamped out. But it is the province of the law and of its appointed guardians to do the stamping out. When self-appointed organizations take the law into their own hands, our free institutions will in the end suffer.

Passion versus Justice

You cannot kill one species of lawlessness by another of the same kind. Passion is placed upon the seat of justice. The citizenry of the land is divided against itself. The common effort during the war would have seemed to cement all the races that make up the American people. But the spirit of co-operation, of unity was short-lived.

We are farther apart than before—as when in the drive now going on for the relief of the Jews in Eastern Europe, to save a million Jewish children from starvation or stunted growth, here and there the voice has been heard, when a non-Jew was approached, "It is not our concern," and when a small pittance was offered the very amount was an overt insult. The more gratifying it is that these voices, though symptomatic, are sporadic, and that over against the ungenerous everywhere we have met with a hearty response. Probably some still remember how eagerly and generously Jews but a little while ago contributed to welfare organizations no matter what the denomination that started them, and in times of peace how frequently Jews donate to church work and church activity.

And rightly so. If we believe in our own faith and cherish our own institutions we must accord the same merit to like faiths and institutions. Everything that makes for clean lives, for decency, for honesty, for sobriety concerns every citizen. We resent encroachments. But otherwise we are willing to help every noble cause under whatsoever symbol it goes.

In the Aftermath of War

Yes, we are living in the untoward circumstances of the war's aftermath. It is all in the bargain, and we must not grumble. For after all the signs are there that we shall outgrow these excrescences. Once more we shall be leading the normal life, in which there is mutual trust and helpfulness, freedom of speech under self-restraint, kindliness to our neighbor of a different persuasion, the regard for law and its due processes, and the feeling that the world is of one kin, that the cry of distress concerns everybody alike, and that suffering in the farthest corner of the earth must be alleviated.

What an inspiration men of the type of Herbert Hoover furnish! He and his like it is that represent the best Americanism, which penetrates beneath the outward shell to the core of humanity, which is merciful even to the enemy, which knows no distinction of native or foreigner, of this or that race or creed, when it comes to stilling the cry of hunger from the mouths of innocent babes.

Look Toward New Day

It is because of such men that we despair not of the havoc which the sequel to the war has wrought amongst us, that we hope to conquer the beast of hatred, that we look forward to an America proud of its traditions which no amount of temporary disturbances will dislocate from their equilibrium, proud of its fair name as the haven of the oppressed and the one place on God's earth where a man may rise to his full stature no matter what his encumbrances, so long as he absorbs the spirit of this country and meets fair play by the same degree of justice And so we look away from the irritation of the moment to behold the equable future which shall resume the past thread. Not to divide, but to unify, must be the watchword of all true Americans. Then we shall look back upon the aftermath of the war as a thing that had to be lived through for a short period, quite like the war itself, which soon will be a thing forgotten.

Indeed, we have no fear that America will come into her own, a happy land of concord and sanity and amity and unified endeavor for the betterment of the common heritage which we all cherish.

Governor Rebukes Attack on Jews

Kansas Executive Repudiates Discrimination in the Selection of State Hospital Staff; Head of Oakland Schools Apologizes for Canard in Scholars' Paper, U. S. Judge Explains Opinion; Other Anti-Defamation League Activities

THE work of the Anti-Defamation League, which prosecuted with notable success during November its war upon slanderers of the Jews, presents an interesting array of correspondence, especially the letters passing between the Administrative Committee and Governor Henry J. Allen of Kansas.

LEON L. LEWIS AGAIN APPOINTED SECRETARY OF ANTI-DEFAMATION LEAGUE

MR. LEON L. LEWIS, who acted as Secretary of the League at its inception and who has recently returned to Chicago, after eighteen months' service as Captain in the A. E. F., has again been appointed to the position of Secretary, to succeed, Mr. L. Edward Lashman, who has been made Superintendent of the Jewish Orphan Home in Cleveland.

All complaints and letters of inquiry relating to Anti-Defamation League matters should be directed to Mr. Lewis at the office of the Administrative Committee, 1228 Tribune Bldg., Chicago, Illinois.

Dr. F. A. Carmichael, Superintendent of the Kansas State Hospital at Osawatomie, caused to be prepared a circular letter, which subsequently was sent out to all applicants for employment. The letter read:

''Hospital, 1350 beds; live bunch of hustlers doing up to the minute work. You must be a hustler and be able to deliver the goods. No pensioners. Excellent opportunity for study of neurology and psychiatry. Good opportunity for man interested in pathology who has technique. Not expected to know the work but must be willing to learn. Staff of five physicians. Single man (the younger the better) preferred but married man considered. Will start you at $1,500 and maintenance, more if you are worth it, but you will have to show me. No Jews. Let me hear how this strikes you. F. A. CARMICHAEL, Supt. State Hospital, Osawatomie, Kansas.''

Canard Is Repudiated.

On Nov. 5, the Administrative Committee brought Dr. Carmichael's attitude to the attention of Governor Allen, as follows:

''My Dear Governor:—We are enclosing copy of a letter received by a citizen of Chicago in answer to his application for a position with the Osawatomie State Hospital. We wish to call your attention to the statement, 'No Jews.' We know your sentiments in the matter, and feel that you should know that the superintendent of your state hospital discriminates against members of the Jewish faith. The letter appears to have been mimeographed and must have been sent to a considerable number of applicants.''

Three days later the following communication came to the League from the Governor's office at Topeka:

''Thank you for sending me under date of the 11th inst. a copy of letter you have received from the Superintendent of the Osawatomie State Hospital. I have taken the matter up with the State Board of Administration. I fully agree with you that it is not the sort of statement that should go out from Kansas, and the objectionable words in the circular, as well as the spirit of it, will be eliminated. I cannot believe that this letter has ever been adopted as the carefully digested standard of the institution in selecting its medical staff. Thank you for calling my attention to the matter.''

A School Boy's Slur.

''The Lakeview News'' is a small newspaper published by the students of the Lakeview Public School, at Oakland, Cal. In its issue of Oct. 15, described as ''The Booster Bond Issue,'' a poem, entitled ''Think of the Kids,'' by Harold Brassfield, appeared as follows:

''Be an American;
Vote for the Bonds.
We need the schools,
And also the grounds.
Oakland is growing—
So must the schools.
Think of your kids
When you go to the polls.
Forget the taxes—
Don't be like the Yids
When you vote on the school bonds;
Just thinks of the kids.''

Sidney J. Silverstein, the League's representative at Oakland, brought the slander to the attention of Fred M. Hunter, superintendent of schools. After an investigation of the circumstances, Mr. Hunter wrote:

''Dear Mr. Silverstein:—As per our conversation at the Shrine meeting on Oct. 15, I investigated the item in the 'Lakeview News,' as I promised. I certainly regret more than I can tell you this occurrence. I understand that apologies do not remedy a matter like this when the harm is once done. I can only submit you a statement of the facts and try to make clear that this happening does not represent the attitude of the Oakland Public Schools.

''I immediately called the principal of the Lakeview School, asking him for a statement of the facts. He submitted immediately in behalf of the teachers and the school a letter of explanation and whole-hearted apology. I am enclosing a copy of the letter.

Expresses Profound Regret.

''While apologies can do little good after the harm of a thing like this is done, they can, I hope, express to those who were injured the sincerity of the attitude of those who are responsible for the injury. I trust you and your people believe that I am sincere when I tell you that the Oakland Schools do not stand for this sort of thing, or for any discriminating attitude in any sense toward any religion, and that this expresses the attitude not only of the executive officers but of the principals and teachers alike.

''The fact that most of the larger elementary schools and all of our high schools print papers of this kind and have done so for several years, and that this is the first occurrence of this kind in thousands of contributions by students, I believe is of some evidence in confirmation of this expression of our attitude.

''Of course, an organization, I suppose, ought to be sufficiently perfect to keep tragic accidents such as this from occurring, but it is very difficult in the heat of an exciting campaign to control the action of our 35,000 school children and all of our 1,500 employes.

''Moreover, I believe no one realizes more fully than does the management, including the board of education, executive officers, and teaching force of the Oakland schools that the Jewish people as a whole are among the very best supporters of public education, and that the leaders among the Jewish people and the rank and file are not only unselfish and public spirited, but are representatives of the leading thought of the country as to what a public school system ought to be and to do.

''I believe I could adduce considerable evidence to prove to you that this, rather than the unfortunate item in the school paper, represents the viewpoint of the Oakland public schools toward the Jewish patrons of the schools and citizens of Oakland.

''As I have already stated, this is not an excuse, or in the least an attempt to shift our responsibility or my own personal responsibility. I can only say that I regret extremely that this unfortunate happening has taken place, and that I shall certainly do all in my power to see that such a thing never happens again.''

''Merely Making Rhyme.''

The enclosed letter of the principal read:

''My Dear Mr. Hunter:—My attention has been called to the second line in the last verse of a poem, 'Think of the Kids,' published in our last issue of the 'Lakeview News.' We wish to assure you that no reference was intended in the line. It was merely a boy's idea of making the line rhyme.

''Both Miss Strawbridge, the English teacher, and myself read the poem, but it did not occur to us that anyone could attach any significance to it. If, however, anyone has been offended by the word 'Yid' used therein, I as principal of the school, and speaking for the whole school, wish to offer our sincere apologies for having made this error and assure you that nothing of this kind will happen in the future. Most sincerely,

''EDGAR E. MULLER.''

Letter to United States Judge.

An unusual incident in the League's activities resulted from a remark attributed to Judge David P. Dyer, of the United States District Court, at St. Louis, as having been made from the bench. Under date of Nov. 10 the Administrative Committee wrote the judge in part as follows:

''Dear Sir:—The Oct. 27 issue of the St. Louis 'Post-Dispatch' quoted you in the case against the United Cloth & Cap Makers of America as making the following statement in court: 'A Jew immigrant and a woman came here and stirred up trouble when there was no dispute between the workers and their employers over wages or hours. Such things must be stopped.'

''Please understand, in the first instance, we have no fault to find with the decision itself. We do deem it proper, however, to inquire why emphasis should have been laid upon Zaritsky's religious faith. If, instead of the man's name being Zaritsky, it had been, let us say, O'Brien, would the court have referred to him as a Catholic immigrant? We beg leave to suggest that the word 'Jew' does not add strength to the opinion, or, if omitted, would not weaken it.

Newspapers Set Example.

''Some time ago, our League issued a note, 'On the Use of the Word ''Jew,''' copies of which are now being used by the leading newspapers of the country. We are sending you one of these cards, which will explain our objection to the word 'Jew' as used by you.

''We should greatly appreciate an answer to our communication.''

The letter was signed by the chairman of the committee, Philip Stein, formerly Judge of the Appellate Court for the First District of Illinois, and Judge Dyer responded two days later in his own handwriting:

''Ordinarily I would make no reply to criticism of the court but as your letter is couched in courteous language and comes from respectable sources, I reply and beg to say that I never saw the newspaper article you refer to. The exact language used I can not with certainty state, but to the best of my recollection it was in substance, 'This fellow was foreign born, was a Russian immigrant to this country, was naturalized in the City of New York, but has no conception of his duties as an American citizen.' ''

From ''Vox Populi.''

Under a caption, ''Letters to the Editor,'' The San Diego ''Sun,'' of San Diego, Cal., recently published the following:

''Editor Sun:—How is it that every city and town in California has the two-platoon for firemen with the exception of San Diego and Fresno? If San Diego can't afford it, then why are the firemen picked as the goats? Where Chief Almgren resides, at Tenth and B station, the firemen are either doing the shimmy dance or the goose step with fright. Fireman Strauser, a German Jew, is the chief's right hand man. Too bad he isn't the kaiser.

''JERRY GREEN.''

Lasker Lodge, No. 370, brought the letter to the attention of S. I. Fox, the League's San Diego representative, who received a communication from the paper as follows:

''I hasten to inform you that any intention of defamation against the Jewish race was absolutely foreign from our idea in printing the letter in question. The letter was printed just as it came to us through the mails, but it was a mistake on our part that we overlooked the reference to the German Jew. Hoping that you will realize that we are regretful of our mistake, we are,

Very sincerely,
HAROLD RUSSELL,
''City Editor.''

Ever since its formation, the Anti-Defamation League has waged a campaign to banish Shakespeare's ''The Merchant of Venice'' from the schools. The public school system of St. Paul, Minn., is the last to heed the League's request, as is witnessed by the following letter to the League from S. O. Hartwell, the superintendent:

''I have your letter of Oct. 8 with copy of enclosed previous letter regarding the inclusion of 'The Merchant of Venice' in the list of required readings for high school. For years this play was on the required list of readings for college preparation undertaken by various high schools. However, I understand that it is now on the list of auxiliary readings and we are perfectly willing to arrange that it shall not be made a required exercise.''

A Splendid Example

The alumni association of the Hebrew Orphans' Home at Atlanta, Ga., founded under the auspices of the Order by Simon Wolf, who was its president for 25 years, has just evidenced the effect of its members' training, guided by R. A. Sonn, the superintendent for 30 years. The alumni presented $20,000 in bonds to the Home as a token of their affection, the interest to go to Mr. Sonn during his lifetime. After his death the principal will be added to the Simon Wolf Endowment Fund.

A Request

Contributors of Lodge news to be printed in these pages will please forward material as far as they find it possible in typewritten form with space between the lines sufficient for correction. If the matter is written in long hand, special attention is requested to be given to plain spelling of names. When clippings are sent from other papers, upon each should appear the name of the Lodge, the city where it is resident and the date of the affair described. THE EDITOR.

Hartford, Conn.

On Sunday evening, Oct. 19, Aarat Lodge No. 13, of Hartford, Conn., had an open meeting, which was one of the most successful affairs ever held by that lodge. Brother M. A. Hartstall, District Deputy of Connecticut, presided. Brother Congressman Siegel delivered a very interesting address on "What Ails America." Brother Chas. H. Shapiro, president of the District, who accompanied Brother Siegel on his trip, also delivered a splendid talk on the progress of the B'nai B'rith in our district. Aarat Lodge looks forward to a series of open meetings this season with a number of prominent speakers and a large increase in membership.

In Poland

Isidor Hershfield, who is now in Warsaw as one of the Commissioners of the Joint Distribution Committee, in a statement which he has sent to the Central Relief Committee, 51 Chambers Street, New York, N. Y., says:

"My supply of adjectives to describe the situation here has long ago been exhausted. The present winter will take its toll of many thousands of Jewish lives, among them many, many thousands of Jewish children. They will die of starvation or cold. Disease is now and will be rampant all over Poland.

"Our meager American moneys will not be able to save the people here. Our funds available here are a mocking, trivial pittance. As the representative of the Joint Distribution Committee here I must stand helpless at the deathbed of these thousands of my brothers and sisters. They are doomed to freeze, to starve, to die. Can you help me to save some of them, at least the little children?

"If our well-fed, well-clad, American Jews could see conditions here and hear the pitiful appeals which cannot be adequately granted, I am sure that their hearts—broken, torn and bleeding, as is mine—would move them to give much more generously."

Stamford, Conn.

Jacob B. Ullman Lodge No. 685, of Stamford, Conn., held an open meeting on Wednesday, Oct. 15.

In general interest and enthusiasm the meeting was one of the most successful in the history of the lodge. Brother Charles H. Shapiro, president of the district, accompanied by a delegation of members of Harmony Lodge, was the guest of the evening and delivered an address on the achievements of the Order since the last convention. Several of the past presidents of the lodge also made splendid talks. Other speakers were District Deputy Joseph G. Shapiro and Dr. M. S. Rosen, past president of Harmony Lodge. After the meeting the members enjoyed refreshments and cigars.

A large photograph of Judge Jacob B. Ullman, after whom the lodge is named, a present of the Ullman family of New Haven, adorns the lodge room in the Hebrew Institute.

Executive Board Names Committee to Call on Lansing; Is Assured U. S. is Doing Everything It Can to Stop the Excesses at Once

POGROMS directed against the Jews in portions of Europe, formerly comprised in the Russian Empire—particularly that part of Russia which is now the Republic of the Ukraine—formed the subject of an exchange of communications between the Executive Committee of the Order and the Department of State.

Following the Executive Committee's meeting in Chicago, Nov. 16, 17 and 18, the following letter was forwarded to Washington:

"To the Honorable Robert Lansing,
Secretary of State, Washington,
D. C. Nov. 20, 1919.

"Sir: I have the honor to address you in regard to the action taken at a meeting of the Executive Committee of the Independent Order B'nai B'rith held in Chicago this week at which numerous petitions were presented by lodges of the Order and by individuals calling attention to apparently authenticated press reports regarding excesses and pogroms practiced against Jews in various parts of the territory of what was formerly the Russian Empire and particularly in that part now known as the Republic of the Ukraine and requesting steps to secure sympathetic action of our government with a view to preventing a repetition of these outrages.

"The Executive Committee is well aware of the earnest efforts made by the President of the United States and yourself to ameliorate the condition of all oppressed peoples and we are especially cognizant of his and your untiring efforts to relieve and protect as far as possible the Jewish people in certain parts of Europe from the suffering which they have been made to endure.

"In view of these recent outrages, however, the Executive Committee feels that it is its duty to lay before you as the head of the State Department, such information as has come to its knowledge, so that this government may have a definite basis for protest and action. To this end, therefore, the Executive Committee has deemed it wise to appoint a committee of three, of which the Honorable Simon Wolf is chairman, to call on you at the earliest possible moment and lay the matter before you in person.

"Permit me, therefore, on behalf of the order, as well as on behalf of all American citizens of the Jewish faith to bespeak for this committee and its cause, your earnest consideration and sympathetic action. With renewed expressions of respect and esteem, I have the honor to be

"Most respectfully yours,
"ADOLf KRAUS, President."

In response came the following telegram on Nov. 28:

"Hon. Adolph Krause,
Tribune Building,
Chicago, Ill.

"Had interview with Secretary Lansing. He said that the government was doing everything it could, but unfortunately we had no means of enforcing our stand, since we had no representative in the Ukraine; that efforts are now being made looking toward a stopping of the pogroms and the amelioration of the distress, and that the sympathies of the American government were in full accord with our viewpoint.

"Simon Wolf."

Other matters considered by the Executive Committee at its session were:

Report of the Secretary of the Order, who was in Europe for three months as to the condition of the Jews abroad and the standing of the Order in such countries where lodges are situated, and how best to aid in relieving the distress of co-religionists suffering as the result of the war and in rehabilitating the members of the Order in accordance with existing government regulations.

The B'nai B'rith Gold Medal was awarded by the Executive Committee to Honorable Simon Wolf for services rendered to Judaism and Humanity for many years and especially during the past year.

Arrangements were made for the holding of the Quinquennial Convention of the Constitutional Grand Lodge of the Order on the Second Sunday in May, 1920, in the city of Cleveland.

Washington, D. C.

Argo Lodge No. 413 adopted a resolution Nov. 26, on the death of Brother Adolph Brand, who succumbed Sept. 8.

In the death of Brother Brand the Order loses a most conscientious and enthusiastic worker, for whom no effort was too great that went for its betterment. In his capacity of Secretary of the local Jewish Welfare Board he rendered service that earned him the encomiums of the various government officials he had occasion frequently to meet.

Argo Lodge owes him grateful remembrance as by his sole efforts its membership was greatly enhanced in numbers. Memorial ceremonies were held at the last meeting of the lodge in his honor.

The resolutions follow:

"Whereas, We bow our heads in humble submission to God, who in His infinite wisdom has seen fit to remove from our midst our brother, Adolph Brand, who departed this life on Monday, the 13th day of Ellul, 5679, Sept. 8, 1919, at the early age of 49, and

"Whereas, Brother Adolph Brand has done very valuable services for our beloved Order in general and for Argo Lodge in particular, and has earned the distinction of being the first, and up to the present, the only brother who has ever been awarded a gold medal by Argo Lodge in recognition of his very valuable services; therefore be it

"Resolved by Argo Lodge, No. 413, I.O.B.B., District No. 5, at its November meeting, that we deeply deplore his demise and keenly feel his loss. And be it further

"Resolved that this Resolution be engrossed upon the minutes of the lodge; that a copy of this Resolution, together with the said gold medal, or a photograph of same, be suitably framed and placed in a conspicuous position in the lodge room, in which manner it is to be kept as long as Argo Lodge remains in existence; and that a copy of this Resolution be sent to our official organ, 'The B'nai B'rith News.'"

Jewish Orphan Home

The Board of Trustees and Directors of the Jewish Orphan Home, Cleveland, Districts 2 and 6, announce the election at a special meeting held Nov. 30, 1919, of Mr. and Mrs. L. Edward Lashman of Chicago as Superintendent and Matron, respectively, for the term beginning Jan. 1, 1920, and ending Nov. 1, 1921.

Wilmington, Del.

A fete in honor of the home coming of Colonel Max R. Wainer was staged by Wilmington Lodge No. 470 in the Du Barry Room of the Hotel Du Pont.

After a banquet, Colonel Wainer was presented with a gold medal in behalf of the Lodge, which he will wear beside the distinguished service medal and the medal of the Legion of Honor of France, which he won abroad. In a short address of thanks, Colonel Wainer referred to his mother and father, who were present, as the persons whose tender care has made his service to our country possible.

Two hundred persons attended. At the right of the toastmaster, Nathan Miller, president of the Lodge, sat the honored guest; at the toastmaster's left, William C. Taylor, mayor of the city. Others at the speakers' table included Secretary of State Everett C. Johnson, Rabbi Samuel A. Robinowitz, Colonel J. Warner Reed, David Bortin of Philadelphia; Albert L. Moise, United States Appraiser of the Port of Philadelphia; George Carter, J. Harry Gordon, Rabbi David Swiren, Israel Wainer, father of the colonel; Professor A. H. Berlin, principal of the High School, and A. O. H. Grier.

Colonel Wainer is about thirty-four years of age. After his graduation from the University of Pennsylvania, he entered the army as a private, rose to the distinction of colonel, and now occupies the position of Chief of Personnel of the War Risk Bureau at Washington, having charge of 15,000 employees.

Colonel Wainer has been an ardent Ben B'rith since he was twenty-one years of age. He distinguished himself in France by founding the re-classification system, and in consequence was presented with the French Legion of Honor and distinguished service medals.

Bridgeport, Conn.

Harmony Lodge No. 711 celebrated the seventy-fifth anniversary of Brother Max Neisner the evening of Nov. 16.

Brother Neisner is the sole surviving Connecticut veteran of the civil war, who in commemoration of the occasion presented a beautiful silk flag to the Lodge. Members who had returned from National Service also were feted and Brother Charles H. Shapiro presented each with an emblem in the Lodge's behalf.

A distinction unique in the B'nai B'rith annals of this District has been attained by the Lodge in that it has doubled its membership in six months.

On the night of Oct. 15 at Harmony Hall, the opening event of the season was held, at which Dr. Abraham Anspacher, Rabbi of Temple Beth Israel of Hartford, spoke.

Members of Abraham and Harmony Lodges held a special service in the Park Avenue Temple the evening of Nov. 21. Colonel Harry Cutler was the principal speaker.

Pueblo, Colo.

Members of Pueblo Lodge No. 526 were shocked on Oct. 11 to learn of the death of L. D. Koretz.

Apparently in good health, Brother Koretz started with his wife from his ranch at Fowler, Colo., for his home in Pueblo, where he intended to assist in the American Jewish Relief Campaign drive. On the way Brother Koretz was stricken with acute indigestion and died before a physician could be summoned.

He was a leader in movements of uplift and charity, especially in B'nai B'rith work, having several times represented Pueblo Lodge in the District Grand Lodge.

New Lodge is Instituted in Vienna

Program Limited, Invitations Announce, by Restrictions Placed Upon the Use of Food, Light and Heat; Name Selected is Wahrheit

A NEW lodge—Wahrheit Lodge—was instituted by the Order in Vienna on Nov. 1. The invitation to the ceremony, which indicates some of the difficulties surrounding it, follows: "October 19.

"Dear Sir:—Referring to our recent announcement, we herewith extend to you the invitation issued by the Provisional General Committee of Vienna to attend on Sunday, Nov. 16, the installation of the new lodge, Warheit. The program will, of necessity, be limited because of the exceptionally difficult conditions governing the food, heating and lighting situations. The installation will, however, be carried out as well as it possibly can be under the circumstances. The program will begin at 3:00 o'clock in the afternoon, in the District No. 9 meeting rooms, No. 4 University Street.

"The meeting will be followed by a congenial tea, for which a charge of ten kronin per person will be made.

"Please reply to the below address, advising us whether we may expect you for the meeting and also indicate whether you will attend the tea. Wear full dress!"

Stockton, Cal.

Men who entered National Service from Stockton Lodge were entertained at a Homecoming Celebration at Redman's Hall. Over two hundred members attended including visitors from San Francisco, Oakland and Fresno.

Among the latter were Grand President Melton Meyer of San Francisco; Grand First Vice President L. Mendelsohn of Fresno, and Orator Edgar Levy of San Francisco. Twenty new members of the Order were initiated by a special degree team and a banquet was served.

The honored guests of the evening numbered Ben Sinai, Dr. Friedberger, Dr. N. Sinai, Meyer Rosenberg, Solly Davidson, Morris Shuper, Clarence Semel. Fred Greenberg, Emil Gumpert, Solly Kline, Arie Neistat, Isaac Weinberg, Harry Tobenkin, Sam Berger, Jack Ganales, Joseph Hoffman and Melvin Levy.

Two members of the Order who joined the colors died shortly after their return—George Klein and Sidney Brown.

Washington, Pa.

Washington Lodge No. 576 gave a banquet at the Masonic Hall in honor of the returned service men, following the initiation of the largest class since its installation. The initiation was in charge of a degree team from Jericho Lodge of Pittsburgh, Pa., consisting of A. L. Solomon, Louis Caplan and Harold L. Solomon, assisted by Henry Schoenthal of New York City, the local Lodge's founder.

Approximately one hundred and sixty persons, including the families of the service men, were feted. The banquet was preceded by a prayer, delivered by Rabbi Jacob Goldfarb. A piano solo was played by Mrs. Rudolph Hanau and Mrs. Alex Cohen sang.

Immediately following the banquet, Robert Abel, president of the Order, presented each of the service men with a gold mounted fountain pen. The following were present: Abraham Goldfarb, Harry W. Samolsky, Jack R. Richman, Theodore Leavitt, Benjamin H. Freidman, Harry Myers, Theodore Grossman, Dr. Samuel A. Rueben, Harry Ruben, and Meyer Goldfarb. A memorial service was then conducted by Rabbi Goldfarb, both in Hebrew and English for Isadore Landay, who was killed in action in France. A large photograph of the deceased member was unveiled and presented to his family.

Although primarily a reception in honor of its members who were in service, the banquet was given also as a testimonial of the esteem and love in which Mr. Schoenthal is held. He spoke of the early history of the Jewish community in Washington and of the birth and growth of the local lodge, and after his speech, the entire assembly arose to its feet as an expression of its regard for this venerable member.

The entertainment was in charge of a committee composed of Louis Ochs, toastmaster, J. Louis Siegel, Alex Cohen, Sam Berman, Harry Grossman and I. R. Newmark, assisted in the preparation of the banquet by Mrs. Louis Ochs, Mrs. A. H. Landay, Mrs. Rudolph Hanou, Mrs. L. S. Grossman, Mrs. I. R. Newmark, Mrs. Alex Cohen, Mrs. Harry Richman, Mrs. Max Finegold, and Mrs. Jos. Friedman.

Dallas, Tex.

Rabbi Martin Zielonka, of Temple Mt. Sinai, El Paso, addressed the Dallas Lodge, Sunday, Oct. 26. His theme was "In the Mirror of Time." The lecture was open to the public. Victor H. Hexter presided. An attractive musical program was given.

New Haven, Conn.

Congressman Isaac Siegel, member of the Immigration Committee of the House, chairman of the Congressional Overseas Committee and a member of the B'nai B'rith, addressed Horeb Lodge on Nov. 9. A business meeting was held beginning at 7:30, and at 8:00 was thrown open to the public. Congressman Siegel spoke on "What Ails America."

He was introduced by Attorney Joseph Koletsky, president of that lodge, as was Attorney Charles H. Shapiro, of Bridgeport, president of District No. 1, who delivered his usually entertaining "Pathe News" review of B'nai B'rith activities.

Congressman Siegel said in part:

"When war was declared on April 6, 1917, in this country there was but one purpose—to win the war as quickly as possible.

"Within a few months, however, manufacturers and employes realized potentially of their power and each one immediately endeavored to obtain a larger amount of money for what he was giving to the government.

"Extravagance ran riot, and peace found this country unprepared for it. We were not ready for war and were not ready for peace.

"Let me say to you tonight that the immigration committee is determined upon one thing—that in the United States there is not going to be room for a creature who is not willing to stand by America 24 hours a day. There has been too much talk about taking things easily and calmly.

"It is only during the past two years that the immigration bill really provided for illiteracy test and examination both physically and mentally. It gave the government all the power which it could ask for in order to effect the deportation of undesirables."

Special arrangements to enlarge the seating capacity of Hiram Hall have been made. The open meetings will continue for the benefit of the families of members and their friends. Among the speakers who have been invited to discuss important topics of the day were A. B. Seelenfreund of Chicago, Grand Secretary of the Order, who just returned from a tour through Europe, President Arthur Twining Hadley of Yale, ex-Ambassador Henry Morgenthau, Professor Albert G. Keller, head of the social science department of Yale; Dr. Stephen J. Maller, president of the Connecticut Public Health Association; Leonard J. Obermeier, former deputy attorney general of New York; Past President Joshua Kantrowitz, executive member; Hon. Charles Hartman and President of the District Charles H. Shapiro of Bridgeport.

A membership campaign is expected to swell the rolls of Horeb Lodge from nine hundred to considerably more than one thousand before the end of the winter.

Worcester, Mass.

On Oct. 22, Worcester Lodge No. 600 tendered a banquet and reception at the Hotel Bancroft to members who formerly had been in national service. Forty-four men went away to war, twenty-two per cent of the Lodge's entire roll. All save one, Brother Wolfe, who died at Camp Devens, returned in safety. The toastmaster was Brother Samuel J. Beeber, the Lodge's Vice President.

Rabbi Jesse Beinenfeld said grace. The speakers were: Charles M. Shapiro, President of District No. 1; Judge Jacob Asher, President of Worcester Lodge No. 600; Brother Joseph Ullman of New Haven, Member of the General Committee of District No. 1, and Brother Archibald M. Hillman of Worcester, also a Member of the General Committee.

A gold medallion in the form of a watch fob was presented to each former service man by Brother Deputy David Goldstein. Dancing followed.

The committee consisted of Samuel J. Beeber, Rabbi Jesse Beinenfeld, A. M. Hillman, Samuel Sedee, Dr. E. H. Pofcher, David Goldstein, Maxwell Sandberg, Harry Goodman and D. B. Isenberg.

St. Louis, Mo.

The meeting of the General committee in St. Louis on Oct. 19 proved a most interesting event.

Dr. Leon Harrison of Temple Israel delivered a special B'nai B'rith lecture, which the committee attended. The Lodge gathered in the evening at one of the local clubs and enjoyed an address by Brother Sidney Kusworm, district president. Other members of the committee made short talks. Brother Kusworm's clear explanation of the work which is being accomplished by the Order and the work in contemplation was universally praised.

A number of vital changes are being discussed in Missouri Lodge No. 22 and a newly appointed Reconstruction Committee will bring in a proposition for the consideration of the members at the next meeting. Election of officers will also take place as well as the election of delegates in the next Grand Lodge Convention.

Boston, Mass.

Members of Amos Lodge enjoyed a smoker the evening of Nov. 3, at the Hotel Bellevue. Ways and means of stimulating a greater interest among the members were discussed. "Ladies Night" was held Nov. 10, when Judge A. K. Cohen spoke of the work of the Anti-Defamation League. The Lodge has applied for the maintenance of a perpetual bed at the Beth Israel Hospital. The annual contribution to the Federation Government has been triple.

New York City

Jordan Lodge No. 15 initiated a large class of candidates at B'nai B'rith headquarters, 2307 Broadway, on Oct. 30. The address of the evening was delivered by Brother Samuel Dorf, Grandmaster of the Order B'rith Abraham. The list of candidates follows:

Dr. Henry Kendall, Joseph Herzberg, George Ehrlich, Leo Schwartz, Benjamin Jonas, Morris Perla, Carl Korwein, J. Gottfied, David Siegel, David Greenblatt, Ed. E. Greenberg, Dr. Herman Mendelson, Dr. Jack Manuel Mayer, Stephen Mayer, David Wilson, M. Silverman, Abraham M. Friptu, George M. Levinson, Stanley Silverman, Abraham Weiler, Nathan M. Gold, Leon L. Leipzig and Emanuel Solomon.

The Ladies' Auxiliary meets the first and third Tuesday afternoons of each month in the headquarters at 3 p. m. The meetings are informal and social and the members do sewing for poor children. A dance at the Hotel Gotham was given the evening of Thanksgiving day. On Saturday evening, Jan. 24, a beefsteak dinner will be partaken of at Reisenwebers.

The first of a series of meetings and entertainments was given by Henry Jones Lebanon Lodge at the District headquarters Sunday evening, Oct. 5. Congressman Isaac Siegel, vice-president of the Lodge, delivered a most interesting address on "What Ails America." Brother Charles H. Shapiro, president of the District, also addressed the members. A musical program was rendered and a class of candidates initiated.

Brooklyn Lodge No. 753 held an open meeting the evening of Nov. 6 at which Brother Shapiro spoke.

Denver, Colo.

Denver Lodge No. 171 observed B'nai B'rith Day on Nov. 9. A special ritual for the occasion prepared by Brother Rabbi Davis Lefkowitz of Dayton, O., at the direction of the Grand Lodge, was carried out by Brothers M. S. Anfenger, president; S. R. Zeetow, vice president; D. E. Harlem, orator, and Arthur E. Friedman, who delivered an address.

Brother J. J. Lieberman spoke on "The B'nai B'rith—the Unifying Force of Jewry." A fine musical program was given.

A committee has been appointed, of which Brother Anfenger is Chairman, and Brother Harlem, Treasurer, for the purpose of obtaining subscriptions to the B'nai B'rith Loan Fund now being raised by the Order for the rehabilitation of war-stricken members in Europe.

The Lodge is expected to raise at least $7,000 to this fund, and has started the subscription with $500 from the Lodge treasury.

A class of ten candidates has just been initiated.

Los Angeles, Cal.

The Ladies' Auxiliary, early in November, held a most successful dance, contributing out of the proceeds $100 to the fund for Jewish war sufferers, and $200 to the B'nai B'rith fund for the Relief of War-Stricken Members Abroad. About $25 remained to go into the treasury as a part of the emergency fund.

Buffalo, N. Y.

Montefiore Lodge No. 70 held a meeting Wednesday evening, Nov. 5, at which Brother Charles A. Shapiro, president of the District, and Brother Max Levy, the new secretary, spoke.

B'nai B'rith Medal to Simon Wolf

"For Humanitarian Work During Long and Usefu Life," Reads Tribute of Executive Committee, Acting in the Order's Behalf

THE Medal of Honor, which is conferred annually by the B'nai B'rith upon the individual who, in the judgment of the executive committee, has done most for the cause of Jewry during the twelve months, was awarded this year to Brother Simon Wolf, the Order's Washington representative.

Only four other men have been so honored by the organization. President Taft was presented with the first medal for signing the abrogation of the treaty between the United States and Russia. Dr. Adolph Stern, of Bucharest, Rumania, was the second medal recipient, having been selected for his great philanthropic and educational work. Henry Morganthau, ex-ambassador to Turkey, was the third, the medal having been conferred on him for his work in Turkey during the war; and President Wilson received the fourth medal last Thanksgiving Day for splendid services rendered the cause of humanity during the war period.

Mr. Wolf's Services.

"For humanitarian work during a long and useful life and appreciation from a grateful race for the books he had contributed to literature," was the wording of the motion presented at the meeting of the executive committee at Chicago which decided that Mr. Wolf be designated for the honor.

"The American Jew as Patriot, Soldier and Citizen" and "Presidents I Have Known" are the works of Mr. Wolf referred to by the committee, and with the present condition of war-torn Europe it might be relevant to quote President Taft's letter to Mr. Wolf, in acceptance of copies of the works.

Regarding the former book Mr. Taft wrote: "It is one thing to grant in a constitution, and in the forms of law, the fullest recognition of religious freedom, and it is another thing to achieve complete equality of opportunity in the political, social and business fields of activity unobstructed by traditional religious prejudice."

Work in Washington.

On receipt of a copy of "Presidents I Have Known," Mr. Taft wrote Mr. Wolf: "You have been on guard for your people in Washington through many administrations, and it must be a source of greatest satisfaction to you to realize how much you have accomplished in bringing to the attention of the presidents whom you have known instances of official discrimination based on religious bigotry and racial prejudice which the presidents thus informed have been able to condemn and remedy."—(Washington "Post.")

Birmingham, Ala.

The joint membership campaign of Birmingham Lodge No. 368, and Magic City Lodge No. 725, commenced Monday, Nov. 24. The committee in charge follows: Joseph Beitman, chairman; Frank Abelson, Irving M. Engel, A. H. Levy and Dave Rich, vice-chairman; Mosely Shugerman, M. Band, D. T. Feidelson, Morris Karpeles, Hugo Kuhn, M. Hirsh and Ike Abelson. Mervyn H. Sterne is chairman of the team captains.

Marked interest is being displayed this year in the work of the B'nai B'rith, due in part to the fact that the annual convention of the District Grand Lodge will be held in Birmingham next April, and also that the president of the Grand Lodge is A. Leo Oberdorfer, a prominent citizen of Birmingham. A. H. Levy is president of Magic City Lodge No. 725, and Morris Karpeles is president of Birmingham Lodge No. 368.

The objective of the drive is two hundred new members. An open meeting launched the Lodges' activities at Temple Emanu-El the evening of Nov. 24. An exceptionally entertaining program was provided.

Chicago, Ill.

Oriental-Hillel Lodge No. 72 tendered a welcome home dinner at the Covenant Club the evening of Nov. 24, to the Secretary of the Order, Brother A. B. Seelenfreund, who has just returned from a tour of Europe. In honor of the occasion, a class of forty candidates was initiated.

The President of the Lodge, Dr. Joseph G. Wiedder, acted as toastmaster and introduced the President of the District, Dr. Harry A. Kraus, who presented the compliments of the Lodge to Brother Seelenfreund. At the conclusion of the initiation and dinner the members were addressed by Rabbi Samuel S. Cohon, of Temple Mizpah, on the "Purposes and Tenets of the Order."

The Honorable Harry M. Fisher, associate judge of the Municipal Court, appealed to the members to again lend their financial and moral support to the lightening of the burdens of their coreligionists in Europe. Brother Seelenfreund addressed the meeting concerning his trip.

Columbus, O.

More than one hundred Jewish young men who were in service during the war were banqueted by Zion Lodge No. 62.

Three hundred, among them a number of women, attended. Talks were given by Sidney Kusworm, Dayton, District President; Rabbi Joseph S. Kornfeld, Joseph Schonthal and Mrs. Simon Bornheim, representing the Ladies' Welfare Board of the B'nai B'rith. The Jewish Welfare Board also was represented.

E. J. Schanfarber acted as toastmaster. Musical selections were given by Meyer Siegel, Miss Lillian Bornstein and Miss Reba Goldberg. Miss Ruth Frank recited. Members of the committee in charge were Frank Hoffman, chairman; Simon Weinfeld, Dr. J. S. Kornfeld, Arthur Kohn, Mark Keinkopf and Jack Lazarus. A number of war veterans signified their intention of joining the B'nai B'rith.

Zanesville, O.

At the celebration of B'nai B'rith Day conducted by Gihon Lodge, the Columbus degree team consisting of Edward Schanfarber, president; Isaac Myers, vice-president; Joseph Kornfeld, monitor, and I. B. Jashewosky, assistant monitor, initiated a class of twenty-one candidates, from Cambridge, Lancaster, Woodsfield and Zanesville.

The B'nai B'rith Day address was made by Dr. Joseph Kornfeld of Columbus, O. The other speakers were Edward Schanfarber, Jack Myers, Leon Goodman and I. B. Jashewosky of Columbus; Joseph Baron of Cincinnati; M. Greenwald of Cambridge and Rabbi A. Ruthberg of this city.

The candidates were: Morris Zwelling, Carl Becker, Morris Pollock, Henry Pollock, Jake Lavfer, Sam Goldstein, Abraham Ruthberg, Joseph L. Baron and Mark Berman of Zanesville; Harris Melsher, Isaac Dorz, Sam Schwartz, Harry Franklin, Mike Schahet, Ben Lipscher, G. L. Rosenberg, F. Nesselson and A. Schultz of Cambridge; Louis Werlinsky, Frank Kline and Morris Molar of Lancaster.

A luncheon was served by Mrs. Louis Weber and Mrs. Morris Resler, assisted by Miss Erma Weber and Miss Rose Weinberg.

Minneapolis

About one hundred and fifty members of the B'nai B'rith Lodge attended the regular meeting on Tuesday, Oct. 26. The attendance was one of the largest of the year. A class was initiated by the degree team of past Presidents. After the meeting a buffet luncheon was served.

President A. H. Karatz appointed a standing B'nai B'rith committee to act in advisory capacity for the Young Men's Hebrew Association. A committee for the purpose of making a survey on the feasibility of a B'nai B'rith or community building was also named. A report was made by the committee on Y. M. H. A. matters by Messrs. Arthur Harris, D. C. Jeffrey and Mr. Karatz.

A report by the Committee on Americanization work was enthusiastically received and discussed. The report on publicity work was rendered by Sam Margulies and a committee was appointed to give a theatrical entertainment for the public under the auspices of the B'nai B'rith.

Portland, Ore.

Portland Lodge No. 65 held a dancing party at their Lodge hall the evening of Oct. 28. The entertainment, which proved highly enjoyable, was the first of a number which has been arranged for the winter.

The committee in charge was Dr. N. S. Reingold, chairman; Herman Politz, Jesse Rich, Bud Simmons, M. V. Keller, Abe Weinstein, George Wolfe, Martha Leavitt, Joan Rosendale, Ruth Brunn, Rosika Reingold, Lena Nemerovsky and May Kastlin.

Forty candidates were initiated at the November meeting. The degree team conducted the work with fervor and dignity and was heartily commended. The Lodge meetings have been so well attended that the former spacious room seems to have shrunk and the question of larger quarters is coming to the fore.

First nomination of officers resulted as follows: President, Sig Lipman; vice-president, Alec Weinstein; assistant monitor, S. J. Bischoff; secretary, E. N. Weinbaum; financial secretary, D. Germanus; treasurer, Alec Miller; warden, Dr. S. C. Kohs; outside guard, A. Arbitman, N. Mozorowski; trustees, Ben Selling, A. Boskowitz, J. Lauterstein, S. W. Horrman, A. Rosenstein.

Augusta, Ga.

Sol Herzog, President of District Grand Lodge No. 5, paid an official visit to Augusta Lodge on Sunday evening, Nov. 9. The meeting, which was opened to the public, was held at the Masonic Temple and largely attended by both men and women. John J. Cohen, former President of the District, presided and after his address of welcome, President Herzog spoke interestingly on "The Past, Present and Future of the Order." Short talks by President Shaul of the local Lodge, David Nachman, Isaac Cohen, Rabbi Slusky, Henry Cohen, Mr. Blum, and Rabbi Sarahcon, concluded a very enjoyable meeting.

Jewish Solidarity

One of the leaders in Portland Jewry, who for thirty-five years has held a place of honor in the Pacific Northwest as a student and orator of attainments, wrote to a relative, a member of the executive committee, during a leisure moment with the seeming intention of imparting a bit of lodge gossip.

A third party was given the privilege of reading the letter, and decided it must, in the interest of Judaism and the Order, be rescued from the oblivion to which the recipient carelessly, yet naturally, had consigned it.

The letter points to a comforting sign, which some may even detect in the Heavens above, namely, that the Jew has no reason to despair of the future, and that Sargent's picture in the Boston Public Library, though a masterpiece from the standpoint of art and art's tradition, is, nevertheless, as a "Symbol" a challenge to history and a wretched piece of prevarication; for the Synagog still lives and still influences the lives of millions.

Incidentally, it may be an object lesson for some of the older communities in the East of the value of zealous and energetic leadership. The Jew's heart is generally in the right spot, all it needs is an occasional Shofar blast.

The letter follows:

"I have tried to be of what service I could to my people, confining my efforts to the limits where I felt I might find results. I cannot expect many more years. I do feel, however, that I have contributed to the unity of our people here and I realize more and more the necessity of solidarity everywhere, if we are to meet with any hope of equality—the events which seem forecast. The consolidation of our lodges here has exceded in result my fondest expectations, though for a number of years I was its sole advocate. In place of a few officers going perfunctorily through forms, we have a crowded lodge room and the members, especially the young ones, anxious for the meeting nights to come.

"Far happier than this is the fact that the feeling of united purpose and common obligation, which is the keynote of every meeting, is growing and extending to home, business and Synagog. We are really becoming, in Portland, one poeple; it is a wonderful safeguard from many angles. Jonah's personality has a great deal to do with it, Alex gives it time and energy. There are a number of the young foreign-born, as well as home-born, who are developing the right spirit, and I know we are on the way to an ideal Jewish community, that is, insofar as the acknowledgment of Jewish mutuality is concerned.

"We are not interfering at all with differences in detail; we acknowledge their existence and respect them, but we are getting so that we can merge them in the greater common cause."

Evansville, Ind.

Lodge No. 24 celebrated B'nai B'rith Day on Nov. 30, in the new hall next door to the Adath Israel Synagogue. A class of six was initiated, with Silas Iehenhauser, a past president, in the chair. The speaker of the day was Judge Samuel Rosenfeld of St. Louis, second vice president of District No. 2, who delivered a powerful address on "Aims and Achievements of the B'nai B'rith." Short talks were made by three veterans of the World War, members of the lodge, Chaplain Lee J. Levinger, First Lieut. Morris Levi, and Major William Ehrich. The evening was ended with a buffet lunch.

New Ideas in Lodge Activities

New Britain, Conn.

Jehuda Halevi Lodge No. 710 tendered its ex-service men a splendid reception and welcome home banquet the evening of Nov. 23 in Turner Hall.

Prominent among the speakers was Benedict M. Holden of Hartford, who urged the people to stand back of the service men, as they stood in front of them during the war. ''Remember, nothing is too good for them,'' he remarked.

As the orchestra began the ''Star Spangled Banner'' the entire assembly arose and Attorneys William M. Greenstein and Albert A. Greenberg led the singing.

Seated at the guests' table were Toastmaster Morris D. Saxe and wife, Benedict M. Holden, Lieut. Colonel Lewis Landes, Lieut. M. Millman, Hon. Joseph H. Ullman, Attorney Charles H. Shapiro of Bridgeport, Hon. Henry Lasker, chairman of arrangements, Abraham Gorbach, Miss Gertrude Schectman, Morris Raphael and wife, William M. Greenstein and Miss Sadye Greenstein, Bernard F. Clark and wife, William C. Raphael and wife, Isadore M. Goldstein and wife, Abraham Shurburg and wife, and Attorney Albert A. Greenberg.

Toastmaster Saxe in his opening remarks thanked the committee of arrangements for its untiring efforts in arranging this splendid affair. He introduced Chairman Gorbach of the committee on arrangement, who asked those present to rise in memory of the lodge's two members who died in the service, Harry Berson and Harry Miller.

Charles A. Shapiro, of Bridgeport, president of the district, praised the men who went forth to offer their lives, that others might live. The B'nai B'rith Order, he said, furnished the material which gave the impetus to Jewish Welfare work.

William Greenstein, vice president of the local lodge, read a letter from Capt. T. E. Roderick, in whose company Sergeant Berson served, concerning the latter's heroism. The captain praised the local man for his exceptional bravery, and said he was the coolest and one of the bravest men in the company.

Hon. Joseph H. Ullman, of New Haven, in his remarks said it was a privilege to be present at so enthusiastic a gathering. Praising the service men he said that the boys who went forth to battle with the enemy had now another battle.

''We all should be 100 per cent Jews and 100 per cent Americans, and I know that you will be good, loyal patriots. Let me tell you, my friends, that by being good, loyal and patriotic Americans, you will all be good Jews.''

Lewis Landes, of New York, who rose from captain to lieutenant-colonel during the war, praised the New Britain lodge for its excellent showing in giving twenty per cent of its membership to the service.

A Tribute

As a token of love and esteem for Mr. and Mrs. Simon Peiser, the Alumni of the Jewish Orphan Asylum at Cleveland will gather at an informal farewell banquet, to be given in their honor, in the dining room of the Home, Sunday evening, Dec. 21.

This mark of appreciation of Mr. and Mrs. Peiser stands in recognition of their many years of devotion to their former boys and girls.

The Committee on Arrangements is striving to make this the most enjoyable affair the Alumni has ever held, and assures an excellent menu and a delightful program. Cards will be sent promptly on receipt of reservation request.

Political Forum is Held in Cleveland, While Several Local Organizations Have Foreign Language Classes and Other Novelties

IN order to givo all the members of the B'nai B'rith an opportunity to hear candidates for Mayor discuss their platforms, the Entertainment Committee of Cleveland Lodge arranged a Mayorality Rally Night on Oct. 28. Four candidates discussed political and economical questions. Several musical numbers were played.

A series of dances arranged by a committee of which Morton Zaller is the head, opened with a ''pun-kin'' fete the evening of Oct. 22. The B'nai B'rith Dramatic Circle held its first meeting Sunday afternoon, Oct. 19. The plans for the year were discussed and a committee consisting of Florence Rosenthal, Harry Mereino and Mort D. Kaufman was appointed to arrange the program for the year.

A novel entertainment was provided by the Entertainment Committee for election night, Nov. 4. A cabaret announcement of the returns and dancing were features.

A French class is being conducted with marked success under the leadership of A. C. Deutsch.

One of the most impressive initiations ever conducted at the B'nai B'rith was held Nov. 13 in the beautiful newly decorated ballroom.

Nearly two hundred candidates were admitted to the Order. It was by far the largest class that was ever admitted at one time and second only to the memorable affair at the Hotel Statler five years ago.

While the initiation was going on the wives and friends of the candidates were entertained by a moving picture show in the meeting room downstairs.

The members and their friends were addressed by Lucius Solomon of San Francisco, vice-president of the Order. He was followed by Sidney Kusworm, president of District No. 2.

The initiation team consisted of Eugene Wolf, president of the Lodge; Phil Haber, Max Meisel, Alfred Benesch, Max Ozersky and Lewis Drucker.

The opening discussion of the B'nai B'rith civic forum was led by C. A. Dykstra, secretary of the Civic League, of Cleveland, the evening of Dec. 4. The forums will be held regularly for the benefit of B'nai B'rith members and their friends.

Pittsburgh, Pa.

The membership committee of Saar Sholem Lodge No. 154 held an initiation and banquet on B'nai B'rith Day, Nov. 30, at the William Penn Hotel. The affair was a testimonial to the committee's conscientious work. A number of novel entertainment features were introduced.

Saar Sholem Lodge is in a most prosperous condition, with a membership of 248, 70 candidates on the waiting list and more in prospect. The class initiated numbered 110, and with these new members, Saar Sholem Lodge is reaching its goal, the first in the District.

The initiation was followed by a dinner, at which addresses were made by Rev. Dr. Samuel H. Goldenson, Marcus Feuchtwanger, David Bortin and Leonard S. Levin.

Following the dinner the members stood in silence for one minute in memory of Councilman Enoch Rauh, whose funeral was held yesterday.

Small buttons of honor were given to those present last night who have been members of the organization more than 38 years. The members were: Louis Goldsmit, Mr. Feuchtwanger, L. Strassberger, Joseph Bennett, Louis Salzbacher, Sol Bachman and Joseph Buka. O. H. Rosenbaum was one of those in charge of the affair.

Mr. Feuchtwanger, district president, and David Bortin, first vice president of Philadelphia, officiated.

A. Goldbloom was chairman of the membership committee, which also comprised Joseph Goodman, secretary; B. Horvitz, Dr. J. N. Katz, H. Goldbloom, Sol Weinthal, Joseph Buka and A. H. Kaufman.

After the membership drive which resulted in the initiation of forty new members, Jericho Lodge celebrated the achievement by honoring Brother Feuchtwanger at a banquet in the Schenley Hotel. One hundred and fifty members attended, a considerable proportion as representatives of other Lodges.

Brother A. L. Solomon recited the initiatory sermon of the Order, after which Brother Feuchtwanger delivered an address emphasizing the necessity of close co-operation by all members and the personal dedication of every member to service.

Isaac W. Frank welcomed home the members of the Lodge who had been in national service. Judge Cohen spoke on ''The New Spirit or the B'nai B'rith.'' Morris Schaffner, Second Vice President of District Grand Lodge No. 3, and Chairman of the Board of Governors of the Erie Home for Friendless Children, commented on the value of the Orphanage to the District. Louis I. Aaron traced the activity of the B'nai B'rith as far back as 1864 and showed how the community had developed since those early days.

Rabbi Samuel Goldenson delivered a talk on the letters, ''I. O. B. B.'' Encomiums were generously given Brother Feuchtwanger, whose administration has been one of the best in the history of the order.

Among the members of Jericho Lodge who deserve praise for the success of the affair are: David Goldman, Harold Solomon, Isidor Jacobs, Harry Wolf, Leo Lehman and Richard S. Rauh.

Terre Haute, Ind.

Gan Eden Lodge, No. 110, was visited Sunday Nov. 2, by Brother Sidney Kusworm of Dayton, O., president of District No. 2. In the afternoon a large class was initiated most impressively by the initiatory team, consisting of Brothers Brown, Berkowitz, Goldstine, Wolff, Blumberg and Strouse. After the initiation a brief history of our Lodge was given by Brother Ben Blumberg. He pointed out that Gan Eden Lodge has in its membership one who has been a member of the I.O.B.B. longer than any other Ben Brith in District No. 2. This member is Brother Jonas Strouse, who joined in 1865 in Pittsburgh, Pa. All present rose as a mark or respect to this beloved and active member of the Order.

President Kusworm then gave an inspiring talk to the members, impressing on them the value and need of B'nai B'rith activity during these strenuous times and cited instances of the good work the Order has done in the past. Brother Biccard of Indianapolis also attended as a guest and delivered a short address.

A meeting open to the public was held in the evening in the Temple Auditorium, which was addressed by President Kusworm. A large audience came to hear him explain the work of the B'nai B'rith, particularly the work of the Anti-Defamation League. After the address refreshments were served and songs were beautifully sung by Mesdames Silverstein, Feibelman and Shatsky. Miss Jennie Brown accompanied on the piano.

Yonkers, N. Y.

An exceptionally enjoyable entertainment was given at the Home for Aged and Infirm on Thanksgiving Day. The program follows:

Introductory remarks, Gov. Edward Sander, chairman, pro tem.; opening prayer, Gov. M. Minzesheimer, dean of board of governors; piano solo, Master Samuel Sander; contralto solo, Mrs. S. M. Platt; address, Brother Joseph Rosenzweig, past president District No. 1; piano solo, Professor John Enright; comic songs, Mrs. Joe Curran; solo, Mr. William P. O'Mara; ''A Little Magic,'' J. J. Crimmins; solo, Miss Madeline Glynn; songs and stories, W. C. Egan; solo, Mr. William McDonald; characer songs, Gill Cashin; solo, Mr. William P. O'Mara; songs, Mrs. Joe Birdsall; ''Star Spangled Banner.''

San Francisco, Cal.

Responding to the call of Grand President Milton Meyer of District No. 4, several score leaders of the B'nai B'rith Lodges met in B'nai B'rith hall, San Franscisco, to discuss ways and means of co-operating with the executive committee of the Constitution Grand Lodge in its plan to raise a large fund in the United States to lend without interest to needy brethren in the war-torn countries of Europe.

Grand President Meyer presided and after explaining the plan in detail, threw the meeting open to a general discussion of ways and means.

All present showed a keen interest in the plan and manifested a desire to co-operate to the fullest extent.

Committees have been appointed in each Lodge to call upon the membership and to secure subscriptions.

The committee of fifty arranged a grand ball at Scottish Rite Hall on Saturday evening, Dec. 6. The entire proceeds will be turned over to the gymnasium committee to be used in refitting the splendid gymnasium in the B'nai B'rith Building, 149 Eddy Street.

The committee of fifty is receiving enthusiastic support from the eight San Francisco Lodges and the two ladies auxiliaries.

Committee in charge of the ball consisted of Henry Mauser, chairman; Harry K. Wolff, P. G. P.; Richard Gutstadt, P. G. P.; Milton Meyer, G. P.; J. T. Pichner, Leo Harris, Maurice Raphael, M. C. Rubin, Eugene B. Block, L. Schneider, J. Friedman, J. Polin, Max Aftergut, H. Hotchner, M. S. Cohn, H. Levinson, H. Banks, H. A. Zekind, S. Hodes, L. Geballe, M. Kockman, S. Hymes, Leon Isaacs, R. Lowry, S. E. Welfield, Alvin Cerf and Pete Sommers.

Mobile, Ala.

The B'nai B'rith Hall of Beth Zur Lodge No. 84 held a capacity gathering the evening of Oct. 12, in honor of the ex-service men of the community. The Council of Jewish Women, Mrs. Albert D. Hanaw, president, was in charge of the exercises and the serving of refreshments.

The address of the evening was given by Captain Leon Schwarz, a former president of District No. 7, and who recently returned from overseas, after long service there. The Captain's address, in the main, was an eloquent tribute to the enlisted men of the American army. Of special interest to members of the Order was the recital by Brother Schwartz of his experience in having been in the B'nai B'rith lodge hall in Coblenz, Germany, while he was serving with the Army of Occupation. But he could not visit the brethren either in the lodge or out of it, not only because, as he said, he would have violated the non-fraternization military order, but as well a cardinal principle of the Order, which teaches absolute loyalty to one's own country.

Events of Month in Review

peasant revolt, predicted by the few independent and uncorrupted observers, is to be warded off by the cry: "Beware of the Jewish exploiter."

A government which wishes to be maintained has to have financial backing. The Polish press exultantly announces that it has received a loan of $25,000,000 from the United States. The minister announced this reassuring fact to the representatives of the press whom he invited to his office, excluding the Jewish papers with the evident purpose of showing that, even in matters of finance, the "Zydi" have no power. And in the same sense a member of the sejm made the declaration that the new law requiring the Jews to observe Sunday, which was voted by the sejm in clear violation of the spirit of Article 11 of the treaty recognizing Poland's independence and providing that "Jews shall not be compelled to perform any act which constitutes a violation of their Sabbath"—was their punishment for giving publicity to the pogroms.

The sejm is, however, not satisfied with violating the spirit of the law, but it disregards the letter just as well by an order requiring Jews, who sell coal and similar articles, to keep their stores open on the Sabbath. Another direct violation of the treaty obligations is the brutal order which requires that Jewish congregational and charitable offices must be closed on Sundays. Equally impudent is the violation of all stipulations of the treaty, protecting religious and racial minorities, in the order restricting the attendance of Jewish students at universities which is even worse than it was under the old Russian regime. The university of Wilna admitted only thirty Jewish applicants out of 600.

It is rather surprising under these circumstances to read in the Yiddish press of the appointment of a Simon Askenazi as professor at the University of Warsaw. The appointment is probably the transfer of the professor by the same name who was professor in Lemberg, appointed under the Austrian government in 1907, and whose father, Wolf Askenazi, a Hebrew writer, claimed descent of Rabbi Hoeschl of Lublin and of Zebi Ashkenazi, rabbi of Amsterdam and Lemberg (died 1718).

The influence of academic life on the nation requires still considerable improvement. A professor Czerbak delivered in Warsaw an address on ritual murder, illustrated with lantern slides, claiming the existence of a Jewish sect which practices such a rite—against which Sir Stuart Samuel sent a protest to the government. Yet the Polish press supports this agitation, and the fanatic clergy helps it from the pulpit, as we saw even in this country when a Polish priest in Pittsfield, Mass., had the impudence of backing such a charge (Springfield, Mass., "Republican," October 17).

A Gruesome Picture

No stronger proof of the terrible conditions in Poland could be drawn than the report of the Stanislawow (Galicia) section of children's relief in whose interest Mrs. Olka Halpern sends out an appeal. The city which, according to the latest census available, has 30,000 inhabitants, has to take care of 1,200 war orphans, 5,000 other orphans and abandoned children, whose parents became separated in the flight resulting from the various military operations, and of 3,500 children of the ages of 14 to 16, for whom neither school nor occupation can be found.

From Minsk comes the still more terrible story, a realization of the terrible prophecy of Deutoronomy (28:56), that parents throw their children away in the woods lest they should see them die of starvation.

The Storm Center

Making all possible allowances for exaggeration and partisanship, there can be no doubt that conditions in Ukraine are worse than anywhere else and that Denikin, the "loyal Russian," is the worst fiend among tho butchers which are devastating southwestern Russia. We have the testimony of the celebrated Russian author, Wladimir Korolenko, and of ex-President Alexander Kerensky, who can surely not be partial to the Bolshevist movement which dislodged him, and is hardly biased against Denikin, who is fighting—nominally at least—for Russia's territorial integrity.

Isaac Don Levine, writing for the Chicago "Daily News," reports that pogroms took place in 327 cities, and he estimates the number of victims as 70,000. The interpellations in the British House of Commons may be inspired by partisanship, angling for votes or desire for publicity, though the character of the men speaks against any such assumption, but the evasive replies of the government prove that the truth is unpleasant for the Allies.

The worst feature in all the terrible affliction is the constant change of government, which just at the time of this writing threatens the Jews of Kiew. A vivid example is the case of the much tried city of Zhitomir, as it appears from the reports, now fairly complete. The Bolshevists came into power January 6. The troops of the new government were commanded by a notorious drunkard and rowdy, named Palienka, who ordered Jews killed and arrested on the charge that they had shot at his soldiers. His power lasted only five days. On January 13 he left the city, and a regular Ukrainian government was established, with effects on the Jews still worse than those of its predecessors. This government lasted until March 13, when the Bolshevists returned, keeping fairly good order by swift punishment of the outlaws who had made life a hell for the Jews during the months preceding. They remained only two weeks in the possession of the city, and on March 27 the Ukrainians returned, and outdid themselves, establishing a record worthy of their great saint Bogdan Chmelnicki.

Bodies of slain Jews were strewn in the streets of the city as on a battlefield, and it was forbidden to bury them. Dogs and swine ate them, and the mob enjoyed the sight. The soldiers with their uniforms bespattered with the blood of their helpless victims walked about the streets like heroes returning from the battlefield. The same story, different only in detail, comes from Odessa, Yekaterinoslav, Nowigrad Wlinsk, Kiew, Fastov, where for a change the Jews were burned alive, and from numerous other places.

Causes and Remedies

The usual charge against the Jews is that they are the organizers of Bolshevism. The review of last month proved in the case of Minsk that, as far as the great majority of the Jews are concerned, this charge is not true, and that the Bolshevists condemn the Jewish laborers for aiding capitalistic bourgeoisie by their blind superstition.

W. T. Goode, who spent considerable time in Russia, reports in the Manchester ''Guardian'' that of the eighteen members of what we might call the cabinet there is only one Jew and among the 115 members of the supreme council only eight are Jews. These are fanatic internationalists, strongly opposing all constructive Jewish activity. The soviet commissioner of education, Lunacharsky, explained that teaching of Hebrew was prohibited on the advice of Jewish soviet members, and one of the latter, Diamandstein, is responsible for the suppression of Zionism, declaring that the Palestinian legionaries assisted the British imperialistic government in suppressing the Egyptian revolt.

The protest parades in New York, Chicago, Cleveland, St. Louis and other cities held November 24, made a profound impression on the spectators, but it remains to be seen whether they will result in a tangible political action on the part of the governments to bring relief to the masses of helpless victims in the Ukrainian territory. The same may be said of the kind words spoken by Cardinal Giustini, papal delegate to Palestine, who expressed in the name of Pope Benedict XV his sympathy with the sufferings of the Jews.

Nor is it certain whether the repeated interpellations in the British House of Commons, presented by Colonel Mallon and Major Ormsby-Gore, to which the ministers replied evasively will bring any relief. One is reminded of the pathetic description of the pre-Messianic times in the Talmud (Sotah, 49b) when the cost of living will be excessively high in spite of abundant crops, when morality will be despised, and truth will be exiled. There will be nothing to be looked for except the aid of our Father in Heaven.

Civilized Europe and Antisemitism

Philosopohy of history is vindicated. The soviet government of Hungary was succeeded by clerical reaction just as Napoleon's imperialism with the concordat of 1801 followed the radicalism of the Jacobins with their reign of terror of 1793. Premier Friedrich declared that the freedom of religion and the equality of all citizens will not be interfered with, but at the same time, while even protesting against the demand of the Allies to stipulate this in the peace treaty as unnecessary, Christian students of Budapest University demand the exclusion of Jews.

The minister of education assigned to the school the task of Christian education, and the premier upon the demand of a Christian Women's Association ordered a crucifix to be placed on the roof of the parliament building to emphasize the Christian character of the Hungarian, gaining by this move the hearty applause of the ''Sankt Josephsblatt,'' the organ of the Benedictine monks of St. Benedict, Oregon, which (November 26) recommends this action for imitation ''hier im gelobten Lande der Soehne Israels.''

The Budapest congregation met the reactionaries half way by a bull of excommunication against all Bolshevists, although the antisemitic bishop of Stuhlweissenburg, Ottokar Prochaska, does not find it necessary to act similarly in the cases of the Eszterhazys, Zichys, Szaparys, Karolyis and other aristocratic members of the soviet government among whom Karolyi, who turned the government over to the communists, occupies the first rank. Even the neo-Christian, Baron de Tornya-Schossberger, is still permitted to hear mass. The same scare produced the same results in Austria, where the chief rabbi of Vienna—the Yiddish press of this country generously makes him ''Rav hakolel of Austria''—excommunicated the Jewish profiteers, as Chief Rabbi Ezekiel Landau of Prague, and Landrabbiner Moses Lwow of Moravia, did in regard to the Jewish traitors upon the order of the ''hoechstselige'' Maria Theresa in 1756. Who will deny progress?

''Lest I Be Poor and Steal''

Vienna has a right to repeat the prayer of King Solomon (Prov. 30: 9). The city is one large poor house. No wonder that the population is irritated against the representatives of the Joint Distribution Committee, charging them with extravagance in the cost of administration, while playing favorites and general mismanagement. No one can know from this distance whether there is not some truth in the charges, but it is admitted by the administration that the distribution of relief in money had to be restricted, that children have to stand in a long line, waiting for a small quantity of food which does not include meat and have to pay 30 heller—to us a fraction of a cent, but to them some money—for some cereals and a slice of bread.

One cannot wonder that the Christian Socialists, hoping to regain their lost power, seize upon the opportunity of impressing the starving population with the idea that the Jews are responsible for it, and presenting the case of the Galician Jewish refugees, of whom there are only 26,000 in the millions, according to their own calculation, as the chief trouble. Kunschak, a leader of this party, advocates a special register for all Austrian Jews, and is to some extent assisted by Robert Stricker, the only professing Jew of the Nationalversammlung, who demanded recognition of the Jews as a separate nationality.

Pograms have not occurred so far, nor have they occurred in Germany, where the reactionaries sent a committee to the Kaiser, promising to bring him back to his throne, if he would give assurance that he will repeal the constitutional equality of the Jews. It is somewhat reassuring that, as a leading antisemitic paper reports, William II could not be allured to enter into such a compact, which might indicate either that he considers the re-establishment of the monarchy impossible, or that he would not want it at this price.

Still more important is the condemnation of antisemitism by Mathias Erzberger, the most prominent leader of the clerical party, but, on the other hand, the large number of desertions from the Jewish fold, though some of them are no doubt dictated by the opposition to all religion, indicates that many Jews consider it safer to ''resign from the Semitic race,'' as an antisemitic paper put it. The discouraging signs in English public life have been mentioned before, and—it may be mentioned in this connection—Roumania still feels sufficiently strong to refuse to accept the dictation of the Allies to guarantee minority rights.

Obituary

The Yiddish press reported the death of the most prominent Hebrew poet, Hayyim Nahman Bialyk, whose elegy on the massacre of Kishineff placed him in the front rank of the Hebrew poets of all times. The report is as yet unconfirmed.

American Jewish scholarship sustained a severe loss in the death of Arnold B. Ehrlich (November 5), who ranked high in Biblical criticism. German-Jewish scholarship lost Rabbi Jacob Guttmann of Breslau, September 29, whose profound scholarly works on medieval Jewish philosophy continued the work of his countryman, Solomon Munk (1802-1867), the first discoverer of the great debt which medieval Christian philosophy owed to the Jews, and of his predecessor in office, Manuel Joel (1826-1890).

The participation of the Jews in secular science is illustrated by the deaths of the political economist, Gustav Cohn, for years professor in Goettingen, and of Leo Arons (November 10) of Berlin, a famous physicist and inventor, removed from office as privatdozent in 1899 for his socialistic tendencies, and offered reinstatement at the outbreak of the war when his majesty had pompously declared he knew no parties but only Germans. Arons declined, leaving at his death at the age of 52 a name far more illustrious than that of many a professor ordinarious with the title of privy councillor. Italy lost the Senator Lazzaro Frizzi (September 3), a member of the family made famous by the medical and Talmudic author, Benedetto (Ben Zion) Frizzi (1762-1842).

Miscellaneous Notes

The new order of things is perhaps responsible for the retirement from public life of two prominent Jews in Baden. David Mayer, Oberregierungsrat (somewhat alike to assistant secretary of the interior), retired, receiving an expression of thanks from the present government for his long and eminent services. The jurist, Heinrich Rosin, professor of commercial law in the University of Freiburg i. B., a nephew of David Rosin (1823-1894), professor at the Breslau Seminary, also retired. Both men, especially the former, were active in the service of the Jewish community. The political changes have affected, and will in future still more affect, especially in the new Polish provinces, the conditions of the Jewish ministry.

The rabbinical seminary of Vienna, just twenty-five years old, is terribly struck by the loss of former Austrian territories. The government's subsidy, as well as the subsidies paid by the large congregation of Cecho-Slovakia and Galicia, are withdrawn, the value of the money has fallen to a point where it is worthless, and Professor Krauss, one of the greatest Jewish scholars living, declares publicly that he and his colleagues are actually starving.

The chief rabbi of Strasburg, a German, had to resign, and in his place Isaac Schwartz, formerly grandrabbin of Bordeaux, was elected.

The opening of a Jewish hospital in London (October 26) which the hightoned Jewry opposed bitterly for years, as a sign of aloofness, shows the progress of democratic ideas in our communal life.

The prominence gained by George Mandel, Clemenceau's private secretary, who was returned to parliament in spite of strong socialistic opposition, and who is mentioned as a member of the next ministry, is an event of more than usual significance.

moved by righteousness in social relations? Haase might have become rich along an easy path. Instead he chose to remain comparatively poor along a difficult path, voicing the injustice of the people. Surely the same spirit moved Marx and Lassalle, and is there not something noble in this? Something of the attitude of the ancient Hebrew prophets who to their own hurt denounced wrong wherever they met with it?

But Jews are also found in high places. One of the best known figures at the Peace Conference was a Jew—Professor Manteux, who acted as official interpreter. He was present at all the important gatherings; State secrets of the utmost significance were entrusted to his keeping. Throughout his bearing, his manner, above all his character, won universal respect.

Again, Clemenceau, the mover of the destiny of France, has a Jew for private secretary—M. Mandel, who has just been elected to the French Chamber. A Jew has likewise come to the fore in the person of Prof. Einstein, to whose theories scientists the world over are paying great tribute. It is as well to recall these instances when in some quarters it is preached incessantly that Jews are Bolsheviks. Some Jews doubtless are; but what of that? Have not Jews as much as non-Jews the right to hold and to live up to any political opinions they choose? The preachers of evil find it convenient to forget the Jews who are doing public work in the world, which has nothing whatever to do with Bolshevism. It makes one think that their campaign is just one of senseless hate, unworthy of the humanity which is common to all of us.

Hospital Is Opened.

At last the London Jewish Hospital has been opened. It was a great day for those who had labored manfully during the past years, unmindful of opposition, unperturbed by difficulties. The building is not yet completed, but it will not be long delayed. Money is pouring in slowly, and both Lord Rothschild and the Chief Rabbi, who were the leading spirits at the opening ceremony, gave the movement their blessing. The Hospital is already doing excellent work; there is no need to expatiate on its possibilities for readers who know a good deal about Jewish Hospitals and who can boast of having collectively founded many Houses of Healing.

This letter cannot be concluded without a reference to the visit of Brother Seelenfreund to the First Lodge of England. Brother Seelenfreund's address to the brethren will be long remembered; he fired them with his own wonderful, unquenchable enthusiasm. Apart from the public meeting, some of the leading members of the Lodge had an opportunity of having private conferences with Brother Seelenfreund, and we need hardly tell our brethren in America that these will not be without result. They know Brother Seelenfreund's marvelous personality; he has a way which wins confidence and assures success. One of the most welcome things he told us was that he and our respected President Kraus intend coming to London again this autumn. We shall be most happy to see them, and we hope they will find the Lodge in London in as flourishing a condition as they would wish to see. We for our part will do all that is possible.

News from London

By Our Correspondent, DR. M. EPSTEIN

LONDON

Nov. 17, 1919.

ANGLO-JEWRY is showing signs of being very much alive. In all lands Jews have two problems to solve—to organize their internal affairs, and to make up their minds about the world-position of Jewry. We in England are taking active steps in both directions. In regard to the first, the great Communal Scheme has met with a welcome which promises success. Already an executive committee has been formed, and a number of sub-committees appointed to deal with special questions, such as the status of the Ministry, the position of Jews' College, the reorganization of religious education, and, of course, publicity.

Publicity is necessary in order to collect the sum which has been decided upon, namely, one million pounds sterling. Religious education needs organizing very much. At present it is in a state of chaos. There are Synagogue Religious Classes, corresponding roughly to the Sunday Schools in America, which teach a modicum, but only a modicum, of what is required. Judged by their fruits (a fair test), these classes cannot be said to accomplish very much.

Then there are Talmud Torahs for the education of the poorer children of the community, mostly the children of immigrant Jews. In their way, these schools do good work, but it is vitiated by unscientific methods, lack of properly qualified teachers, and unsuitable premises. Side by side with the Talmud Torahs there are in London a goodly number of so-called "religious education classes" provided by the Jewish Religious Education Board. Here again imperfections are patent, but what else can be expected when money is scarce?

It is always the same cry—money. This, however, can be provided. What is more difficult to overcome is the enthralling slavery of vested interests, for the most part those which give "honor," or better, "koved," to certain old gentlemen. The dead hand of the past weighs upon our attempts to provide religious education, and the old systems need to be swept completely away. It is to be sincerely hoped that the Communal Scheme will introduce a new spirit into religious education—large, modern and Jewish.

Opportunity for Jews' College.

From the point of view of reform, perhaps Jews' College shows up best. Jews' College desires to be remodeled; the Council and the Staff will welcome a change for the better. The original idea was to remove the College to either Oxford or Cambridge. But this does not find favor generally. A good proposal was made by Dr. Israel Abrahams at the first meeting of the Council of the Communal Scheme. He suggested that the College should remain in London, but should be extended into being a Great Academy of Jewish learning, to provide instruction in the higher branches of Jewish history, Jewish literature and Jewish practice and tradition to all who might come within its walls, regardless of the fact as to what they will do with their knowledge.

If the status of the Ministry in England is so improved as to attract the best brains there will be no need to worry about the personnel of the Ministry, or, to use the right word, the Rabbinate. Rabbis we need, we have not anything like the requisite number in this country. A lack of means is responsible for much. If the one million pounds is forthcoming, and permanent endowments established for the three branches of the Scheme, many reforms will be possible. The question is, will the money be forthcoming?

It seems absurd to doubt the possibility. The sum required would be a Kerem Kayemeth, a permanent investment, the benefits of which would continue to flow for the advantage of generations yet to come. Five years have been assigned for the collection of the amount, and serious efforts will be made to stir up enthusiasm in all the centers in England, and in the Dominions beyond the seas, where Jews reside. Speakers will go forth, and we are glad to say that the First lodge of England was first in the field with a meeting on the subject, addressed by Mr. Robert Waley Cohen, one of the Fathers of the Scheme.

Earl Curzon's Assurance.

So much for the Communal Scheme. It is generating interest, and enthusiasm will grow. On the question of Palestine we had in London and many of the country towns large demonstrations to celebrate the second anniversary of the Declaration issued by Mr. Balfour on Nov. 2, 1917, on behalf of the British Government, which stated that the Government favored the establishment of a Jewish National Home in Palestine. Mr. Balfour was recently succeeded as Secretary for Foreign Affairs by Earl Curzon; and the latter sent a letter to Mr. N. Sokolow, under date of Nov. 1, 1919, in these terms:

"Dear Sir—I have pleasure in assuring you—if such assurance is required, which I can hardly believe to be the case—that there has been no change in the policy of the Government with regard to the establishment of a Jewish National Home in Palestine."

As on the previous occasion when a celebration was organized, the meeting was held at the London Opera House, which was again packed to overflowing. Mr. Herbert Samuel gave the speech of the afternoon. With the eye of a prophet and poet he depicted the future of Palestine.

"I look forward," said Mr. Samuel, "and I see the Jewish cultivator going out in the morning to cultivate his fields, and returning at night happy in the work he had done; I see the water-power of the highlands serving to distribute electric power to hundreds of industrial undertakings, on which would be built up an export trade; I see industrial districts well planned with their parks and gardens in the bright atmosphere of the Mediterranean climate, undefiled by smoke.

"I see Jerusalem more than ever a spacious and beautiful city. I see a healthy population with the natural intelligence of the Jewish people developed by a system of education of which the summit was the university of Mount Scopus, once more able to breed sages and philosophers, scholars and musicians, scientists and dramatists. This was something well worth working for; with time, effort and will it would be achieved."

A Study in Contrasts.

This vision stands in marked contrast to the drabness of current controversy which expends energy on the exact meaning of Jewish National Home. Some want a State at once; they desire to see Palestine, as they put it, as Jewish as England is English. This sounds well, but its precise meaning is dubious. Possibly the Zionist leaders are wiser in accepting facts as they are, and making the most of opportunities offered at present. Palestine may one day become a State; it depends on what the Jews will make of it.

But what does all this matter? The British Government has pledged its word; the pledge has been supported by all the Allied Powers. Britain will be the mandatory for Palestine; the inhabitants of the country will therefore be under British rule, than which no one could wish for a better. As for the rest, the future will depend on what the inhabitants of Palestine make of their opportunities.

One thing of special interest Mr. Nahum Sokolow enunciated at the Opera House demonstration. He said that in his opinion the Jewish National Home will need to be represented in the League of Nations in order to watch over and protect the interests of Jews in all parts of the world. It should only be added that the enthusiasm which marked the demonstration in London also marked the gatherings in the provinces—at Manchester, Cardiff, Grimsby, Hull and elsewhere.

Survey of Religious Life.

The provincial cities in Anglo-Jewry are quite generally showing that there is life within them. Recently, for instance, the Birmingham congregation met in solemn conclave to sit in judgment on its religious health. The Minister of the congregation, the Rev. A. Cohen, one of our younger men, has stirred the local community to take stock of the religious situation, and an important conference assembled to consider "the Causes of the Decay in the Religious Life of This Community and the Remedy." Whatever the outcome of such a conference, it is surely a healthy sign that Jews should take counsel together. In the case of Birmingham perhaps the most promising feature of the movement is that a desire was freely expressed for further meetings of the same kind.

In Manchester, again, there was an opportunity lately to dwell not on the present but on the past. The Manchester Jews' School was built on the present site just half a century ago, and the occasion was marked by a celebration in which all Manchester joined. The Jews in Manchester owe much to this school, which has given many of their children a sound education, both general and Jewish, and which has been nursed by the piety of several families in Cottonopolis. The best wish expressed for the school was that its second fifty years might be as successful as its first.

Is the League of Nations receiving the support of Jews? How can the answer be doubtful? Jews love peace and pursue it; Jews are the People of Peace, and therefore the League of Nations must of necessity find great sympathy among Jews. In England we have the League of Nations Union, and on Armistice Day, 1919, it arranged for a mighty demonstration in London, which was addressed by the leaders of the country, among whom the Chief Rabbi was included. In the synagogues on the Sabbath before the demonstration pulpits resounded with appeals in favor of the League, appeals that reached willing hearts. Jews by their very Jewishness must support the League. And in the proposed League of Religions, a handmaid of the League of Nations, Jews are also active. The Chief Rabbi is prominent in this movement, too, and he is ably seconded by the Rev. Morris Joseph.

What does the League of Religions stand for? Its aim is to help to support the League of Nations in its goal of promoting international righteousness and universal peace. The great task set itself by the League of Religions is the formation of an exalted world-conscience, by creating a new temper among the peoples, a deeper sense of brotherhood, and a higher valuation of spiritual good, to raise the standard of public life throughout the world, and to infuse the largest possible measure of moral principle into the treatment of international questions and thus to act as a spiritual support to the League of Nations.

Fashion's Newest Censor.

In the face of these fine sentiments, what is to be said of the opinion of the Roman Catholic Bishop of Limerick as to the origin of immodest fashions? Opinions may differ as to the prevailing fashions in women's clothes. In Ireland several of the dignitaries of the Church have started a campaign against expensive women's garments, principally because of their alleged immodesty. These holy men have every right to engage in work of this kind if they think fit to do so. But let them, in carrying on the work, be very careful lest they stir up un-Christian hatred by means of lying tongues. For this is what Dr. Hallinan, the Bishop of Limerick, is represented as having written to the press:

"I have seen it stated on what I conceive to be reliable authority that the principal designers of these modern fashions in women's dress are men, not women; and, furthermore, that they are generally Parisian Jews or Freemasons, who are bitterly opposed to Christianity and seek, among other means, to uproot it by the introduction into Christian society of these dangerous and indecent dresses."

What is one to make of this poor bishop? What age does he live in? One rubs one's eyes in wonder at the simplicity of the holy man. It is indeed a joke to imagine all the designers of Paris fashions as plotting to uproot Christianity.

It might, however, be a joke if its author were not a bishop of the Catholic Church. But what are we to think of a Bishop, a man in a position of responsibility, uttering childish, foolish, ignorant opinions of the kind voiced by Dr. Hallinan? Words fail to give adequate expression to this amazing exhibition of prejudice. But as one thinks of the possible harm of the Bishop's opinion, one asks in wonder, what of Christian teaching? What of loving your neighbor as yourself? What of being charitable to all men? Dr. Hallinan proves abundantly that the world urgently needs a League of Nations and a League of Religions.

Death of Oppenheim

English Jewry has lost a great scholar in the person of Prof. Oppenheim, a Professor at Cambridge, and an international lawyer of renown. It speaks much for his reputation and for the free spirit of England before the war that, though Oppenheim was a foreigner—he was born in Frankfort in 1858—he found recognition and honor at English universities. Oppenheim became a respected citizen of his adopted country. Jews always are good citizens, given a chance. One was reminded of this fact again when the news came of Haase's death. Here too was a Jew who against great odds became a notable citizen of this country.

And is it not worthy of note that Jews are in the fore of those who are

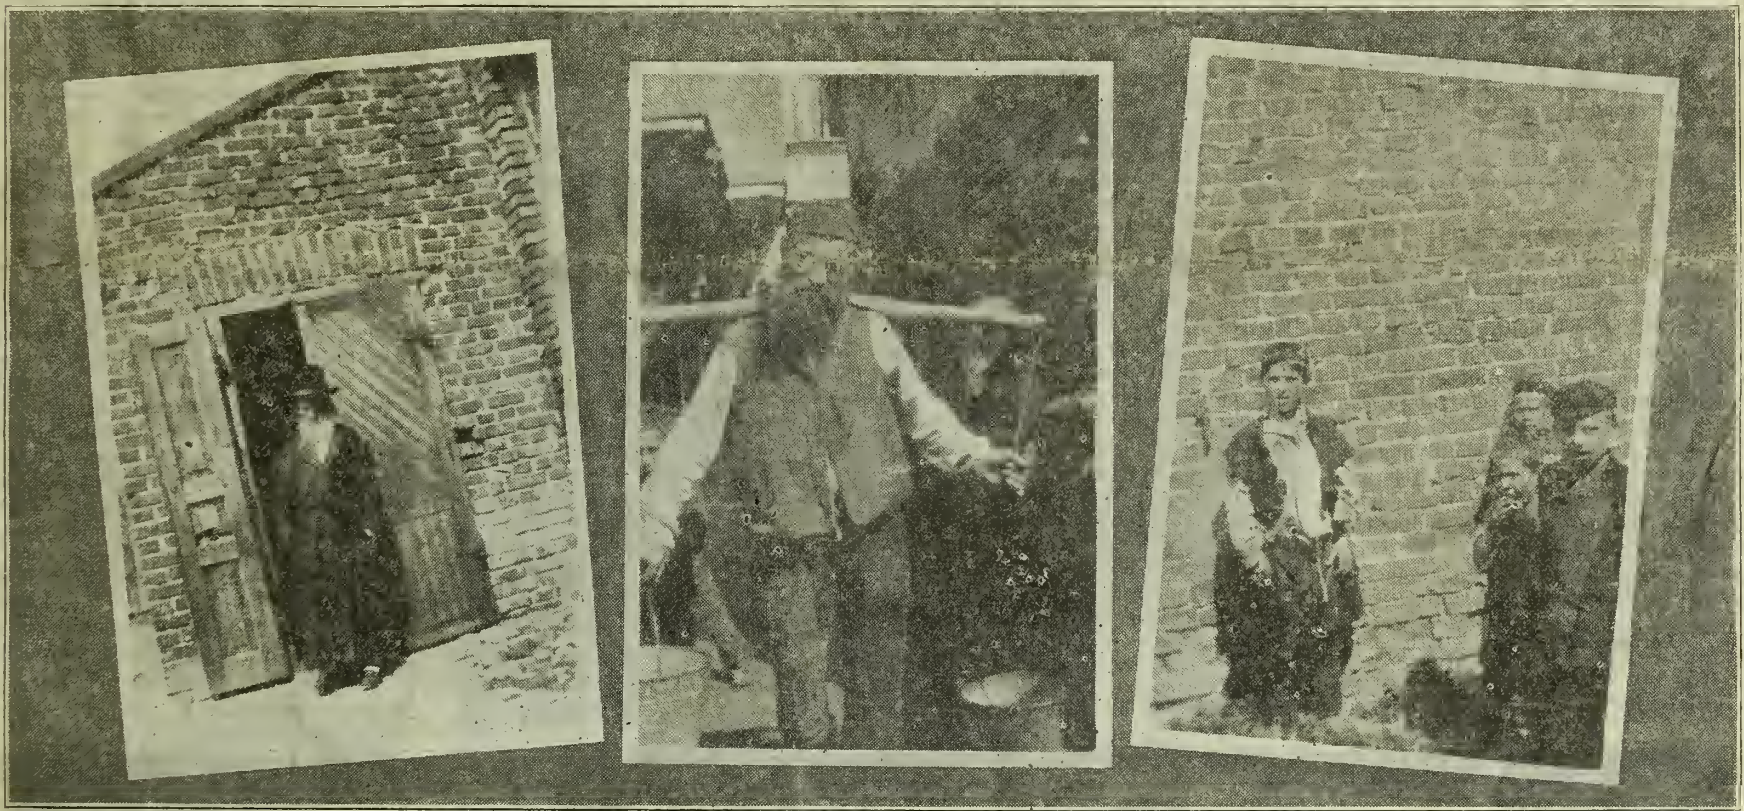
My Impressions Abroad

Prominent Member of Order Describes Deplorable Condition of Jews in Central and Eastern Europe

By Henry Lasker

LAST summer I had occasion to journey to Europe on business, and traveled extensively, visiting Switzerland, Italy, Austria, Czecho-Slovakia, Poland, Lithuania, Belgium. Holland and England.

I saw the battle fields of France and Belgium, the Austrian-Italian front and the Russian. Indescribable is the havoc that has been wrought by the great world war all along the battle fronts.



JEWS OF NOVA GORE

After transacting my business in France I traveled through Switzerland, the northern part of Italy, visiting Milan, Verona and Venice, and then through Austria to Vienna. At Basle and Zurich, Switzerland, I visited some of our B'nai B'rith members. In Vienna I also had the opportunity of meeting some of our brothers of the B'nai B'rith, and was very much impressed with the caliber of the men and their high standing. Membership in the B'nai B'rith throughout Europe is a badge of great honor and distinction; men in the highest walks of life, professors in universities and leading business men are affiliated with our Order. In Vienna I also had the pleasure of meeting our Grand Secretary, Brother A. B. Seelenfreund, who was there actively engaged in gathering data on B'nai B'rith conditions in the war stricken countries.

Vienna

Conditions in Vienna were very bad, people being depressed and discouraged. It was no uncommon sight to see men and women in restaurants taking out of small handbags their own piece of black bread. Different food lines were also very noticeable in various parts of the city.

I found that the cost of living in Austria, for an American, was far cheaper than in other countries because of the low rate of exchange. At that time fifty kronen were equivalent to one dollar. I paid ten kronen a night for a room in one of the hotels, which was equivalent to twenty-cents a night. The Austrians are very much discouraged and see little hope for their future, because their country has been greatly reduced in size and all the indebtedness of former Austro-Hungary is to be borne solely by the present Austria.

It would take considerable time to give a vivid picture of all things seen and impressions made throughout my travels, but as I wish especially to convey an idea as to what I saw in Poland and Lithuania I will not dwell very much on the other phases of the trip.

After leaving Vienna, I passed through Czecho-Slovakia, and finally reached Poland. All through this part of the country I found every bridge and every railroad station destroyed.

Poland

The first city visited in Poland was Lodz. Here there was industrial depression because the Germans had removed the machinery from the factories. Business is also crippled by the fact that one finds difficulty in getting around, as no one can travel from place to place without a special permit, which is often difficult to secure. While here I investigated conditions, and had an interview with Dr. ———, a man of high standing, a Ph. D. and also a member of our fraternity. He related to me many interesting things pertaining to conditions of our people in Poland. He vividly described the atrocities committed upon our people. He told how coffins had been opened during funeral processions to see if there was any ammunition concealed; how the Poles had broken into the houses of worship to ransack the Ark, and even how cemeteries were desecrated from pure malice. Dr. ——— was a man of wealth and high social position, and yet he informed me that he would gladly leave Poland even at a sacrifice of his all.

Several American soldiers told me at Lodz that the week previous they saw Polish soldiers at the railroad station wantonly cutting the beards of the Jewish old men.

From Lodz I went to Warsaw, the capital of Poland, which is a very beautiful city. Here no one was allowed on the streets of the city after eleven P. M. The business section of the city appeared normal, but there was quite a contrast in the Jewish section. There I found a large number of people begging for alms on the streets, and bread lines and other lines were unfortunately too prevalent. It was no uncommon occurrence to have children come in some of the restaurants where people were eating and ask for bread. I visited the big market place and was astonished at the sight of thousands of people trying to eke out an existance from many articles that would be relegated to the waste heap in this country.

The copper domes had been removed from the churches, and all the statues of Russian celebrities in the parks and public places had been torn from the pedestals. In this city, as well as in the other cities I visited, all signs, either in the Russian or Jewish language, were removed. I visited the Synagogue where the famous Cantor Soroto officiates, and there were about fifteen hundred people present at the services. The week previous, Hon. Henry Morgenthau, with his commission, visited the same Synagogue on a Saturday morning and was given a great ovation. I called at the headquarters of the Joint Distribution Committee, and spent some time with Dr. Boris D. Bogen and Isidor Herschfield, his present successor. They have an excellent organization and do good work throughout Poland and Lithuania. Thirty-five thousand glasses of milk are distributed daily to the children of the city regardless of creed, and the relief work is carried on among all elements of the population.

[illegible] ces letters from American relatives

[illegible] know my [illegible] I desired to ascertain conditions I was told that it was not necessary for me to go any further, that their sufferings would well match those endured by others. The sights I saw there were pitiful; people lined up at the soup kitchens, which were maintained by the Joint Distribution Committee, men, women and children in ragged clothes, held together by strings, and many were without underwear. I visited some of the homes and the conditions were frightful. Most of them had no furniture, just a mattress on the floor and the children lying there in a starved and dying condition. I spoke to a woman who had three children, two of them practically on their death bed, and she was trying to keep the children alive by bringing a bag of sand each day from the outskirts of the town, for which she received a mark and a half. At the time I was there the value of an American dollar was equal to twenty-five marks, and for her day's work she received an amount equivalent to six cents. I saw a family consisting of a mother and seven children, whose husband had been an expressman, and I was told that as he drove home one day his whip became entangled in some wires overhead, and he was immediately accused of tampering with the telephone service and was shot. This family had no means of income whatever, and no one can conceive the condition of the children, emaciated and starving. I saw children with swollen heads as the result of hunger, children of mature years who were unable to walk because of lack of nourishment, people on the streets who said they had not eaten for days, and a number of other cases too numerous and too frightful to mention. This is the town of the sect known as "Chasidim." The Synagogue was destroyed as a result of the war, and conditions in general were deplorable. With few exceptions similar conditions existed practically in every other city and town I subsequently visited in Poland and Lithuania.

Letters via B'nai B'rith

After my return to Warsaw I determined to go further into the interior, [illegible] culty I obtained [illegible] rom the Polish [illegible] which was necessary, as [illegible] Bialystok was still [illegible] zone at that time. Starting [illegible] o'clock in the afternoon from [illegible] I reached Bialystok at midnight and although I had a first class passage I was compelled to travel third class, and was obliged to stand all the way, the train being in total darkness. From Bialystok I traveled on to Grodno under similar conditions, and from there I traveled for Suvalki. I left Grodno the following day at one o'clock in the afternoon, and after getting located in one of the compartments of the train, together with some other Jewish travelers, an official told us to get out and we were compelled to go into a freight car which was attached to the same train. There, we were huddled together like cattle, and after traveling four hours the train stopped and we were informed that the train was too heavy for the engine to pull, and so the occupants of the freight car were thrown off in an open field. One of the party advised us that there was a town about four miles away, known as Nova Gora. In the teeth of a storm we were compelled to walk, carrying our luggage, to this town. We spent the night there, and I obtained a number of letters for relatives in this country, as I did in every other locality visited. These letters have brought word to many families who have not heard from their relatives since the war started. When these letters were brought by me to this country, I mailed many of them, and others were sent out through the offices of the various Districts of the B'nai B'rith. Many of the recipients are so grateful that they are becoming affiliated as members of our Order.

On the following day we returned to the spot where we had been thrown off, and were informed that a train was due any minute, but we remained there from twelve o'clock noon until twelve o'clock midnight without anything to eat. I took a photograph of the group with the "Natchalnik" (the station master) of the nearby station as the central figure, but after the picture was taken the wife of the "Nachalnik" came out and scolded her husband for his alleged indiscretion of allowing himself to be photographed with Jews, and he grasped the camera from my hand, insisting on seeing the negative, but I finally convinced him that this was impossible until it was developed. We left this place in a freight car also at twelve midnight and arrived at Suvalki at four in the morning. Ours was the first civil train to pull in since the evacuation of the Germans. There was an arch erected in the center of the city welcoming the Polish army, and there was also a fund of 100,000 marks expended by the Jewish population to help entertain the Polish soldiers.

Lithuania

From Suvalki I started for Lithuania, and this journey was even more difficult, as a state of war existed at that time between Lithuania and Poland over the boundary which was established by the Versailles Peace Conference. The day previous a battle took place at Seni, where thirty men were killed. After passing a number of sentries all along the Polish border I finally reached the Lithuanian line. There I was held up awaiting orders from the military authorities at Kovno, the capital of Lithuania, where the officer in charge had telephoned for instructions as to whether I should be permitted to pass on. Finally, at dusk, I was informed that I had permission to enter the country, and a soldier accompanied me in the stage coach. After traveling several miles he ordered the driver to halt, saying there were spies in the vicinity. He got out of the coach and began to shoot indiscriminately. Every minute I expected to hear some shots fired in response, but there were none, so we traveled on unmolested. Late in the evening we arrived at Kalvaria. I spent the following day there and took a number of letters and gathered information. During the day I was held up by German soldiers, who desired to know my mission, but when I showed them my American passport they meekly turned away. I found conditions there very deplorable. The Synagogue was demolished. I was informed that previous to the destruction of the edifice all the people of the city placed all their possessions in the building believing that it would not be destroyed, but they lost everything later. Many of the buildings in the town were only heaps of ruins. I was requested there by the community to get in touch with the Kalvaria community in New York to ask them to render them assistance.

During the time of the bombardment, which took place at night, it was a ghastly sight I was told, to see people wading the river up to their necks in water, carrying their children in their arms and leading their cattle. It was a sight they will never forget. When the Germans first evacuated Kalvaria, and [illegible] town led in the work, and all along the road they were jeered and abused by the Russians.

From Kalvaria I went to [illegible] There in a group of the people [illegible] gathered, at my request, at th[illegible] of the Synagogue for a photo[illegible] noticed an elderly gentleman [illegible] sembled a young man from my c[illegible] as I approached him I greeted him by name. He was amazed and asked me whether I knew his boys. I told him that they were good friends of mine and members of our Springfield Lodge. I was told of the great privations the people endured, and that during the bombardment of the town, also on Yom Kippur, all rushed to the Synagogue for protection, peasants as well as Jews, and on one side of the Synagogue while the latter were chanting the Yom Kippur prayers, on the other side, the former were making their crosses, and all felt that if they were to die they were ready to die together.

After I visited Simna I traveled to Olita, Orany and Bielsk, and found conditions similar to the other places visited.

Hostility Against Jews

The Jewish people in Poland are held responsible for the high cost of wearing apparel and other commodities, but as a matter of fact the price for food stuffs are exorbitant, and, as prior to the war, three per cent of the farmers were Jewish and since the war only two per cent, and the prices set by the peasants for the food stuffs are so high, it is but natural for the merchants to ask a high price for their goods in order to obtain the necessities of life; therefore, fundamentally it is the Polish peasant and not the Jew who is really responsible for the deplorable economic condition.

Events of the Month in Review

By Dr. Gotthard Deutsch

HUMOR is limited by time, but pathos is immortal. Maimonides explains prophecy as a combination of philosophy and poetry, but even orthodox believers in inspiration will admit that the prophets were poets. The tragedy of despair is presented by Schiller in the words addressed by Armgard to Gessler in Wilhelm Tell: ''Wir sind so grenzenlos unglueeklich, dass wir nichts nach deinem Zorn mehr fragen,'' and Jeremiah, the classic of national pathos, says (as I would translate): ''Woe is me, for my soul is weary of all the atrocities of the murderers.'' (4:31). The center of the Jewish tragedy is the Ukraine. It is immaterial whether Denikine, the ''loyalist,'' or Petlura, the ''rebel,'' is responsible for more victims or greater atrocities, it is even immaterial whether the number of killed is 40,000, as one report has it, or 125,000, as another says, for it is certain that no tragedy in Israel's walk through the valley of tears since the times of Bogdan Chmelnicki, the Denikine of the 17th century, has equalled the horrors of the present day, and it is doubtful whether even then conditions, measured by numbers, were as terrible as they are now.

A Strange Agreement

Representative Jews, led by a committee of the Jewish Congress, with Mr. Louis Marshall as principal spokesman, were received by Mr. Robert Lansing, secretary of state, Dec. 10. It was a memorable event. All classes of Jews, from the high bourgeoisie to the radical socialists, were represented. What Mr. Lansing said was, briefly and prosaically put, the following: ''For the present we have got to let the slaughter go on; what we may do in the future I do not know, except''—and this was the only note of hope in his address—''that we shall recognize no government in the Ukraine which will not give a guarantee for the protection of minorities.'' The effect of Mr. Lansing's statement on the community is illustrated by comments from what we might call the two extremes in Judaism. ''The result of all protest meetings and parades,'' says the ''American Israelite'' (Dec. 18), ''was to elicit the statement that nothing can be done.'' This paper blames the United States Senate's failure to ratify the peace treaty for the inability of the Department of State to act. K. Marmer, who was a member of the peace delegation, agrees with the ''Israelite'' in his report, published in the ''Vorwaerts'' (Dec. 14), as to the hopelessness of the situation, but his interpretation of the reasons is different. ''Diplomacy,'' he says, ''rests on the give and take principle. We Jews have nothing to give, we can only 'bet Rachamim,' hence we get polite replies.'' I would prove, if it would not require too much space, the hermeneutic rule of the Talmud that two passages in Scripture which say the same are no proof, except when they differ in one point. (Montefuscoli, Yad Malachi, sec. 623).

Terror Roundabout

Being unable to obtain authentic details of the terrible events in southern Russia, we have to be guided by our impressions, which indicate that attempts at whitewashing are made by the various governments, according to their sympathies. Secretary Lansing's frank avowal that he does not wish Russia to be divided clearly proves that the Allies are favoring Denikine, the ''loyalist,'' and backer of the czarist, Kolchak. The same impression is received from the announcement of the British government that Denikine gave an order to stop pogroms, which leads to the inference that he either had tolerated or ordered them before. A correspondent to the ''Vorwaerts'' (Dec. 1), claims that some Jews in southern Russia appealed to their co-religionists to support Denikine, which would be just the thing which Kolchak's emissary to this country desired of some leading American Jews. The same purpose is seen in a declaration of Maklakoff, Russian representative in Paris, published in the ''Presse de Paris,'' in which the Russian Jews are warned that they will bring evil upon themselves if they continue to support Bolshevism. Unfortunately, we remember Maklakoff's activity as the last minister of the interior of the czar too well to believe in his theory of the masses being outraged by the radicalism of the Jews. This was the old trick of czarist bureaucracy from the days of Count Paul Ignatieff down to Maklakoff, using the Jews as a target against the wrath of the masses provoked by a corrupt and cruel administration. We heard a similar song even in the days of Nicholas I when the starved masses of the pale were decried as exploiters. Then at least some constructive work was done by establishing Jewish agricultural colonies, but those of Novopoltave were just recently annihilated after brave resistance, just like the Hasidic settlement of Miedzyborz, the center of the mystic movement which, also under Nicholas I, as under his father Paul, was denounced as the cause of Jewish aloofness, disloyalty and habits of exploitation. Reports from London (Dec. 9) that the Bolsheviki executed a Baron Guenzburg and (Dec. 26) a rabbi, with 12 companions, in Kursom (gov. Kiew) for having greeted Denikine's troops, may be true but may just as well be inspired by the desire to plead ''there are others,'' as seems the case in the report of a terrible slaughter in Talinas (?), Esthonia, a place which cannot be identified, besides the fact that there are at best only a very few Jews in Esthonia. The New York Yiddish press began recently to publish the list of pogrom victims brought over by Mr. Meyer Grossman from Ukraine, and one would imagine that, if a Jew were able to gather this information on the spot, the New York ''Tribune'' cannot be wrong when it states (Dec. 16) that Mr. Lansing might obtain information, if he cared to, from the United States officers attached to both Denikine's and Petlura's armies.

Hasty judgment on the ground of newspaper reports could never have been given a more decisive setback than the gratifying disappointment received from Mr. Morgenthau's address bfore the New York Club, the Judaeans (Dec. 14). Mr. Morgenthau said briefly that the Poles hate the Jews and want to get rid of them by a systematic boycott. He does say that the reports of the pogroms were exaggerated, but he adds that the facts proven beyond any doubt reveal an amount of brutality which, though a little more refined than the acts of the Turks in Armenia, is just as inhuman. The Associated Press on July 28 had reported him to have said the atrocities were exaggerations, and all the Jews had to do was to become Poles, and to give up their idea of recognition as a special nationality. Now the matter is entirely different. We, consequently, are led to believe, as we had reason to surmise repeatedly, that in questions concerning the eastern Jews the Associated Press is far more desirous to serve certain patrons than the truth. Sir Stuart Samuel, the British commissioner for the investigation of the Polish pogroms, who returned to London Dec. 17, brings essentially the same report, but after our experience with the Associated Press in the case of Mr. Morgenthau, we prefer to wait until his address to the meeting which greeted him or his report is transmitted by mail.

Abimlech's Trick

It may be an accident that all civilized nations designate by Philistine a narrow-minded utilitarian who has a high opinion of his mentality, but posterity might change Philistine to Popolski, and Philistinism to Paderewskism, Niemojewskism, Dnowskism, Krapulinskism or Waschlappskism, if these words had not such a barbarous sound to western ears. In spite of the clear stipulations of the Paris treaty which the representatives of Poland signed, the sejm passed the Sunday law, which compels the Jews to close their business houses, factories, stores and shops and even their congregational and charitable offices on Sundays. A meeting of the Beth Hamidrash Hagodel in New York or in Chicago, usually held on Sundays, would be a felony in Warsaw. The Poles are strict Roman Catholics, and as such, like other Roman Catholics, deride the Puritan Sunday as backsliding into Judaism. In the course of the debate, member Grunebaum said Premier Skulski's (Paderewski's successor) program meant extermination of the Jews, for which he quoted the wholesale discharge of Jewish railroad men, the educational restrictions, and the impossibility for a Jew to obtain justice in a Polish court. For the latter he cited the incredible case that a captain in the army, who had violated and afterwards cruelly murdered six Jewish girls, was sentenced to three months in jail for disorderly conduct by a court in Lublin. The answer was a riotous scene and shouts, ''Zidowska Chuzpa.'' There is not the slightest reflection on the self-sacrificing work or on the honesty and intelligence of those who claim the credit for the minority clause in the treaty of Paris, but Dr. Bloch's ''Wochenschrift'' of Vienna (Nov. 7), put the situation in a nutshell by the following statement: A French sergeant named Manheim was shot dead in Berlin. Some claim the killing was merely accidental, but the allied governments demanded and obtained an indemnity of 1,000,000 marks in gold for this life. Manheim happened to be a Jew. He came from a country where the Jews have no group rights and would protest if they were offered to them. In Ukraine and Poland thousands of Jews were killed. The treaty of Paris guarantees their group rights but the Allies who exacted a million for one life are shrugging their shoulders—as did Mr. Lansing (note of the present writer)—and regret that nothing can be done. The ''Wochenschrift'' is struck very hard by the dismemberment of Austria and the complete depreciation of the currency, and far-sighted philanthropists ought to understand that to maintain an organ like this which has fought the battles of the Jews in that country, infected with the anti-Semitic virus, is as important as a soup-kitchen. In addition the veteran editor of this paper deserves this recognition for his services to the cause.

Swoj do Swedo

One of the charges made in the debate on the Sunday law in the sejm was that the Jew could not be treated as an equal because he has a different standard of morality in dealing with Christians. Strange! We have always been told that ''an eye for an eye'' was Old Testament ethics, while the Sermon on the Mount and the story of the Good Samaritan told us to do good to those who do us evil. As it happens, the abominable Talmud teaches: ''What is thine be thine, what is mine be mine''; this is the ethics of Sodom (Abot. 5:13). We do not care to enter into any polemics on the ground of the ''tu quoque'' principle and have no desire to borrow from the rich arsenal of Count Hoensbroech's store of Jesuit ethics. We are dealing with the present expositors of the ''Swoj do swedo'' (each one for himself) principle. The Pan-Polish Congress, held in Warsaw, heard this theme in many variations. Pan Grabski, a member of the sejm, declared Greater Poland must find means to reduce the Jewish population to one or at the utmost one and a half percent, the others to look for more congenial homes. "Kurjer Poznanski" (Nov. 8) preaches exclusion of the Jews from educational institutions. The paper hypocritically declares that the problem in Posen is not so bad because the university has no more than two percent Jewish students, which means that only two percent were admitted. Even this is too much for the author of the article. He regrets that an institution supported by the state cannot do what the university of Lublin, a private foundation, found possible — exclude all Jews, but he sees a remedy. The Polish students shall exclude their Jewish colleagues from all societies, because Jewish ethics also discriminate against Christians. There is, indeed, a difference between Polish and Jewish ethics. The former teaches "Swoj de swedo" and the latter declares that on the ground of this principle the Sodomites demanded the extradition of Lot's guests. As in Posen, the "Swoj de swedo" cry is taken up by a Polish paper, published in Thorn, and this shows what the Jews in the former Prussian and Austrian parts of Poland have to look for. It is very instructive that just at this time a book on the history of the city of Gnesen, the seat of the Metropolitan of Poland, was published. The author, Adolf Warschauer, the son of a Hazan of Kempen, is a historian of eminence and held the high rank of head of the archives in the Polish provinces of Prussia. This is now over for a long time at least. But Popolski might learn a lesson, if he were capable of outgrowing his bourbonism. The city of Gnesen had in the latter part of the '40s a Jewish population of about 2,000, which was about 20 percent. In 1910 the Jewish population had decreased to 778, while the total population had grown to 25,000. This miracle was accomplished by the liberal legislation of 1848 and by opening the schools for the Jews. Russia would not act in the spirit of '48 and Austria as too weak to enforce school attendance, hence the ghetto conditions in oth sections. Prussia has the historians, Warschauer, Caro and Jaffe, the great medical men, Munk, Senator, Remak, Isidor Rosenthal, the philosopher Lazarus, the poet Lublinski, etc. Even a Maximilian Harden is not such a bad return for opening the avenues of national education.

Anti-Semitic Agitation in Germany and Austria

The Old Story

Pogroms, merciless beatings of Jews by soldiers of the regular army, such as Mr. Morgenthau reported as authentic, assaults on passengers in railroad cars, arbitrary arrests under silly charges, such as dodging military service by men past middle life, suppression of Jewish newspapers, intimidation of voters at municipal elections when the Jew held the balance of power, are of daily occurrence. It is like a suicide in Monte Carlo. Of course, it is a tragedy, "mais, ca se passe; faites votre jeu. messieurs." Elias Nacht of Lemberg, who is at present living in Berlin, reports in "Allgemeine Zeitung des Judentums," on the occasion of the anniversary of the slaughter of Lemberg, Nov. 22, 1918, the details of the horrors of which he was an eye-witness. It is only too true, as Mr. Morgenthau said, the exaggerations are a misfortune. If people would hear the actual story of the Jews who were burned in the synagog, bayoneted when they tried to escape and thrown back into the flames, and though the victims did not number 3,000, as was originally reported, the horror could not be dampened by the statement of diplomats that the facts were greatly exaggerated. We learn from Nacht that the actual number will never be known.

Between Two Fires

The catastrophe of Lemberg was due to the fight between the two nationalities, the Ukrainians and the Poles. The later are intruders in Ukraine.

This, however, is not the point. The fact is that the oppressed of the last 150 years, a term which is only correct as far as the Russian and the Prussian sections are concerned, are now merciless oppressors of those whom the Paris Conference has delivered to them. Right now the Ruthenian churches in America are draped in mourning as a protest against the mandate given to Poland in Eastern Galicia. There where the Jewish population was densest, the Jews are indeed between two fires. Their homes were devastated by the Russian army. All business activity is paralyzed, owing to the political uncertainty and the depreciation of the currency. The Jew can neither join the one side nor the other, nor, as we saw in Lemberg, remain neutral without inviting disaster. One striking instance is the case of Rabbi Joseph Phineas Landau of Bolechov. In 1915 the Russians arrested him as hostage with the intention of sending him to Siberia. He came only as far as Kiew. There he was interned for three years, until the soviet government allowed him to return. In his home he found a starving congregation which, even in normal times, consisting of 3,300 Jews in a population of 4,200, lived mostly as "Luftsmenschen," and now with the arteries of commerce clogged, with the means of livelihood beyond the reach of anybody except the richest, he is in a hopeless plight. The Pole knows no pity. The mandate is not enough. They want outright possession, and claim the Jews influenced the Peace Conference to deprive Poland of its "historic rights." Paderewski said in a conversation with Sir Stuart Samuel that the Jews are constantly blackening the reputation of Poland. The correspondent of the Chicago "Tribune" (Nov. 30) admits that the Poles hate the Jews with a religious fervor, but excuses it with their fear of Germans, on the ground that the Jew is pro-German, and socialistic. In Poland this excuse does not seem to work, for a professor Czerbak—according to the latest report, a professor of the terpischorean art—delivered a public lecture on ritual murder with stereoptican slides, which Sir Stuart Samuel attended, protesting to the government most vigorously. We know what this means, especially with a bigoted people who still see in their holy shrines, as in Kalwyra, these "saints" bled by the Jews.

Healing and the Sun of Righteousness

The latest reports inform us that an international conference of relief workers is to be held in Paris in the month of March. Is it possible to support a starving nation which has nothing to look for? Complaints come from all sides. Dr. George Rosenblatt, member of the sejm, arrived in New York to present plans for the reform of the Joint Distribution Commission. Letters published in the "Vorwaerts" (e. g. Dec. 24) claim that the local committees are dishonest, playing favorites and keeping the best garments for themselves and their relatives. Rabbi Chaim Thumin of Kolomea laments: "I receive no salary, for there is no one to pay dues to the congregation. The Committee overlooks the rabbis entirely." It is a consolation to read the same laments in the Polish socialist paper "Robotnik," which claims that money and garments collected by the radical Polish societies in the United States are distributed among the henchmen of the reactionary government, while the representative of the socialists, Madam Moraczewska, member of the sejm, who had been advised of the consignment, addressed in her care, upon inquiry received the reply that the goods were already distributed feature is a serious discord between the Jewish representatives in the sejm. Rabbi Perlmutter, who recently visited London in the interest of relief work, is charged with partisanship in the intrest of the orthodox institutions, and a meeting of the radical group demanded that he resign his seat in the sejm. Still more unpleasant is an attack in the London Jewish press on the American delegates in Paris, headed in the Jewish "Chronicle": "See the Conquering Marshall." The Americans are charged with claiming all credit for what was achieved with "bossing airs and almighty pose." It seems as if not only our calamity but also our internal dissensions shall duplicate the disaster of the destruction of Jerusalem, which is ascribed in the Talmud to lack of respect for the leaders (Sabbath, 119b).

"Dalles Macht Passles"

The ghetto displayed great wisdom in its proverbial sayings. "Misfortune makes for meanness," it said, and Germany, as well as Austria, show the truth of this folk philosophy. The anti-Semitic agitation in both countries has reached the violence which marked it in 1880 when the diet of Prussia devoted two days to its discussion. The classes which propagate the doctrine are the same which gave it its most powerful support forty years ago. The arrival of Hindenburg and Ludendorff in Berlin, who were called to testify before the commission appointed by the National Assembly to investigate the causes of the war, gave the signal to demonstrations which were reminiscent of the days of the French revolution. The organs of reaction, "Taegliche Rundschau," "Deutsche Tageszeitung" and "Kreuzzeitung" indulged in vehement invectives against the commission, which had two Jewish members, Oscar Cohn and Sinzheim, declaring it a disgrace that "Herren von der unabkoemmlichen Konfession" (Jewish slackers) should sit in judgment over Hindenburg and thus gratify their "Asiatic degeneracy". (Nov. 16). It seems forgotten that the only member of the Reichstag killed in action was the Jew, Ludwig Frank, that thousands of Jews lost their lives and thousands (the number known to us in 1916 when we received the last German papers was 2,400) and other thousands decorated, a large number being promoted to commissioned rank, denied to them before the war. The new flag of the "reich," black, red and gold, is ridiculed as a Jew-flag, although it is the emblem of the "Burschenschaft," the student fraternity founded after Waterloo, which excluded Jews from membership. At the big Hindenburg demonstration (Nov. 18) when the masses prevented him from appearing before the Reichstag a chorus of thousands of voices sang: "Hoch weht die Flagge, Schwarz, weiss und rot," which, by the way, was written by the Jew, Robert Linderer. The leaders are, of course, the military gentry and the advocates of the state's church. The old conservative party, which, for obvious reasons, changed its name and calls itself the "Deutsch-Nationale Volkspartei," speaks in its official platform of its opposition to the "undeutschen zersetzenden Geist," avoiding the word Judaism, while in party conventions the resolutions supply the missing word. The old national liberal party, among whose leaders in olden times the Jews, Lasker and Bamberger, were prominent, is now the "Deutsche Volkspartei," and among its leaders is the great jurist, Jacob Riesser, the nephew of the illustrious Gabriel Riesser, the fearless champion of Jewish rights, and vice-president of the first German parliament of 1848. It speaks more carefully of the "voelkische Eigenart," which it wishes to preserve against efforts of "cosmopolitan disintegration." The pastors, Traub and Maurenbrecher, Stoecker's spiritual heirs, chime in with the same note, and, like their model, indifferent to truth, repeat the story that D'Annunzio is a Jew, although just at that time he had in his appeal to the Croatian people advised the latter to submit to Italian rule, because they, like the Italians, are victims of Jewish war profiteers. Finally, the crazy Count Pueckler type also comes to the surface. Franziska Eichhorn, a nurse, addressed street meetings in the fashionable west end of Berlin, asking the audience to drag the Jews who live in luxury, while the masses are starving, from their homes and kill them. She offered to take active part in this sport. It is significant that her punishment was a fine of 30 marks, according to the present rate of exchange less than a dollar, and against this she appealed.

An Old Precedent

Jews were prominently connected with every period of Prussian ascendancy from Berent Lehmann (1661-1730) under the Great Elector, to Albert Ballin, L. M. Goldberger, Emil Rathenau, etc., under William the Last. Frederick the Great, the anti-Semite who wanted "human beings instead of Jews" in his states, had as his financial adviser the Jew, Veitel Heine Ephraim (c.1700-1775) who financed the important campaign in Saxony during the war of Seven Years. Saxony, bled white by the Prussian army, received the consolation from the king of Prussia that he meant to save her from the indeed extravagant and profligate king August. Saxony had to meet this argument. Its statesmen hired one of the leading political writers of the day, the former Capuchin monk, Jean Henri Maubert de Gouvest, to plead her cause. He did it in a pamphlet with a long title, of which the beginning words are: "Ephraim Justifie" (1758). The pamphlet purports to be a letter written by Veitel Heine to his cousin (all Jews are cousins for this Frenchman) Manesseh, in Amsterdam. It is easily imagined that the main argument for Saxony is that the war is carried on chiefly for the benefit of the Jewish war profiteer. There are, however, some reconciling features in this booklet. M. Maubert, pleading for a defeated nation, pleads for moderation: "On peut penser et consoler le Vaincu sans blesser ou braver le Vainquer," he says. Prussia has a Jew as premier. Bismarck would have treated the prediction of a Paul Hirsch as his successor as a huge joke. He is a socialist, and besides him there is only one more Jew among the 145 socialist members of the Prussian parliament, but the cry of a Jew government continues. The premier, in an address to the diet, spoke of the peril and the vicious nature of the anti-Semitic movement, quoting the case of a high school where the students arranged a "schweigestreik," a conspiracy to ignore their Jewish fellow students.

External and Internal Troubles

The government does something. Upon action instituted by the Jewish "Zentralverein" the courts declared that the trade mark "pogrom" for a rat poison was injurious to a class of citizens and could not be registered. The Society against anti-Semitism held its annual meeting (Nov. 16) with Gothein, ex-minister and member of the Nationalversammlung as chairman. It is not very refreshing to learn that there are Jews, a Frau von Rothschild among them, who pay constributions to the anti-Semitic Deutsch-National Volkspartei, evidently a sort of hush money, but it is more discouraging to hear that a prominent socialist leader, Herr Winning, the governor of East Prussia, declared that 90 percent of the socialists are anti-Semites. Equally disheartening is the general impression received from the report of an open forum meeting arranged by the Berlin Union of Jewish Young People's Societies (Nov. 25), to which speakers of various views were invited. Lechler, the president of the ''Wandervogel'' (a sort of boy scouts), could not surprise anybody when he said that Jews and non-Jews are two families, living under the same roof, between whom there may be mutual respect but can be no real friendship. Count Hoensbroech, the ex-Jesuit, who for twenty years or so has been fighting the Jesuit order as cosmopolitan, strangely says the Jewish question is not religious but national. Even Professor Strack, the true friend of Israel, finds no better consolation for the Jews than the advice not to be hypersensitive. The continued anti-Semitic agitation is probably responsible for a large number of desertions from the Jewish ranks. One single monthly bulletin of the Berlin congregation contains the names of 113 heads of families who reported their withdrawals. There are many prominent artists like the 'cellist, Heinrich Gruenfeld, the composer Oscar Fried, etc., among them. Judging from similar reports coming from Christian quarters the main reason for the desertions is of a general nature, for the city of Berlin reported for one single day 800 withdrawals from the church, and the Prussian diet had an animated discussion on the new law which makes secession from the church so easy. In the course of the debate the socialist Hoffmann spoke of the Bible as the most immoral book in existence. This is quoted as a specimen of the difficulty of the position of the Jews. Hoffmann is a Christian by birth. Nobody holds any class of people responsible for this individual's blasphemous remark. It happens that a Jew, Moritz Goldschmidt, publishes in the ''Frankfurter Nachrichten'' (Nov. 3) a mean, though rather clever verse:

Jewish Congregations, Formerly Wealthy, Poverty Stricken

''Der Herrgott sprach: Es ist vollbracht.
Und darauf liess er uns im Stich.
Erst hat er uns aus dem Staube gemacht
Und dann-sich.''

At once the clerical press is all excitement. No one must wonder that there is anti-Semitism.

Where Clericalism Is Trump

The truism of the extremes which meet was never more clearly illustrated than in Bavaria. The downfall of the Bolshevist government led to a white terror, and clericalism feels certain that its latest defeat was its last. Regardless of the federal constitution a new school bill provides for a strictly denominational school system, and the Jews, as usual, are footing the bill for the compromise between the reactionaries of both the Protestant and the Catholic camps. Jewish teachers are excluded from appointment in public schools, and their chance of being appointed for Jewish schools is practically a farce. The large cities, three of which contain about one-half of the total Jewish population of the new ''Volksstaat,'' have no Jewish schools. The numerous village congregations are either dissolved or are rapidly vanishing, and so the most conservative element pays for the sins of the few radicals who were connected with the Terror in Munich. One should imagine that those who have a special prayer on Good Friday for the removal of the veil from the eyes of Israel should make it easy for those who are willing to assist in this operation, but the opposite seems to be the case. Arthur Trebitsch of Vienna laments, in a book, ''Geist und Judentum,'' that he, the son of a converted Jew, is still treated as a Jew, and he clamors for the same privilege which was granted to the German poet, Adalbert von Chamisso, a born Frenchman, or to the Pan-German fanatic, Houston Stewart Chamberlain, the son of a British admiral, and to whole groups like the French Emigres or the Slavs in the Baltic provinces. He finds no responsive echo. The ''Offizierszeitung,'' representing the clique of the clerical jingo, archduke Franz Ferdinand, declares the Jews are not a nation, like Frenchmen or Britons, who might become Germans by option. They are a ''minderwertige Rasse''—Renan's ''race incomplete''—and, in addition, profiteers, exploiters and a few more undesirable things. Speaking of Franz Ferdinand, we learned just recently something about his pernicious influence in politics. Rudolph Sieghart, the son of a Hazan, originally named Singer, rose to the high rank of first assistant to the premier, and as such exercised a great influence in the rapidly changing ministries. Franz Ferdinand learned of it and demanded his resignation. The Herr Geheimrat, who had long before become a Christian, yielded and accepted the position of ''gouverneur'' of a prominent banking institute which has so intimate relations with the government that its head had to be confirmed by the emperor. Franz Ferdinand liked this still less, but the old kaiser, who with all his faults, was not an anti-Semite, and who, like everyone else in his position, was jealous of his heir, would not brook any interference. So his excellency remained undisturbed in the enjoyment of his position. Finally Francis Joseph died, and the new emperor Carl felt that he owed it to the memory of his martyred uncle to carry out his wishes, and his excellency had to go. The republic, which did away with the prerogatives of the emperor, brought Rudolph Sieghart back into the sanctum of the Bodenkreditanstalt.

More Serious Troubles

The anti-Semites of Vienna, and not they alone, have for months been clamoring for the deportation of the Polish (Galician) Jews who, since the first year of the war, had been living in Vienna as refugees from their homes invaded by the Russian army. It must be admitted that this agitation is not exclusively anti-Semitic in its character. Vienna is a starving and freezing city, facing catastrophe, as no less a man than Mr. Hoover stated in a public appeal. The deportation of the 60,000 —according to some 200,000—Galician Jews may not relieve the housing and feeding problem, but to a starving population they appear as unwelcome sharers in the scanty suppliees. Galicia is an unfriendly country, and when she was compelled to receive the first batch of refugees, she did not return the railroad cars by which they were deported, thus preventing further deportations and compelling the already dislodged exiles to camp in the open air in an unusually cold November week. The appearance of these Galician Jews in their strange garb adds to the irritation, and the latter is already at a high pitch. Arthur Schnitzler's ''Professor Bernhardy,'' a brilliant play, exposing the clerical intrigues in the universities of old Austria, was interrupted by noisy demonstrations, and Arnold Zweig's tragedy, ''Ritualmord,'' in the second edition, ''Die Sendung Semalls,'' taking its theme from the Tisza Eszlar affair, was prohibited. The war has brought a new school of poets to the front, among whom Stefan Zweig will occupy a foremost rank. His tragedy ''Jeremias,'' a war play, is a work of the highest merit, not in the least because it brings home some wholesome truth to the reactionaries who grouped themselves around Franz Ferdinand. The prominence of Jews and the apparent popularity of Jewish themes in poetry do not prevent the constantly growing defections, nor do they relieve the terrible situation of communal life. Professor Kraus writes in the Allgemeine Zeitung des Judentums that the faculty of the Vienna rabbinical seminary is literally starving and the rabbinate sends out an appeal for funds to rebuild the temple which was destroyed by fire nearly three years ago. One would imagine that Vienna has besides the Rothschilds a few more yet unbaptized millionaires, but regardless of the merits of the case, Vienna, passing the hat, might well inspire another Jeremiah to intone the dirge: ''Is this the city that men called . . . . the joy of the whole earth?'' (Lam. 2,15). Poor Schiller would have to revise his verse of the ''lustige Volk der Phaeaken, immer ist's Sonntag, immer dreht am Herd sich der Spiess.'' The fire on the hearth is a luxury in Vienna. Newborn infants and their mothers die in the clinics because there is no coal to prevent them from freezing. What has become of humanity?

White Terror

Colonel Nathan Horowitz, member of the Allies' Commission to Hungary, reported in October that he had found no evidence of any act of violence committed against the Jews upon the order or with the connivance of the Friedrich ministry which followed the administration of Archduke Joseph. The latest authentic reports give us facts about a miniature pogrom in Budapest, Dec. 7, which followed a mass meeting of the reactionary parties and resulted in the destruction of two newspaper buildings with the battle cry: ''Down with the Jews.'' Premier Friedrich himself addressed a crowd in the street, saying that Hungary has no room for alien Jews, and upon the order of his cabinet 30,000 Jews were placed in camps of internment, among them many who long before the war had lived in Hungary and who were in no way connected with the communist movement. The claim that Bela Kun and Tibor Szamuely were Jews is not yet officially sustained. The sensational dispatch of the Associated Press that Szamuely was to be buried in the Jewish cemetery of Wiener Neustadt, is not confirmed in the Vienna papers which report his suicide. Be this as it may, it is a fact that Jews suffered greatly from the communist government. Right from the start Abraham von Freudiger, president of the orthodox, and Francis Szekely, president of the liberal congregation of Budapest, were arrested, and a number of prominent Jews were executed, and the loss suffered by Jewish congregations and charitable institutions through the confiscation of their funds amounts to over 44,000,000 crowns. The political situation of the Jews in northern Hungary seems to be the most complicated of all the new Babels created in Versailles. The Jews of Ungvar who are now made Slovaks, appealed to the French general Hennoques for protection of their educational and religious rights as minorities and against orders to open their stores on Sabbath, to have religious instruction given in the Slovak language which neither teachers nor children understand and against the closing of a Jewish literary society. The general said he knew no Jews but only Slovaks professing various religions, nor had he heard of Jewish literature. When a member of the committee who spoke French referred to the protection of religious and racial minorities, guaranteed in the Treaty of Paris, the general replied there are plenty of stupid things in the treaty, and the Jews are Bolsheviki who have no right to claim protection by law. It is necessary to know that Ungvar has a population, mixed of Magyars, Slovaks and Ruthenians with some Germans thrown in. What are the Jews to be?

The Heroes of the Lower Danube

After the disgraceful collapse of the Roumanian armies which compelled Roumania to sign the treaty of Bucharest (May 7, 1918), the glory of the self-styled descendants of the Scipios and the Caesars was restored. The collapse of the Hungarian soviet government (Aug. 2) gave the Roumanian stategists the needed opportunity of winning laurels by overrunning the helpless Hungarian capital and conquering fortified vaults in banks. They could not be expected to keep the limited rights granted to the Jews in the treaty of Bucharest which was imposed upon them, and having had the experience how their illegal occupation of Budapest was condoned after a paternal admonition to behave in the future, they might just as well sign the treaty which demands of them to grant the rights of minorities, but as far as known they have not done so yet. Meantime we learn that in Bukowina and Transsylvania the Jewish officials, appointed under the Austrian and Hungarian governments respectively, were discharged, that Yiddish letters are not allowed to go through the mail, and that in Braila and Jedinec pogroms took place, in the latter city of 30 Jews arrested, every third man was shot on the charge that one of them had spoken to a Roumanian soldier of liberty.

Industrial Rejuvenation in Palestine

Arise Ye and Let Us Go Up to Zion

Has the time arrived for Jeremiah's call (31,6)? It is difficult to answer. Lord Curzon, the new British secretary of foreign affairs, declared in the House of Lords that he stands on the platform of his predecessor Mr. Balfour. Mr. Benar Law in reply to an interpellation in the House of Commons on the government's policy in Palestine and Syria gave an evasive answer on the ground that the Peace Conference had not decided the question yet. Wladimir Zabotinsky, the Zionist leader, who served in the Palestine Legion in a series of articles published in the Jerusalem press, charges the British government with a policy hostile to the Jews. Max Nordau who after five years of exile in Spain came to England, sees in Balfour's famous promise the only hope for the Jews. This is perhaps the reason that he was not allowed to come to France. Nordau, the merciless critic of the latest moves in Zionism, seems to have become reconciled to a policy of waiting, while Zangwill continues to denounce all temporizing and in particular condemns the postponement of he congress, planned for January in Basel. The trouble seems to lie in the Syrian question. The new era of open door diplomacy has not yet fully mateialized. It seems that Great Britain and France after the collapse of czarist Russia agreed on the division of the Turkish empire so that England should get Palestine and France Syria, and there is a hitch somewhere behind the open door curtains. Prince Feisul, the melodramatic aspirant to the Pan-Arabic empire, declares that the Arabs will never recognize the claim of France, and England is greatly embarrassed because General Allenby is said to have made some promises to the Arabs during the critical stages of his campaign, and a similar embarrassment seems to exist with regard to the Balfour declaration. Heer de Haan, the Palestinian correspondent of the Amsterdam Handlesblad reports that Azef Pasha declared the Arabs will not allow any Jewish immigration. For the present the official British statistics of the census in the land west of the Jordan give the total population as 647,261, of whom there are 65,300 Jews. With the estimated population east of the Jordan the total for Palestine would be 900,000, of whom the Jews form less than 10 percent.

The Ships from Tarshish Bringing Thy Sons from Afar

The Associated Press on Dec. 26 published a piece of news headed ''immigrants swarm into Holy Land.'' The Yiddish press brings occasionally also reports of pilgrims from Poland, in one instance joined by a Catholic girl who wishes to be one of those coming from ''Tarshish, Pul and Lud'' to see God's glory (Isaiah 66,19). Even the Samaritans, the withered branch of Israel, once rejected by Ezra, are trying now to renew their plea. Wilkonski, an agricultural expert from Palestine, arrived recently in this country to study the conditions in California. Banks are opening all over Palestine, automobiles are taking the place of camel and donkey, an oil company was formed, daily, weekly, bi-weekly and monthly papers have sprung up, a film company ''Menorah'' was organized in Palestine. What a pity Jeremiah could not have used it to illustrate his parable of the potter's shop (ch.18). Even a Jewish baseball club was organized, the Jews playing the Arabs but unfortunately being defeated, as could not have been different, since the game was played on Sabbath. In such disregards for the religious sentiment there seems to lie a source of serious trouble, especially as the opposite side takes an uncompromising attitude. Rabbi Kuk who returned to Palestine from London where he had been during the war, issued a ''Herem'' against woman's suffrage, and his view is shared by Chief Rabbi Ritter of Rotterdam. The main difficulty, however, will be the economic question. The census gives us for Jerusalem alone 400 shoemakers, 200 tailors, 150 bricklayers, 200 carpenters, etc. How are 400 shoemakers to live in a country where the people walk barefoot, how are the tailors to live when the Arab patches up the burnus which he inherited from his grandfather, and how shall carpenters and bricklayers find an employment when still a large part of the native population are living in tents. This does not mean to discourage the movement but shows its difficulties.

Communal and Personal Events

The Midrash (Sifre, Deut. 33,17) says that God divided the spiritual and the material power between Moses and Joshua because the world could not exist if both were united in one hand. We had an interesting illustration of this truth. The Union of Orthodox Congregations and the Association of Jewish farmers met at the same time (Nov. 30—Dec. 2). Both are dissatisfied with the success of their cause. The farmers are so prosperous that the Baron de Hirsch Fund is not needed, and the orthodox balk at the victory which their cause had won through the Jewish Theological Seminary. While the convention condemned it only indirectly by indorsing the Rabbinical College (Yizhok Elhonon Yeshibah), the ''Hebrew Standard'' opened its columns to bitter attacks. The I. O. B. B. is here to unite Israelites, and therefore we limit ourselves to the recording of the fact that more orthodoxy is demanded.

News from London

By Our Correspondent Dr Max Epstein

London, Dec. 17, 1919.

We have had an anti-Semitic cloudburst in this country during last month. For some time past a section of the press has been reiterating the groundless accusation that Jews are Bolshevists. During the last few weeks ''The Times'' also took up the cry, at first incidentally, then in its correspondence columns. It should be explained that, for good or evil, the directors of ''The Times'' have espoused the cause of Denikin and Koltchak, and that in consequence they regard events in Russia from this viewpoint. Doubtless machinations are proceeding behind the scenes. For one thing, the Denikin-Koltchak constellation is known to be anti-Semitic in sentiment, and probably ''The Times'' has been infected. For another, the present editor of ''The Times,'' Mr. Wickham Steel, imbibed a goodly portion of anti-Semitism when he was correspondent for his paper in Vienna. Now as ''The Times'' favors Koltchak-Denikin, it is hostile to the Bolshevists. With that attitude we have nothing to do. ''The Times'' can please itself as to its policy. But when hating Bolshevists it uses the Jews as a stick to beat them with, Jews must protest. For weeks past ''The Times'' has published accounts of Bolshevist atrocities in which there were references to Jewish instigators. Gradually the volume of horrors increased until one began to suspect that the records were composed not far from London and did not come from Russia at all. But be that as it may, Jews were always mentioned incidentally, until the thing came to a head when one day ''The Times'' published a letter from an anonymous correspondent who signed himself ''Verax.'' The writer declared he was a friend of the Jews (these gentry always assure you they are), that he was a life-long student of Jewish life and literature, and that he thought the Jews were to blame for Bolshevism. Did not the Law of Moses ordain an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth? Were not the Jews vindicative? Was not the Bolshevist movement run by Jews? Was not Karl Marx a Jew? And so on. Yet though he levelled such serious charges against a whole people, the gentleman did not have the courage to say who he was. It was hinted at in several quarters that ''Verax'' was no other than the editor himself. But of that we know nothing: we repeat the suggestion for what it is worth. The best of it was that the burden of this scandalous letter was that ''Verax'' so loved the Jews that he was greatly concerned lest when the Bolshevists are defeated and their regime ended, the Russian Jews would be massacred in retaliation for the misdeeds of the Bolshevist Jews. What then did he suggest? That the Jewish leaders in this country should publicly proclaim their detestation of the Bolshevists and all their works.

''Verax'' Answered

The letter of ''Verax'' did not remain unanswered. The best reply was given by Mr. Israel Cohen, whose communication was so excellent in every way that we regret lack of space prevents its reproduction in full.

The chief rabbi likewise answered ''Verax'' in a letter which equally deserves wide publicity.

There were a few more letters, then the correspondence ceased. It looks as though Lord Northcliffe, who controls ''The Times,'' had given orders to let the matter drop. But the damage has been done. Many people derive their views on passing events from ''The Times,'' and some among them are inclined to regard the statements of that paper as gospel truth. The effect of the correspondence was to connect Jews with Bolshevists. It is always the case: wherever you have an unpopular movement or personage, anti-Semites will at once declare them to be Jews. A curious illustration of this fact comes from Germany. In Germany Lord Northcliffe himself is one of the best-hated of men, and the German anti-Semites are ready with the suggestion that he is a Jew. In England Lord Northcliffe uses the Bolshevists as a stick to beat the Jews with; in Germany he himself is used as a stick for the same purpose. It shows how hollow is the whole proceeding. But so much remains: Jews are not popular in England just now. However, we will live down the dislike. It is only temporary. At bottom the Englishman has a strongly marked sense of fairness, and he will realize before long how unjust are the accusations leveled against Jews. Besides, not all Englishmen are influenced. Only this week ''The Nation,'' the Liberal weekly, published a long article on this modern ''Hep, Hep'' movement, attacking it by the most effective of weapons —ridicule.

While ''The Times'' controversy was in progress, Jews were also very much to the fore in one of the courts of Justice. A gang of nobodies some time back published a libel on Sir Alfred Mond, declaring that he was a traitor. Sir Alfred sought protection in the law courts, and the case came on for hearing a week or two ago. The defendants attempted to introduce into their pleadings all manner of calumnies against the Jews. But Mr. Justice Darling, while giving them ample latitude, sternly repressed their vile maneuvers. The three men in question appear to be suffering from a mania to the effect that the Jews are attempting to dominate the world in the interests of war; that Jews were Bolshevists; that Judaism was Bolshevism; and that Sir Alfred was one of the group of Jewish international financiers who were at work to bring the world to ruin. A mere recital of their accusations shows how ridiculous they are, and the jury awarded Sir Alfred Mond substantial damages—£5,000. Sir Alfred, it should be stated, is a Minister of the Crown, a member of the Cabinet, and a man whose patriotism has been exhibited in a thousand and one ways. In the eyes of his vulgar accusers his sin is that he is of Jewish origin, and to make matters blacker, that his father was born in Germany. What the Monds have done for the chemical industry of this country is so well known and admired that not a word need be said in their defence. As for Sir Alfred being of Jewish origin, that is perfectly true, and to his honor be it said, Sir Alfred has identified himself with Jews. He is one of the supporters of the Zionist movement and is proud of his Jewish origin. The attack failed, as it deserved to fail; and for the moment muddle-headed fools who raised the cry are silenced. The only question is, who is behind them? Who is financing them? No doubt we shall learn in due course.

Clergymen Praise Jewish Service

It is refreshing to turn from these stupid attacks to the impressions of an Anglican clergyman on the Atonement service. He writes that a study of the ''Machzor'' for that day ''has revealed to him a treasure-house of the most important character.'' Not only the prayers but the congregation impressed the visitor, and, as he says, because ''so large a number of men of all ages, types and, I presume, avocations, had gathered for a service of such an intensely devotional character. Despite the long sustained fact and attendance of many of them their interest and the heartiness with which they joined in the congregational passages aroused my envy. There was plenty of evidence in that building of the greater knowledge of their own religion, scriptures and traditions among your people, than among ours, and of their greater inclination and capacity for devotion. This is not of course in the least to be wondered at in view of the part they have played as the chosen vehicle through which above all others God has revealed Himself to mankind.''

Einstein's Theory Acclaimed

Einstein is receiving a good deal of attention in this country. Learned societies discuss his theories, and the journals vie with each other in publishing particulars about the brilliant man of science. ''The Times'' was fortunate in obtaining from its author an account of the new theory of the Universe, and towards the end of his article Einstein shows that he has a sense of humor. He writes that being famous just now, he is described by ''The Times'' as a Swiss Jew, whereas in Germany he is called a German man of science. ''If I come to be regarded as a bete noire, the descriptions will be reversed, and I shall become a Swiss Jew for the Germans and a German man of science for the English!''

University of Jerusalem

Einstein is an ardent Zionist and keenly interested in the proposed university at Jerusalem, having offered his co-operation in the work there. As regards the university, Prof. Geddes who is at present in Palestine, had some very interesting things to say. ''We hope to begin in 1920, utilizing the old house of the late Sir John Gray-Hill and commencing by adapting all the outbuildings as a research laboratory for chemistry, etc. We are thinking, of course, of future buildings, but no plans are yet ready, as the site has to be carefully resurveyed. The general policy seems to be to begin on a small scale. To gather a few research students first of all seems to be the wisest plan, and then when the university has made a reputation for actual work done, it will soon attract students, even from a distance. The many students from Russia, Poland, etc., who formerly had to go to Germany, Switzerland, or Paris, will come to Jerusalem in increasing numbers for at any rate part of their studies. The first studies, it is hoped, will be research in chemistry (under Dr. Weizmann); then probably physics, botany, bacteriology, etc. It is hoped to introduce other studies as soon as more buildings can be erected. There is also an idea of starting the library in the house.''

Interest in Zionism

There is a growing interest in the Zionist movement here. Mr. Herbert Samuel is a tower of strength, and Dr. Redcliffe Salaman, who has just returned from Palestine, has some very interesting things to tell us. A couple of years ago it would have been inconceivable for a drawing room meeting in the West End of London to have been held in the interests of Zionism. Today this is a common occurrence. The women are active and the men are coming to see possibilities. The growth of the movement is bringing with it an interest in Hebrew as a living language, and in Jewish history. All this is to the good.

Civil and Military Honors

The latest list of Jewish distinctions is the election of another Jew to the presidency of the Union at the University of Oxford. The Union is the students' great debating society, and the man who is elected to preside over its deliberations is sure to be among the most distinguished of his generation, and is marked for a political career. Last term but one Mr. Hore Belisha was president; this term Mr. Constantine Gallop occupies the position. His election is a great personal triumph, and it is good to feel that a Jew has again won this distinction. It is often said that Jews are foremost only in intellectual achievements. This is not true. Given opportunities and they can also make their mark as athletes and soldiers. In Palestine the gymnastic associations are exceedingly strong, and observers on the spot report that some of the younger Jews in Palestine are splendid types of manhood—tall, well-built and strong. (Mr. Gallop himself might well fit into this picture!) But Jews have also won military distinctions. In the British army they have obtained 5 Victoria Crosses (for great bravery on the battle field), 50 Distinguished Service Order Medals, 240 Military Crosses, and 200 Military Medals.

Sir Lionel Abrahams

The Anglo-Jewish Community has to deplore the loss of a distinguished civil servant in the person of Sir Lionel Abrahams. Sir Lionel was a brilliant boy at school, won his way to Oxford, came out top of his year for the civil service examination, and chose the India office as his sphere of work. There his abilities were quickly recognized, and in 1911 he was selected to be Assistant Under-Secretary of State for India. It is well known that but for his delicate health he would most certainly have been made head of the India office. Sir Lionel's strong point was finance, and on all details concerning the financial development of India he was regarded as the best authority. Ever since his student days at Oxford he was interested in Jewish history, and a work of his on ''The Expulsion of the Jews from England'' won the Arnold Prize at Oxford. Sir Lionel was president of the Jewish Historical Society of England during the period 1916-18, and he worked out a plan for research in Anglo-Jewish history which it is hoped will stand as a memorial to his name. He deserves many memorials, for the memorial he might have loved best, his only son, he lost in the war. It is said that the loss was too much for him; it shortened his life; he was only fifty when he died. In communal affairs Sir Lionel always took a middle, moderating position. Recognizing parties, he sought to bring all parties together. Some years ago he sought to bridge the gulf between the Zionists and their opponents in this country, and though his work was not successful, it is not too much to say that the effort was worthy the making, and will in the long run not be without fruit. There are many Jews in the British Civil Service, but unquestionably Sir Lionel Abrahams was the greatest of them all.

REDS AND WHITES

Impenetrable as the veil may be that screens the goings on in eastern Europe, vague as the rumors may be and uncertain the facts, so much stands out in bold relief: our co-religionists find themselves between the devil and the deep sea. Reliable statistics and accurate accounts will not be available until the time of tribulation is past and those that survive have sufficiently recovered breath to gather information from every nook and corner where someone with a retentive memory may furnish the data. Just now the enemies of the Jews raise the cry that the Jewish accounts of the number of killed or plundered is exaggerated—so much noise over a few slain Jews—and the Jews who feel the consequences of the wholesale murder and looting and wilful destruction claim that not half of the misery endured is brought to the world's attention. We may well let the thought penetrate our minds that we are contemporaneous with a chapter in Jewish history such as has not been written since the days of Chmielnicki. Upon the very same soil, as the reds and the whites pass and re-pass the ground and occupy or re-occupy, evacuate or re-evacuate a town or hamlet, where the fathers laid down their lives, there their descendants are ruthlessly, barbarously, inhumanly done to death. The fathers fasted and mourned and their children to today fast and mourn. But the centuries that have intervened have made this difference. Then the fast was genuine; men searched their hearts and confessed their own shortcomings; they would rather stand as sinners than doubt the divine justice; the events were conceived as a "gezerah," a decree of God; God was wroth with His people, and when the cry arose, "Turn away from Thy fierce anger," the tear-stained countenances were upturned to Heaven that mercy might prevail over wrath. Today we fast as a demonstration; we invoke the name of the Deity and really address the potentates of the earth from whom we would fain believe our help must come. The old days and the old faith cannot be brought back. And yet it is the old God who must work deliverance. When the reds torture the Jew we are told that the Allies have no dealings with the soviet government; and when the Ukrainians indulge in pogroms the whites of Petlura or Denikine and the rest of that ilk, again the reply is that there is no stable government there with which to conduct negotiations. The "black hundreds" follow in the wake of the Cossack; it matters not what the color, the Jew is a ready victim. The West is satisfied to see reds and whites and blacks annihilate each other and entertains the hope that somehow order will emerge. Poor consolation for the hapless Jew who, when that order ensues, will have borne the brunt of the combat, with thousands upon thousands of killed, with millions of dollars' worth of property destroyed, and with the surviving remnant reduced to beggary, to dependence upon our charity. The outlook is grave; the task awaiting us staggering. Yet we must not despair. We must keep knocking at the doors of state departments and importune the world's statesmen with our tale of woe; we must look to it that the far-off cry of Israel be heard in the West and in America; we must keep on collecting funds for relief and send out missions to learn the facts on the spot, to bring home to the guilty perpetrators of untold crimes the verdict of humanity, to sustain the suffering and to proffer aid where the spark of life still glimmers. Such is the duty of the hour.

HOME NEEDS

It was but right and proper that America should give of her bounty to the rest of the world and that American Jews should do their utmost to secure adequate funds for financing the relief work among our co-religionists in Europe. But while we stretch out our helping hand to the distant brother, we should not forget our next door neighbor nor be unmindful of our needs at home. Whether charity begins at home or not, is hardly to the point. A well-regulated state has its home office by the side of its foreign department. A well-ordered community must attend to its domestic and internal duties at the same time that it is nobly doing the right thing by those that are far off. So we see in our large centers throughout the land, efforts to obtain the wherewithal for their charitable institutions carried on almost on the top of the "drives" for European relief. In the majority of our cities our charities are now federated. Federation should commend itself not merely on the side of economy; it welds as nothing else will do all the multitudinous agencies for relief, social work and education and imparts to them a common aim and a common direction. We have mentioned education as entering into the purview of a Federated Charities. It has come to our knowledge that in one of our large centers recently, a contributor, and not a very large one, expressed his view that the Federation was concerned with relief and social work pure and simple and that it should refrain from taking in Talmud Torahs, Free Sunday Schools, and the like. Here is the type of the philanthropic Jew in the most objectionable form. According to the notions of suchlike it is the province of the Charities to come to the assistance of a criminal youth or a delinquent girl when the false step has been taken and the mischief done, but it would be wrong to prevent delinquency betimes by taking the boy and girl away from the street, from pernicious associations of all kinds, by allowing them to come in contact with the atmosphere of a religious school where a foundation might be laid for building up a healthy moral frame of mind strong enough to resist temptation. As well one may argue that we should only heal the sick but not seek to prevent sickness, come to the assistance of a tubercular patient when once the dread disease has laid its grip on him but in no way help him in the initial stages of the malady when an efficacious cure may really be attempted. It is a shortsighted view and wasteful. Education is the hygiene of the mind. In the experience of the Jew as of all mankind morality means something only when fostered by religion. Divorce the two, and we shall reap the harvest of that chaos and confusion which begets all those undesirable elements which our government is now straining all its efforts to rid us of. The surest road to anarchy is creating in the minds of the young the notion that the religion of their elders is obsolete. The Church is stepping in and with boldness proclaims that it will carry on conversionist activities, or, in their own language, bring religion to the children of foreigners, so long as we Jews do not bring it to them. The menace to the Jewish community is obvious. Of what avail is it to have all the fine hospitals and the relief offices with their directors and the social settlements with their centers if we suffer our little ones to be taken away from us? Only pure blindness on the part of responsible leaders can remain indifferent to the consequences from which we shall all suffer. And if we need the religious schools, we need the teachers, and the teachers' training school. With immigration at a standstill, we cannot replenish our staffs from those who come from other lands; we must fall back upon the material at home. But these native born teachers must be trained, must be taught the subjects of which they are blissfully ignorant. And then we need the teachers to train the teachers, and that means institutions of higher learning with all the facilities of equipment. The sooner we realize our great domestic problems the better it will be for us. American Jews must before long raise a large Education Fund which will take care of all our educational needs from the highest school to the kindergarten. It is not necessary at all that a physical unity should be established. What we require is simply the creation of that General Fund, to be administered with utmost honesty of purpose and impartiality, for the purpose of helping a struggling institution, or of raising the standard of another, or supplying teachers and placing them, of erecting school bulidings and maintaining them, of creating educational facilities of all kinds where at present none exist. Here is a field for the truly philanthropic, above all for all of us in whom the conviction exists that Jewish education is the foundation of a healthy Jewish community, such as will constitute a constructive element in the American nation of which we are a part.

On the Doorsteps of Thy House

By Dr. Max L. Margolis

We are just now, I believe, beginning to outgrow the iconoclasm of mid-nineteenth century which taught us to lay aside ritualism, symbolism, ceremonialism as unbecoming the Judaism of the modern stamp. We know full well that it was not a religious question pure and simple; it was not the ancient struggle ever new between ritualists and puritans, between those who would worship in stated and stately form and those who made light of all outward expressions of the inner spirit. Back of it was rather the avowed or perhaps the thinly disguised wish to discard all that tended to mark the Jew as a Jew and to reduce the visible expression of Judaism to a minimum. The desire was to show forth Judaism as a religious organization by the side of the multitudinous form of Christianity, the Jewish minister as a teacher of religion with a few different articles of belief, but outwardly very much like a Congregational or Unitarian pastor, and the Jewish layman to all intents and purposes indistinguishable in language, mode of life and social habits from his neighbor. By the aid of intermarriage it was hoped that even inherent racial features and characteristics might in course of time be destroyed. Why should the Jewish home be distinguished, marked off, from any other dwelling in the neighborhood by the encased piece of parchment, though it repeat Israel's watchword through the ages, the confession of the Unity of God?

I remember a certain Saturday when, in the company of my father, after three days of confinement in a Nalevki back yard in Warsaw, when we momentarily expected the onrush of the pogrom makers, I went forth to visit the devastated area, with its looted shops and shattered dwellings. I was attracted by the display over many doors of ikons. What are they for? I asked. I received the reply that the Christians had hastily produced them to mark their dwellings as non-Jewish so that no mistake might be made in including them. It was truly a Passover of the Lord, when the messenger of destruction passed over the houses of Christians. They showed color to save their skins. But showing color is normally considered a manly act. We hear it so often told and we may ourselves have been guilty at times, and we should in shame tell it of ourselves that on occasions we failed to identify ourselves—to show color.

I build or buy a house. I am ritualist enough to feel that I ought to express my gratitude to God visibly. All sorts of forms of initiations used to obtain in former times, some unutterably cruel and barbarous. Here I am bidden to render thanks unto God by revealing that I belong to Him, that I have accepted Him, that I am of the people of His election. That little encased parchment will not mar the beauty of my dwelling. It will not harm me. My child will be nicknamed a Jew-child and my household a Jew-household whether I display the sign or not. I am not of the superstitious kind. I fear no ghosts. I do not believe that the parchment is an amulet and will ward off disease or misfortune or death. Even if the religious side of the contents should not appeal to me, as assuredly it does, I look upon it as a sign, open and above board, that I show color, that I am manly.

It is a symbol to me of much that I hold or ought to hold valuable. My home shall be a Jewish island in the sea of non-Jewish environment. Abroad, perforce, I must often be indistinguishable from others. I must join in the life about me. I am a citizen among citizens. I have public duties to perform. My mind is surcharged with things remote from Judaism. But my home is my castle. There I am free to live my own life, to follow my own tastes and habits, to train my children in the way I wish them to go, to be a full Jew to the utmost of my ability. The factory and office are for work; the home is for rest. Rest means peace with one's innermost self. And that innermost self immerged in the subconscious realm of my thought is but the net result of the mental workings and habits of a long line of ancestors. Individualism misconceived is the mad pursuit of personal whims. The right kind of individualism is being true to the lifeblood that runs in my veins, which is not of my own making. My home must be a little sanctuary, erected not to the idol itself, but to the God who revealed Himself to one whom I am proud to call my first ancestor. In this home my children are to grow up. I shall try to the best of my ability to make them comfortable. I surround them with things beautiful that their tastes may be refined. I create for them the atmosphere that shall keep them loyal to their heritage. If object lessons are more potent than abstractions,

Anti-Defamation League Renews Campaign Against Study of Merchant of Venice in Grade and High Schools. Opportunity for Lodges to Do Effective Work

COMMUNICATION

To the Lodges:

If you have not already filled out the Merchant of Venice questionnaire recently sent you, please do so at the earliest possible date and mail it to Leon L. Lewis, Executive Secretary, Anti-Defamation League, 1228 Tribune Bldg., Chicago, Illinois.

ADMINISTRATIVE COMMITTEE.

FOR nearly seven years the Anti-Defamation League has been quietly carrying on a campaign against the use of text books likely to arouse or increase religious, class or racial prejudice. The campaign has covered the entire field of textbooks. From time to time reports have been published in this paper describing progress made, but in accordance with the well defined policy of the League, no publicity has been sought in the daily press.

During the war the necessity of coping with more dangerous forms of defamation caused the temporary abandonment of the educational work and it is only within the past few months that the League has given renewed attention to the use of objectionable school books. As the previous activities of the League in this field dealt with the use of "The Merchant of Venice" in the grade and high schools, and as remarkable success had crowned its efforts in a large number of cities, a new campaign was commenced centering in those cities not previously investigated. Questionnaires have been sent to all Lodges of the Order in the United States requesting information, and direct communication has been secured with Superintendents of Schools and School Boards in cities and towns all over the country. Hardly a week passed before results began to be achieved and to date more than thirty school boards have taken favorable action or have the matter pending. Once informed that the study of the play was no longer a requisite for entrance to our colleges and other institutions of higher learning, the League's arguments were given due weight, and the most sympathetic consideration. The movement is rapidly gaining headway and the complete exclusion of the study of this play from the public school curriculum of all our cities is now only a matter of time and proper attention.

Not a College Requirement

The success of the League in inducing the College Entrance Examination Board to remove the study of the play from the list of pre-requisites is mainly responsible for the ease with which the situation is now being handled. Little argument was necessary as the men composing that Board were sufficiently informed on child psychology and on the play itself to appreciate its inherent danger and injustice. As trained psychologists, they have long been familiar with the lasting power of first impressions. Most of them guard zealously the sacred trust placed upon them—the waxen tablet of the child mind, bearing little impress when placed in their keeping, but capable of receiving any and of being molded into any shape. Were all teachers of English in our schools equally broad and well informed, if all teachers were themselves unaffected by the insidious germs of prejudice sown in their youth by Sunday School catechisms and narrow-minded bigots, there would be no need for any action—the "Merchant of Venice" might then become a most forceful lesson of tolerance. Instead of being held up as a typical example of a race stigmatized as vengeful, bloodthirsty and pitiless, Shylock would take his place in literature and current thought as one of the great mass of human beings, Christians and Jews alike, who resent insults, who love when loved, who hate when hated, and who seek revenge commensurate with the intensity of their individual passions. Most Jews have learned through bitter experience that they must suffer as a people for the delinquencies of individual Jews, not merely of our present day and generation, but of all history. Riah's plaint in Dickens' "Our Mutual Friend" is instinctively the plaint of every Jew of an analytical mind. Some of our non-Jewish educators realize the anomaly of such a condition, and appreciating, as they do, the impossibility of youngsters possessing the proper perspective, they have been as anxious as is the League to protect the children from false concepts and narrowing prejudices.

Recent Press Comments

Recently considerable publicity has been given in the daily press to the League's efforts to secure the discontinuance of the play in Newark, N. J.; why, it is hard to understand, as more than a dozen school boards had, within the month preceding, quietly and without journalistic acclaim dropped the play from the school curriculum. Whatever the reason may be, the fact is that for about ten days a wave of editorials, news items and facetious articles swept its way across the press of the country and rippled through the columns of most of the Jewish periodicals.

Most of the public press gave sympathetic attention to the Newark episode, though the editorials in some of the papers, to be sure, showed a misunderstanding of our action. They assumed what some of our co-religionists have assumed—that the League's action was prompted by a solicitude for the feelings of those overly self-conscious and sensitive Jews, who shudder when they hear the word Jew uttered in a non-Jewish environment, who construct a kind of camouflage to avoid detection, and whose misguided though well-meant zealousness is at times the cause of much embarrassment to the League.

As a news matter, agitation against the Merchant of Venice is, for the Jewish press at least, an old story. The leading Jewish periodicals have been supporting the League for years in this as well as in its other functions.

With the exception of one open letter sent to a prominent Jewish paper, in which the writer, a learned, sincere member of our faith, erred only in his lack of familiarity with the principles which have consistently governed all the activities of the League, all the Jewish press gave enthusiastic support to the campaign which the League is carrying on.

Shortage of Competent Teachers

The writer referred to stated the crux of the situation so well that we are glad to quote in part from his letter: "One essential," he says, "is necessary, which is required in all courses of literature study; the guidance of an efficient teacher, with the ability to interpret aright the poem, essay or play under treatment." Admitted—but are such teachers easily found, especially in our grade schools where the teacher's pay is not as large as the sum demanded by her mother's maid (washing not included); are the efficient teachers the older pupils who are forced to teach the others because our taxpayers evidently value education less than a boulevard link? Suppose your teachers are all in fact efficient—is efficiency necessarily inconsistent with prejudice? And however efficient and liberal a teacher may be is it easy for her to explain away the editor's introductions and footnotes, written in scholastic vein by college professors of English, which in most instances misinterpret the character of the Jew and the principles of the Jewish religion?

"Interpretations" of the Drama

It may be said that as much, if not more harm is done by these "interpretations" as by the lines of the play itself.

Shylock in a superb speech of wild wrath, pleading his claim to some show of justice, cries out: "Hath not a Jew eyes? Hath not a Jew hands, organs, dimensions, senses, affections, passions; fed with the same food, hurt with the same weapons, subject to the same diseases, healed by the same means, warmed and cooled by the same winter and summer, as a Christian is? If you prick us do we not bleed? If you tickle us do we not laugh? If you poison us do we not die? And if you wrong us, shall we not revenge? The villainy you teach me I will execute." Was Shakespeare trying to do aught but show the common humanity of Jew and non-Jew? Certainly he did not mean that revenge finds no place in non-Jewish practice. In a day when Jews were as scarce in England as white men in Patagonia, such an explanation was essential to an ignorant, superstitious populace fed by Marlowe and other fifteenth and sixteenth century writers; and still was better understood than by some of our modern commentators. The deduction drawn by a learned professor of English from this noble passage in his "Notes and Comments" in a text used in many grade and high schools, is that "In this speech we have a wonderful picture both of the injustice from which the Jews suffer and of the faults in their own character, . . . deep concentrated malignity."

"How shalt thou hope for mercy, rendering none?" demands the Duke, and Shylock responds, naively: "What judgment shall I dread, doing no wrong?" The same learned professor of English whom we quote above comments: "In these two short lines, Shakespeare contrasts with masterly skill two rival ideas of life, the Jewish and the Christian. The Jewish idea is that we have certain laws, those of God and those of men, which we must keep; there our duty begins and ends. If we have kept these laws we need fear no judgment. The Christian idea is that 'all have sinned and come short of the glory of God' and that all must 'be merciful that ye may obtain mercy.'" Is it meet and proper that the misteachings of the Sunday School on the Crucifixion should be supplemented in our public schools by such pseudo-religious bungling? How profound is the learning of the efficient, liberal teacher on Old Testament and Talmudic subjects? What training has she had to explain that the doctrine of brotherly love and of mercy antedates Jesus in Jewish teaching by thousands of years, and that the "eye for an eye" doctrine is the foundation stone of all jurisprudence, Roman, Moslem and Christian?

Surely the child is not encouraged to practice the so-called Christian doctrine of brotherly love when Shylock cries out: "I hate him for he is a Christian," or when Launcelot Gobbo voices the pogromists' slogan: "The Jew is a kind of devil; . . . certainly the Jew is the very devil incarnation"; or in the remarks of Salanio, "Here comes another of the tribe; a third cannot be matched unless the devil himself turns Jew." The efficient, liberal teacher will have considerable difficulty in explaining away the misinterpretation of the learned professor of English when the child studies the syntax of the following choice passages: Shylock: "I'll go in hate to feed upon the prodigal Christian." The Duke: "A stony adversary, an inhuman wretch uncapable of pity, void and empty from any dram of mercy." Antonio: "You may as well do anything most hard, as seek to soften that—than which what's harder—his Jewish heart." Gratiano: "Harsh Jew—thou mak'st thy knife keen; but no metal can, no, not the hangman's axe, bear half the keenness of thy sharp envy. . . . Oh, be thou damned, inexecrable Jew! . . . Entreat some power to change this curish Jew."

What more need be said? Only this—that the work will go on, that hundreds of cities are still using the edition from which we have quoted above, that many other cities are using editions equally misleading and injurious, and that in all these cities an appeal is being made to the fairness of the school boards and school principals. As this paper goes to press, reports of favorable action come in from Youngstown, Ohio, from Colorado Springs, where in addition to taking the play out of the curriculum, the textbooks have been recalled by the School Board; from Huntington, W. Va.; from Keokuk, Iowa, and Kingston, N. Y.

Substitute Texts

Loss of "The Merchant of Venice," however, need not mean a lowering of the curriculum. There are plenty of other plays by Shakespeare that can be substituted for it. Not all of his plays are adapted for school use, but it is not hard from the long list to choose one that is suitable. "A Midsummer Night's Dream," with its wealth of fun and poetic fancy always appeals to young people; or if educators feel that its characterizations do not equal those of the "Merchant of Venice," there are the historical drama, "Henry V," with its portrayal of "the most kingly king in literature"; the tragedy of King Lear, or two of the supreme works of poetry, the romances, "The Tempest" and "The Winter's Tale." Ben Jonson tells us that "Sweet Will" never did anyone harm—surely he would deprecate the choice of his "Merchant of Venice" were he here today and saw it used as a textbook in our schools.

Our Special Correspondent Describes the Sufferings of Our Coreligionists in Vienna; B'nai Brith Activities

A YEAR has passed since the Armistice—since the hatchet has been buried—but what is the condition of our people. A depression of spirit has been effected such as never was experienced after any other war which history records. Aside from the fact that with the exception of a few war-profiteers, practically all of our citizens have suffered great financial losses, and have to put their standard of living on a far lower plane, there is no home, no family, which does not mourn the recent loss of one of its dear ones.

Mourning and sorrow have entered our homes. It will require years before time will have effected a partial cure, before the wounds which the war has inflicted upon all hearts will have been healed. Our hopes for a speedy improvement were in vain. Fortunately, the war is over and our worries for our relatives have ended, but we have not in any way partaken of the blessings of peace. On the contrary, we have never experienced times such as these. Famine and want are felt everywhere. We cannot place our thoughts upon a higher plane, because the lack of life's barest necessities is always paramount. No ray of hope illuminates our dreary existence.

Who can doubt that the criminal instincts of the masses can embolden them to poison all social life? Whoever is familiar with the history of our people knows that in all similar cases the Jews have always been the first upon whose shoulders the blame for national misfortune has been placed, that our forefathers have always been made responsible whenever and wherever misfortune befell mankind. Unfortunately, the majority of our co-religionists have not yet learned the psychology of the non-Jew. There still remain many Jews who do not know or who do not care to know that the wrong done by one Jew is charged to all, that for every immoral act of one all Jews are held responsible. In our community of Vienna, the all-too-large capital of a country grown small and entirely dependent on foreign countries, this has been brought home to us. The great majority of the war profiteers, the unscrupulous, the gamblers, are undoubtedly non-Jews, but it does not occur to anyone to hold Christianity responsible for it. How different, however, are the newspaper articles, how different the voice of the people, when a few of these unscrupulous people bear Jewish names. Then it is not said that "So-and-so is immoral and takes advantage of his fellow-citizens' sufferings." No, instead, immediately one reads, "All Jews are depraved; they are the parasites who suck the blood from their fellow-countrymen."

In spite of the fact that the Socialists have come into power, anti-Semitism has not disappeared and makes itself felt, particularly in the case of the eastern Jews. Where can this lead when the illiterate masses, grown desperate with famine and cold, are taught that the cause of all evil is the Jew?

The so-called middle classes suffer the most. The manual laborer, coaxed by exorbitant wages, is not forced to meet those expenses which the officials or the professors must meet in order to keep up the external appearances which their respective positions require. The laborer is far better off than his neighbor who lives by the product of his brain. A good story was recently published in a Vienna daily: A professor came to his shoemaker at 9 o'clock one morning to have his shoes repaired and found the shoemaker at his quite luxurious morning luncheon. Quite jealously, he said, "I am not as prosperous as you, my friend; I cannot allow myself a lunch like that," and received the following reply: "You should have learned something!"

The middle class is the most pitiable victim of the war; their carefully hoarded savings are gone, they are hungry, cold, have no clothing, are unable to help themselves, and have resigned themselves to their sad fate. Whom does it bother that his heart is breaking when he sees his wife and children starving? Everyone thinks of himself first; who has any sympathy for the unfortunate ones? The war has humbled us but it has not broken our spirit. We hope that the time is not far distant when the dawn of a better day will come even for us, when those peoples whom the war separated will again measure their strength in the peaceful contests of industry and will again take up their work where the thread was cut by the gruesome hand of war. Work is what we need, and he who can furnish it to us will become our savior.

It can be readily understood that such circumstances must have their ruinous effect even on the Jewish community. Most of the charitable institutions have become practically bankrupt. Many of these owe their existence to individual philanthropists, who have long since passed away, and who endowed these institution with what was at the time considered an abundance. Today, these institutions have a hard time eking out a bare existence, and others, and these comprise the majority, have become a burden on the congregation. When one considers that all expenditures have increased enormously, and that our income, in view of the poverty of our membership, cannot be enlarged, one can readily picture our old congregations' sad financial condition.

Here, as elsewhere, we find those who attribute this sad condition to the present officers of the congregation, and the call for new men is sounded louder than ever. The election of officers will take place soon, possibly this winter.

The Jews of Vienna are divided into two bitterly antagonistic groups. The one is called the Jewish-National party, in whose ranks stand the younger generation, who for the most part are not contributing members of the congregation, and do not help carry its burdens; the other comprises all those who do not wish to be carried in the Jewish Register. The latter bear the greater part of the congregation's financial burdens. Although the election of officers has not yet been held, the campaign has already started. Unfortunately, the methods used are not always sportsmanlike. Here the power of our B'nai B'rith Order to arbitrate becomes again evident. It establishes the platform on which all parties work together in the interests of Judaism; in its ranks all party lines are removed, and differences of opinion are discussed in a brotherly spirit. The pleasant atmosphere which prevails at our debates tends to temper partisanship and allows us to hope that it may yet become possible to bridge the gap between the opposing factions.

The seriousness of the present time shows us plainly that we must bend our efforts to place the Order, even here in Vienna, on a more democratic basis, that we must carry on a more active propaganda to increase our membership. There are still too many Jews who, from a point of view of a higher social plane, are either indifferent to the interests of the Jewish community or carry on their altruistic work outside our circle. To play ostrich politics today is utterly impossible and a strong union is more imperative than ever before. The political upheaval has wrought quite a change in our old district. The nine lodges in the Czecho-Slovakian Republic now form District X. Those in Poland are still hanging fire, while the "Orient" lodge, belonging to Rumania, will have to join District IX. In old Austria only the two Vienna lodges remain, the "Wien" and the "Eintracht," which placed themselves directly under the Executive Committee. At the suggestion of the Brother Secretary of the Order, who has just visited Vienna, a provisional General Committee was established, with Brother Ex-Grand President Professor Ehrman president, Brother Ex-President Dr. Edmund Kohn vice-president, Dr. Direktor Hecht secretary, and Dr. Schnabel trustee.

If in the past the visit of the Secretary of the Order, Mr. A. B. Seelenfreund, was an auspicious event, he surely was doubly welcome this time. In these trying times his presence was of immeasurable value to us. The meetings at which he assisted filled all who were present with enthusiasm. His plain, sympathetic spirit, coupled with an intimate knowledge of the activities of the Order, made a lasting impression on everyone. He spared no effort to serve the Order. In spite of the difficulties of a trip to Czecho-Slovakia he went with us to Karlsbad to take personal part in the twenty-fifth anniversary celebration of the grand lodge there. In a splendid address he pointed out the importance of the Order for our district, and was able to hold the attention of his audience for over an hour. His words were greatly appreciated. Everyone left that meeting strengthened and exalted, with the wish in his heart that our Brother Secretary of the Order might everywhere win the hearts of his listeners as he won ours.

Upon his return to Vienna he laid the foundation for new lodges, and a new district, which is to be Number XII. To carry out his wishes became our most eager effort. We applied ourselves with youthful energy, and became successful in a very short time.

With 37 of the most capable men of the best social standing, we have founded a new lodge, the "Wahrheit," and hope to found a fourth lodge in a short time, composed of the erstwhile Junior Order. If in Vienna we have always laid more stress on the quality of the brothers rather than on numbers, it is probable that there is always in Vienna a large supply from which worthy members of our Order can be drawn, and this shall become our next problem.

The inauguration of the "Wahrheit" took place in impressive style on the 16th of November in the presence of a large number of brothers and delegates of other lodges.

Brother Grand President Professor Ehrman, in a brilliant address, explained the purposes, ideals, and efforts of our Order to the members-elect. With rapt attention his audience listened to him, and at the end of his address expressed in an inspired manner their willingness to enter our Order.

The explanation of the symbols was given by Brother Vice-President Dr. Edmund Kohn, who understood how to cover this part of the inauguration, which generally is handled as unimportant and makes little impression, in such a manner as to hold his audience's complete attention throughout.

Brother Grand President then conducted the election of officers, inaugurated the latter into their offices according to the ritual, with heartfelt words of welcome, and then handed the countersign to the new president, Brother Dr. Laub. Brother Dr. Laub thereupon took over the chair, thanked Brothers Grand President and Vice-President for their efforts in the founding of the new lodge, and promised faithful fulfillment of duty in the name of all the members of the "Wahrheit."

The entire ritual took place in the presence of more than three hundred brothers, and the lodge hall was much too small to hold all who came to witness this great ceremony. Both Vienna lodges sent many delegates, and in addition the lodges of Czecho-Slovakia, as well as those of Moravia, Silesia, and Solidaritat were represented. The Grand Lodge of Germany, as well as the former District X, sent written congratulations.

At the conclusion of the inauguration ceremony a banquet united more than two hundred brothers in perfect harmony. The banquet was splendidly arranged, well spiced with clever speeches, and passed all too quickly.

The sixteenth of November will always be a memorable date for all those who took part in the ceremony, and a day of honor for the newly founded lodge "Wahrheit" and the entire District XII.

From the report which will soon be forwarded to the President of the Order, and which will contain a comprehensive account of the useful work done by our order, it will be readily understood what a huge work we have performed; how we endeavored to do our duty to the Fatherland, and how earnestly we endeavored to lessen the evil wrought by the war. True to our motto, we tried to ameliorate the suffering of the poor and needy, to be helpful to the victims of the persecution and to protect widows and orphans.

We did our best with all our power to help these unfortunates. We created institutions, which proved highly beneficial for their welfare. We carried the name of our Order into new spheres and exalted it not only among our coreligionists but also among all our fellow-citizens.

Attention

Complaints have been received that hospitality, even to the extent of admission into Lodge meetings, is being extended to persons who are not members of the Order or who have been suspended. This practice is subversive of the discipline which should exist in the Lodges and which is so necessary for their welfare.

The presentation of traveling cards or certificates of membership should be demanded even of members who are well known in the cities they visit.

Will Ask $10,000,000 for Palestine

Ten million dollars is the minimum which the Zionist Organization of America will endeavor to raise in this country beginning Jan. 18, by an appeal to Jews and non-Jews alike, for the purchase of large tracts of land in Palestine and the preparation of the country in every way for the masses of Jews who, according to authoritative reports, are eager to migrate thither from Russia, Poland, Galicia, Roumania and other pogrom-ridden countries of Eastern Europe. The mass-desire on the part of the Jews to escape to Palestine from lands of persecution everywhere, before that country is prepared to receive them, is so intense as to make the task of restraining the impending immigration a most difficult problem for the Zionist Organization.

In a statement issued recently, the Executive Committee of the Zionist Organization of America announced that it has every reason for confidence that Great Britain will assume the mandate over Palestine for the specific purpose of establishing there a national homeland for the Jewish people. This purpose was announced by Great Britain on Nov. 2, 1917, in what is known as the ‘‘Balfour Declaration’’ and was reiterated on Nov. 2 of this year by Lord Curzon, the present British Foreign Secretary, who stated that the policy of Great Britain toward Palestine as announced two years ago by the Rt. Hon. Arthur J. Balfour remains unhanged. The Zionist Organization of America feels, in view of Lord Curzon's statement, and the fact that the treaty with Turkey is to be taken up by the Allies at an early date, that the time has arrived for beginning a program f construction and reconstruction in Palestine. This program includes not nly the acquirement of large tracts of and, but also water conservation and he development of water power; saniation and drainage in cities and owns; irrigation, afforestation, survey and development of natural resources nd the establishment of technical aboratories for agricultural purposes.

Large sums will also be needed for he maintenance and development of work already launched in Palestine by he Zionists. These include a school ystem ranging from kindergartens to a University, loans to agricultural and ndustrial organizations and groups, reabilitation of Jewish colonies devasated during the war, maintenance of he American Zionist Medical Unit, ts three hospitals and two nurses' raining schools, an anti-malaria camaign, and improvement in the housing onditions of Jerusalem, Jaffa and ther cities. Other items to be met by his fund include the care of Jewish egionaires and their dependents; suplies for hospitals and institutions in Palestine, and a Palestine information ureau as well as the maintenance and dministration of the Zionist Organizaon through which these enormous tasks re to be carried out.

All of the resources of the Zionist istricts in the United States will be tilized for the purpose of this camaign, which will be conducted by a naional committee headed by Judge ulian W. Mack.

New Jewish Newspaper in France

A new Jewish newspaper written in rench is shortly to appear in France nder the editorship of Messrs. Winaver, Blank and Goldstein, the chief aim f which publication will be the destrucion of the fallacy about Jewish Bolhevism.

New Lodges Organized in Breslau and Frankfort; Anti-Semitism in Germany

FOR the first time since the war the resolution passed to celebrate B'nai B'rith Day in solemn manner was carried into effect. The idea found a lively echo in all lodges of the district.

The districts in the United States will be especially interested to learn that the leading feature on this occasion was the history of the foundation of the Order in America. The details of the celebration were left to the discretion of the individual lodges, in order that none should be limited in its activity. Thus, sufficient latitude was allowed to hold the celebration in any form from the simplest to the most elaborate.

The lodge paper was published in a festal garb as a special number for B. B. Day. The cover showed within an artistic border, the picture of the home of the Berlin lodges, and as an illustration to the text of an essay on Fraternal Duties and Private Interests, the frieze ‘‘An Older Brother Introducing a Young Candidate,’’ which adorns the outer walls of the Berlin lodge building.

The special number contains the following papers:

‘‘B'nai B'rith Day,’’ by Dr. Alfred Goldschmidt; ‘‘The Early Days of Our Order,’’ by Prof. M. Brann, Breslau; ‘‘Fraternal Duties and Private Interests,’’ by Ignatz Walsch, Breslau; ‘‘Social Service,’’ by Dr. Nathan Stein, Karlsruhe; ‘‘The Newly Established Institution of the Order,’’ by Dr. G. Ollendorff Barmen; ‘‘The Organization of Trained Nurses and Its Development,’’ by Dr. Josef Hirsch, Berlin; ‘‘The Woman Question in the Order,’’ by Mrs. Ernestine Eschelbacher.

The donations solicited on B. B. Day were mainly devoted to making the trained nurses' organization financially independent. The amount of donations received shall be published when the collection shall have been closed, and even now the definite hope can be expressed that the plan of making the trained nurses' organization financially independent will be successfully carried out. The institution of trained nurses is steadily spreading. Should such independence not be realized the budget of the district grand lodge would be overburdened. On the other hand, it is impossible to interrupt the work, for a standstill would mean retrogression.

In view of the losses which the German district has sustained and probably is going to sustain in the future, we derive some consolation from the establishment of two new lodges. In Breslau, a second lodge, nomed Heinrich Graetz Lodge, in honor of the Jewish historian, the late Professor Heinrich Graetz, of Breslau, was established. District Grand President Timendorfer officiated at the solemn installation.

A second lodge will be established, Dec. 14, in Frankfurt-on-the-Main, named Hermann Cohen Lodge, in honor of the illustrious philosopher, Professor Hermann Cohen.

Among the questions which require the activity of the grand lodge at this moment the care for the refugees from eastern Europe must occupy the first place. The condition of the Jews in that section has been very unfavorably influenced by the political situation, and we must anticipate a heavy emigration. Conditions in Germany are so difficult that only a small fraction of the refugees could find a home in Germany. Germany, however, will occupy an important position as a way station, and it might happen that many refugees would try to make this way station a home, a step which would not be to their own interest. The whole question of the care of the Jews of eastern Europe is still in an embryonic stage. All large Jewish organizations are earnestly attempting the solution of this problem. In addition to the existing organiazitons, a Jewish emigration organization, which is to study the question with particular interest, has lately been established. The older Jewish organizations are opposed to the establishment of a new one, which is bound to complicate the work by competition. It, therefore, will be the next task before us to arrange the activity of the new organization in such a way that it can be co-ordinated with the older institutions. From present appearances it looks as if the new organization also realizes the necessity of co-operation.

The anti-Semitic agitation in Germany resulted in a systematic campaign of vilification against the order, which was carried on by a considerable number of anti-Semitic papers. These papers are charging the order with disloyalty and accuse it of having carried on anti-German propaganda during the war. The executive council at first considered it best to ignore this agitation, not wishing to involve the order in a sensational lawsuit. Since then the campaign of slander has been systematically carried on in a constantly growing number of papers, which induced the order to institute action in libel against one paper, the Munich ‘‘Beobachter.’’ the home, which is the best of schools, must objectify its particular point of view. An objectified Judaism, palpable, tangible, visible, cannot but be of the ritualistic kind. There must be prayers at stated times. There must be Bible readings. There must be stories from the Jewish past. In the Jewish home there must be Jewish books. The child in tender years must know that that book is a Bible, just as that other book is a Longfellow. And when it grows older, it must be made familiar with the shelf on which Graetz is placed. The Sabbath lamp and the Hanukkah candleshick must be there. I know of no other way, and certainly no better way, in which Judaism may be imparted, made to be ingrained in body and soul. And for one thing, I would banish all the catechisms from my household. None can match in potency with the visible symbol.

The Jewish home once upon a time stood for purity. Alas, it stands no more so. Look about in the divorce courts. The Jewish home which consciously differentiates itself by the outward symbol upon the doorpost should perpetuate the old Jewish virtues of chastity, of purity, of conjugal and filial love. The American home is considered to belong to the feminine part of the household, to one's wife and daughters. Let the Jewish home be known to belong to the Jewish mother and to the Jewish daughter. Let the symbol upon the doorpost be a sign that frivolity must be banished from the Jewish household, and that the household means to live in obedience to God's law, to accept the ‘‘yoke of God's Sovereignty,’’ which is indeed what the sign upon the doorpost imposes.

Relief to Vienna

Thousands of Jewish refugees from France, England, Belgium, Galicia, Bukowina and Palestine, are stranded in Vienna, suffering for want of clothing, shelter, food and facilities for return to their own countries, according to a report from the Vienna branch of the Joint Distribution Committee to the International Headquarters of the organization, made public today. The refugees include former soldiers unable to return to their homes upon demobilization because of the war between Poles and Ukrainians in Galicia, students and professional men marooned in Vienna, where they had sought refuge during the war, and hundreds of war orphans, whose parents were refugees who had died in Austria.

The report stated that 15,680 persons had been aided by the Joint Distribution Committee in three months. Regular allowances were given to all aged persons, wives of war prisoners, widows and orphans, professional men and teachers. Two meals are served daily to needy students and others are fed at soup kitchens.

Special care has been given to more than 2,000 sick persons. This includes free hospital care, the establishment of a free clinic, free medicine, eggs and milk. In order to care for hundreds of orphans, the Joint Distribution Committee subventions several orphan asylums. The organization has also under its care twenty-three deaf-mute children.

‘‘Perhaps the most interesting and constructive activity conducted by the Joint Distribution Committee in Austria,’’ the report states, ‘‘is the work with the children who, weakened by hardships, undernourishment and exposure, require special attention to build them up physically. Through the Jewish National Council of Austria, the Joint Distribution Committee arranged to have various organizations and private families in Holland, Switzerland and Denmark undertake to care for weak and aenemic children sent to them to recuperate. Vienna Branch of the Joint Distribution Committee bought clothing and equipment for every child and paid its transportation to and from the vacation place. 1,450 children were thus sent for special outings. In addition to these, a number of the weakest children were sent to Trieste and neighboring localities where they were cared for in private households. Here, too, their clothing, equipment and transportation was paid for by the Joint Distribution Committee. 120 children were maintained at the Sanitarium at Ancarano and 40 at the ‘Ospizio Marion' at Valdeltra.’’

In addition, the Joint Distribution Committee co-operates in providing free lodging at the Home for Jewish Workers to unemployed Jewish refugees and workers and apprentices whose scanty wages do not enable them to pay rent. The report also stated that more than 500,000 pounds of salted Kosher meat sent from this country, has just been received for distribution in Vienna.

The Vienna Committee is also exerting its efforts toward repatriation of the refugees and is already succeeding in restoring a large number, including a group of Palestinian refugees to their homes.

$50,000 for Children in Hungary

A contribution of $50,000 to the American relief administration's European Children's Fund, of which Herbert Hoover is chairman, has been made by the Joint Distribution Committee of American Funds for Jewish War Sufferers. This contribution is to feed and clothe the children in Hungary, particularly children of Jewish faith.

My Impressions Abroad

The Jew is in a very precarious position, no matter what happens he is held responsible. If he is rich his property is confiscated; if he is poor he is considered a Bolshevik.

During the German occupation I was informed that, in spite of the suffering they had to endure because of the military despotism, nevertheless, they were happy in the fact that the entire population was treated alike, be he Jew or Gentile, but this is not the case now. Prior to the Polish control there were many Jews in the employ of the railroads. From Grodno alone five hundred young men were so employed, but now there is not a single Jew in such employ, and very few, if any, in the service of the government.

During the Russian regime the government was against the Jewish people, but now it is both the government and the people. Many prominent business men have informed me that in order to continue business with the Polish people it is necssary to employ Polish men and women in the various business houses, no matter how small, in order to overcome the prejudice that exists.

Throughout Poland there exists an undercurrent of hostility against the Jew. This was very noticeable in the cafes, on the streets, and the hostile songs of the soldiers.

I have been advised on good authority, that even former Premier Paderewski had anti-Semitic tendencies, having formerly published a newspaper in Warsaw called "Dwai Grossa," which advocated hostility to the Jew.

The old men and women have given up all hopes and have lost all ambition, and they feel that the salvation of the future lies solely with the young generation. Everyone was anxious to leave Poland, and I believe when the immigration ban is lifted there will be a great influx to this country.

We, in America, ought indeed to be thankful that we have the opportunity to render aid to these our unfortunate people and we must continue to labor incessantly for the great cause by raising the money necessary to keep alive the sufferers so as to give them an opportunity to get on their feet again.

Poland has very serious problems now. Industry is crippled because of lack of machinery, which has been removed by the Germans; industrial depression, because the business that was formerly done with Russia is now at a standstill; combating the German influence on one side and the Bolsheviki tendencies on the other; the hazards of a new and inexperienced government, together with all the suffering that exists, makes it a series of complex problems that can only be solved in due course of time under able leadership and proper cooperation. Only by tolerance, justice and equality, can the nation rise in the eyes of the world as a great power, and we all hope and pray that she will not miss this wonderful opportunity.

Detroit, Mich.

A very interesting lecture was delivered on January 5 at Temple Beth El, under the auspices of Pisgah Lodge, by Dr. Leon Harrison on the subect, "The Gospel of Labor.' The address, which is the third in the lecture series arranged under the directorship of Dr. Samuel S. Mayerberg, Chairman of the Intellectual Advancement Committee, was offered to the public free of charge through the generosity of the individual members of Pisgah Lodge, who are paying the expense incurred through the purchase of course tickets.

Other addresses will be delivered by Honorable Abram J. Elkus, Associate Judge of the New York Court of Appeals, and Rabbi Abba Hillel Silver.

Pisgah Lodge held its election of officers on December 29.

Free Farming Course to Open

The attention of young men, desiring to take up the study of agriculture, is directed to The National Farm School, in Bucks County, Pennsylvania, near Philadelphia, a school which was founded over twenty-two years ago, and which stands today as a pioneer in a method of agricultural education that is being wisely heralded as the type that will ultimately replace all other kinds of similar education. The National Farm School lays stress on the education of the hand, as well as of the head. It gives its students an opportunity to do things, as well as to read how they are done. The School is ideally equipped to carry on this method of education. It is divided into five farms, totalling nearly five hundred acres, stocked with herds of cattle, horses, poultry, and all farm machinery and implements, while all of the work is directed and supervised by an able corps of instructors.

The National Farm School gives to worthy lads, irrespective of creed, a three years' course of instruction, free of all charge to them for tuition, books, board, lodging and other necessities.

The requirements for admission are: Age, between 16 and 21; a common school education; physical, mental, and moral health; and a sincere desire to make agriculture a life's work.

Young men who are interested, may write for further information and an application blank, to Mr. M. A. Kaufmann, chairman of the Committee on Admissions, 407 Mutual Life building, Philadelphia. The term begins in March, and as all applications are considered on their merit, and in the order in which they are received, it would be well for such young men as might desire to enroll in the new term, to file their applications as soon as possible.

New Haven, Conn.

Horeb Lodge, which recently witnessed a very intense contest for the presidency of the lodge, has settled down to enthusiastic work under most harmonious conditions.

Joseph Koletsky, who was re-elected as president, and Jos. H. Ullman, past president of the lodge, were each presented with beautiful diamond studded gold Menorah watch charms by the members of the lodge as a slight appreciation of the work of these two brothers for the welfare of the lodge and the Order.

At the same time many medals were presented to those Horeb Lodge service men who were unable to be present at the recent presentation at which Professor William H. Taft was a recipient of a similar honor.

Five hundred dollars additional was raised at the meeting by voluntary subscription as part of the B'nai B'rith Loan Fund.

New York City

The announcement of the January 13 meeting of Akiba Lodge appears in a most original form. A blue print 18 x 12 inches in size very attractively lettored and arranged advises the members that Akiba Lodge will meet on January 13 with Progressive Lodge of New York City. Candidates to both lodges will be initiated by the Akiba Lodge Degree Team and the new officers of both lodges will be installed

The announcement also contains, in addition to the names of the officers for 1920 and a list of candidates, a reproduction of a letter from Bro. Leopold Philipp, the retiring president, thanking the members for their co-operation. The originality and ingenuity shown in the announcement is indicative of the increased interest and activity in the lodges of District No. 1.

Proceedings of the Board of Trustees and Directors of the Jewish Orphan Asylum

The following trustees and directors were present at the last meeting of the Board of Directors of the Board of Trustees of the Jewish Orphan Asylum:

Sol. S. Kiser, Indianapolis, Ind.; Fred Lazarus, Jr., Columbus, Ohio; A. B. Seelenfreund, Chicago; Hiram D. Frankel, St. Paul; Adolph Freund, Detroit; Adolph Finsterwald, Detroit; Silas Ichenhauser, Evansville, Ind.; Morris M. Lempert, Toledo; Jacob Lampert, St. Louis, Mo.; Louis Loeb, Akron, Ohio, and the following members from Cleveland: Alfred A. Benesch, Nathan L. Dauby, Theodore Fishel, Samuel Gross, Max E. Meisel and Abraham Stearn.

Tentative figures for buildings on the cottage plan were submitted by the architect, and the plan for the new institution was approved, all details to be worked out and reported at the next meeting. The board voted to expend a sum not to exceed two million dollars for the creation of the new home.

Because of crowded condition at the Home all applications for admission were deferred until the next meeting. A Committee of Three was appointed to consider the advisability of giving children for adoption.

Superintendent Lashman presented his first report and all his recommendations for improving conditions were approved. Harry W. Davis of St. Paul was elected Assistant Superintendent.

The next meeting of the Board will be held in Indianapolis.

Chicago, Ill.

Ramah Lodge No. 33, has issued an attractive pocket size "Calender of Events," listing the program of activities of the lodge for the season. Among the good things in store for the lodge members are the following:

January 12—Lecture by Dr. A. Cronbach, "The Utility of a Chaplain."

February 9—Address by Leon L. Lewis, "Defamation of the Jew."

February 10—Formal dance at Louis XIV Ball Room, Hotel La Salle.

February 25—Initiation of "A Thousand Class" at Hotel La Salle. Candidates will be guests of lodge at dinner, 6 p. m.

February 26—Banquet in honor of Mr. Adolf Kraus' 70th birthday anniversary at Hotel La Salle.

March 8—Class initiation. Lecture by Dr. C. S. Levi, Milwaukee, "The International American."

March 9—Musicale and informal dance at Hotel La Salle.

April 12—Lecture (speaker to be announced later).

April 13—Card party at Hotel La Salle.

New Orleans, La.

A large number of members, many of whom had not been to meetings in years, attended the initiation of candidates and installation of officers of B'nai Israel Lodge, December 19. More than one hundred new members have been secured in the membership drive inaugurated by the State Deputy and conducted in co-operation with the Joint Committee. Twenty-five candidates were initiated at the meeting.

The address of the evening was delivered by Judge Max Dinkelspiel, past president of District No. 7, who brought out eloquently and forcefully the message of B'nai B'rithism to the new as well as to the old members of the Order.

On January 7 another class was initiated, on which occasion Past President Ralph J. Sewartz delivered an address on "The Past, Present and Future of the B'nai B'rith."

Aid for Persian Jews

Food, medicine and clothing for the stricken Jews of Persia have been provided by the Joint Distribution Committee of American Funds for Jewish War Sufferers, according to a report which has just been transmitted to the Joint Distribution Committee's office, at 20 Exchange Place, from Mr. Tarragano, director of the Alliance Israelite School at Teheran, and head of the Persian Jewish Relief Committee. This committee was in charge of the distribution of relief in Persia for the American organization.

Mr. Tarragano described as pitiable the condition of the poor Jews of Persia, who are unable to obtain food, clothing and fuel. They are in dire need of medicine and medical care because of the results of epidemics that have swept the country—and because of wretched sanitation.

Twenty-five thousand dollars were sent to Persia from this country for relief. A considerable amount of this money, Mr. Tarragano states, was devoted to the feeding of children.

Free tuition, food and clothing are given. Funds were also devoted to the purchase of rice, potatoes, beet root, pumpkins and coal, as winter supplies for poverty-stricken city dwellers. Druggists were authorized to distribute medicines free of charge to the needy sick and free burials were arranged for.

When the Jewish quarter of the city of Boroudjerd was pillaged by the "Laures," a band of marauders, and many persons were killed and injured, the Joint Distribution Committee's funds were applied for the relief of the victims.

The co-operation of Hon. J. L. Caldwell, the American Minister of Teheran, according to Mr. Tarragano, aided the work of the Persian Jewish Relief Committee materially.

English Jewry Co-operates with J. D. C.

That the Jews of America and England are working together to provide clothing and shoes for the destitute men, women and children of Poland was made evident today through an announcement by Felix M. Warburg, chairman of the Joint Distribution Committee of American Funds for Jewish War Sufferers. Mr. Warburg stated that the Joint Distribution Committee, which represents the American Jewish Relief Committee, the People's Relief and the Central Relief Committee, have been enabled to purchase clothing for thousands of adults and children through a donation of £100,000 (sterling) from English Jewry. This fund was used for the purchase in England of 30,000 adult outfits, consisting of overcoats, shoes and stockings. Five thousand overcoats, 15,000 pairs of shoes, 20,000 pairs of socks of regular army make are already on their way to Warsaw, where it is expected that they will arrive before New Year's day. Four hundred thousand outfits of children's clothing were purchased in addition by the European Children's Fund, which is distributing relief on non-sectarian basis and toward which the Joint Distribution Committee is contributing. Sixteen cases of shoes and sweaters were distributed to the children attending the workingmen's schools in Poland, and for their parents 20,000 suits of clothing and 40,000 pairs of sandals, made with wooden soles, leather straps and fur heel pieces, were purchased and distributed.

Mr. Warburg also stated that the relief organizations are purchasing bolts of cloth and tailoring material in England for shipment to Poland, so that the clothing may be manufactured there.

B'nai B'rith Co-Operation in Naturalization Work

Minneapolis, Minn.

(By the Lodge Correspondent)

The Minneapolis B'nai B'rith Lodge has undertaken a series of activities for the coming year that will give the Lodge first rank in the district for such a comprehensive program. Since the first meeting in September after an elaborate banquet at the Raddison Hotel for all returned service men the Lodge began to take a new interest in B'nai B'rith affairs. The Minneapolis Lodge is now publishing a monthly newspaper that is sent to each of the members and to prospective members. This paper is known as the B'nai B'rith Bulletin and acts as a medium for news of the Lodge and for Lodge propaganda. The editors of the paper are Brothers H. Z. Mendow, Sam Margulies and George Monash.

The Lodge has also a committee to act with the Young Men's Hebrew Association of the city. This committee has arranged with the members of a business man's committee to help finance a building for the Y. M. H. A. and to help in a membership campaign to enroll 2,000 members for this organization. Brother Emanuel Cohen is the chairman of the joint committee.

In Americanization work under the direction of Brother H. Z. Mendow the Lodge has taken the lead in the district. Up to the present time the Americanization committee has made a comprehensive survey of the field of work and has issued a large amount of literature. Four bulletins dealing with the problem of Americanization and outlining the attitude and the work of the Minneapolis Lodge have been issued by the committee and distributed to the Jews of the city. Two large mass meetings were held and widely advertised, at which meetings Brother A. B. Clarfield, associate director of Americanization for the Minneapolis Public Schools, made the principal address. In addition to this the committee is having translated into Yiddish several pamphlets on the government and politics of the United States and in co-operation with the Board of Education is having translated lessons in citizenship and civics.

Brother Louis L. Schwartz is the chairman of a committee to select and produce a play of general Jewish interest under the auspices of the Lodge. This play will be given sometime in February and will be repeated in St. Paul for the benefit of the two Lodges of the Twin Cities. The members of the cast will all be members of the Minneapolis Lodge. The giving of the play will be the second one by the Lodge and is in accord with a custom adopted two years ago. The play will be presented in some downtown theater.

In order to keep alive the interest in the Lodge a publicity committee has been appointed whose duty it is to secure proper publicity for Lodge activity in the press of the Lodge and in the daily and weekly press of the city and state.

The next number of the "Citizen," a magazine issued by the Public Schools of Minneapolis in connection with Americanization work will be a B'nai B'rith number and will contain contributions from members of the Minneapolis Lodge. Five thousand copies of the magazine will be distributed in the city. Several of the articles deal with the work of the Anti-Defamation League and with the objects and purposes of the B'nai B'rith. The number is being issued under the direction of Brother H. Z. Mendow as director of Americanization for the Lodge.

Lodges Undertake Program of Americanization Work; Missouri Lodge No. 22, St. Louis, Secures Co-Operation of Federal Officials

A COMMITTEE was recently appointed to report upon the advisability of the Lodge undertaking Americanization work. The following extracts from the report will be of interest to other Lodges about to engage in this field of activity:

"After careful investigation your committee finds that the proposed work would not be in conflict with or in duplication of the work of any other organization. The Americanization Committee of the Chamber of Commerce has been inactive for the past year, and what Americanization work is being done in St. Louis at the present time is practically done under the auspices of the Young Men's Christian Association and the Young Women's Christian Association, who have undertaken the work on a large scale, and of course, will do so entirely under its own auspices. Mr. James R. Dunn, United States Commissioner of Immigration, chairman of various Americanization committees and a leading figure in Americanization work, urged that the Lodge undertake this work, as it would be filling a great need, and that, since the plan suggested by your committee is new in the field of naturalization, the Lodge would serve as a pioneer in this work and set an example for other similar organizations.

At the present time the attention of the country is focused on the alien and the problems of his Americanization. It is one of the great problems before America today. The record of the Jew, native and foreign born, during the great war, has been a glorious tribute to the Americanism and loyalty of the Jew. But we cannot afford to rest upon such laurels. It behooves the Jew to make constant effort to Americanize and naturalize every Jew in America, and to do it as speedily as possible. If for no other reason, our pride demands that we do this work ourselves, instead of depending upon the Y. M. C. A. or any other organization assuming this burden.

It is fundamental that the alien cannot be Americanized until he becomes a citizen, enjoying its privileges and assuming its responsibilities.

Is there any need of such Americanization work?

Your committee believes that there are members of this Lodge who are not American citizens. We trust the number is small. However, any estimate at this time would be mere speculation. But we believe that as long as there is one member of the Lodge unnaturalized, there is a great work ahead of us.

It is not our plan to displace citizenship classes in the night schools. On the contrary, we propose to encourage attendance in these classes whenever possible. However, there are many small storekeepers who keep their stores open at night, and therefore are unable to attend such classes. There are others who might fail to attend these classes, either through indifference or ignorance. To all of these we propose to bring the blessings of citizenship through personal instruction and assistance. In this work we can fulfill our obligation as B'nai B'rith, as well as serving our country.

This work is not to be political or partisan in any manner. It is to be a work of brotherly love and patriotism, without fee or compensation whatsoever. The committee does not propose to force its attention where such assistance is not welcome. It will not make a public spectacle of its non-citizen members, or of any other co-religionists. It does not intend to send out questionnaires, asking members, "Are you a citizen?" The work will be carried on without offense to the most sensitive of our members. The only expense the Lodge will incur will be the nominal cost of administration.

How is this great work to be done?

Your committee proposes to enlist every member of this Lodge willing to volunteer his services into a citizenship instruction committee, patterned after the lecture committee of the Masonic Order, with which most of us are familar. If the Masonic lecture committee can give personal instruction in Masonry to new members, there is no reason why our citizenship instruction committee cannot give personal instruction and assistance to members or others desirous of becoming American citizens.

Can this undertaking be made a success?

The success of such an undertaking depends solely upon the response and sincerity of the members of the Lodge and their willingness to give up a few hours a week to this endeavor. The work will not be as difficult as it may appear at first hand.

We believe that if Missouri Lodge undertakes this work the old Missouri Lodge spirit will make it a success, and that every Ben Brith will answer to the call of his less fortunate brethren. This work will require many volunteers, but we are sure that the membership will not be found wanting."

Ladies' Auxiliary, N. Y.

The Ladies Auxiliary of Edward Everett Lodge has secured a membership of 100 and has fine prospects of increasing its membership to 300 during the coming year. Great credit is due Mrs. Henry Durchner, the president and organizer of the Ladies Auxiliary, for her personal efforts and executive ability, which has helped to make the Auxiliary a success.

Among the various committees, the one which is most active, is the Welfare Committee, the work carried on consisting in visits to the various hospitals and children's wards and distributing toys and gifts to the patients.

A formal dance is being arranged by the Auxiliary to be held on Feb. 21, and the proceeds are to be devoted to the charitable funds for war sufferers.

Ft. Wayne, Ind.

Emek Beracha Lodge, No. 61, observed B'nai B'rith Day in a most interesting as well as pleasing manner on Nov. 16 in the social rooms of the Achduth Vesholem Congregation Temple. A musical program consisting of a piano solo by Miss Regina Minsky, monologue by Jake Maier, and a violin solo by Myron Falk, was given. Brother Sidney G. Kusworm, president of District Grand Lodge No. 2, gave a most interesting talk on "The Aims and Objects of the Order—Past, Present and Future" in his usual most eloquent manner, pleasing every one of the large audience assembled. After this, a reception was held in honor of our guest, and the ladies of the committee, consisting of Mrs. Charles Young, Mrs. S. K. Frankenstein and Mrs. Louis Novitsky, served refreshments.

Detroit, Michigan

Two years ago it was the general judgment that the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith had seen its best day in Detroit; that it was an organization dead beyond the possibility of resuscitation. But a miracle apparently has happened. During these past two years a new spirit has been born in the lodge and instead of an organization nominally existing, but in fact dead, it has taken on life and vitality and usefulness.

Two years ago the organization numbered little more than one hundred members; today its roster of membership approaches well night fifteen hundred men. Then, its meetings were sparsely attended by the few faithful who were just enough to constitute a quorum to transact routine business; today, it has outgrown its quarters acquired little more than a year ago, and which at the time seemed more than sufficient for many years to come. Then, the organization did not take itself very seriously and few in the community regarded it as a responsible social agency; today, both of these conditions are changed. The lodge recognizes its opportunity and its obligation to the community and the community in turn has come to recognize in the lodge a potent factor for good.

All of these things are a cause for heartfelt congratulation. The men who were far-visioned enough to see in the lodge the possibility of revival deserve great credit for having put their shoulders to the wheel and for having invited the co-operation of those hundreds of earnest men who under their inspiration have joined the Lodge and Order. The lecture course which the local lodge is now conducting without charge to the public is a single instance [illegible] service for which the community is indebted to Pisgah Lodge.

The organization is especially fitted to undertake many things for the community as a whole which other Jewish institutions cannot, for one reason or another, sponsor. Made up of representatives of every social class in local Jewry and having among its members Orthodox Jews and Reform Jews, Zionists and non-Zionists, it is in better position to speak for the whole Jewish community than practically any other of our organizations. All the more important, therefore, it is that the leadership of the lodge should remain vested in the hands of such capable and conscientious men as those who are presently directing its activities. Nor must it be forgotten that the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith is our one great international organization. For this reason, if for no other, all Jews should identify themselves with the lodge.

If, now and then, through error of judgment, it may do this or that which does not seem to be wise or to serve the best purposes of the community life, only those within its ranks have the opportunity to set it right. When we stand on the outside we dare not criticize. It is, therefore, to be hoped that this organization, which in the last two years has so steadily grown in numbers and in usefulness, may continue to exert an increasing influence for good in the community and that it will win to its cause every Jew in Detroit who, in co-operation with his brothers, seeks for an opportunity to do real service in the cause of Judaism and of humanity. —(Dr. Leo M. Franklin, in Detroit "Jewish Chronicle.")

Memphis Lodge Celebrates Sixtieth Anniversary

Two Day Program by Memphis Jewish Community Commemorates Long Period of Usefulness of B'nai B'rith Lodge

WITH the hearty co-operation of the entire Jewish community, Memphis Lodge, No. 35, of Memphis, Tenn., celebrated the sixtieth anniversary of its institution on Nov. 23 and 24, and the memory of the two-day program on that occasion will long linger most pleasantly in the minds of the people of Memphis.

During the sixty years of its existence, Memphis Lodge has been an important factor in Jewish affairs. The successful and happy culmination of the celebration is due to Mr. Milton B. Rose, president of the Lodge, and able committees, who have labored incessantly for weeks.

On Sunday morning, Nov. 23, a regular meeting was held at the Y. M. H. A. Home. An unusually large attendance of members was present and a class of candidates was initiated. The initiatory work was conducted by three Grand Lodge officers. A smoker followed the meeting and addresses were made by the Grand Lodge officers, Samuel Schloss, the only surviving charter member of the Lodge, S. L. Lee, Rabbi Fineshriber and several of the newly initiated members. In the afternoon, a delightful auto drive through the city and suburbs was enjoyed by the vititors and their hosts.

On Sunday evening at the Poplar Avenue Temple, a large audience attended a most carefully prepared and excellently rendered program. Mr. A. Leo Oberdorfer, president of the District Grand Lodge, the principal speaker, told of the mission of the Order and of its great altruistic and philanthropic work. Judge I. H. Peres spoke on ''The B'nai B'rith and the Republic.'' Mr. Victor H. Hexter of Dallas spoke on ''The High Ideals of the Order.'' The program was interspersed with vocal and instrumental numbers.

On Monday evening a delightful affair was given in the form of a musicale and tea by the Salon Circle in honor of the delegates and guests. The program consisted of addresses, musical numbers and readings. At the conclusion of the program, refreshments were served.

An historical review of the Order was read by Mr. A. B. Freyer of Shreveport, La., at the final gathering held on Monday evening, which took place at the Rex Club. Mr. Freyer spoke of the Order's activities, of its crusade against the ''white slave'' traffic, of its efforts to interest Jews in synagogues, of the support it gave to a large number of benevolent and philanthropic institutions for the orphan, the widow and the aged, and of the steps taken by the Order to safeguard the rights of the Jew in all parts of the world. Other participants in the program were B. W. Hirsh, whose address, permeated with humor, caused much merriment. Milton B. Rose, president of the Lodge, made a short address, thanking the participants and committees for the excellent support given. A feature of the evening was a playlette, ''Oh, Woman,'' written for the occasion by Miss Josephine Lee. Following the rendition of the evening's program, an excellent orchestra furnished music for dancing which was enjoyed until a late hour and during which refreshments were served.

No affair which has ever occurred in Memphis was more perfect in appointments, and no affair has ever displayed a more perfect co-operation and good-fellowship among the people of Memphis than did the Sixtieth Anniversary Celebration of Memphis Lodge, No. 35.

Erie Dedicates New Home

On Sunday, Nov. 30, the dreams of the members of Erie Lodge, No. 620, came into realization. The beautiful and commodious house which has recently been purchased was opened to the members and B'nai B'rith Day was fittingly celebrated. From early in the afternoon until late at night the building was thronged with the members, their wives and friends, and all were highly enthusiastic over this new fraternal, social and cultural center added to the advantages of the Erie community. All agreed in expressing their appreciation and thanks to Brother Morris Schaffner, second vice-president of the District, for the vision, energy and the optimism that made this achievement possible.

The house is a fine mansion and has plenty of rooms for meetings, classes and club rooms. It is owned by the B'nai B'rith Association of Erie. It is the intention of the association to proceed at once with plans for building an extension containing an auditorium, gymnasium and swimming pool.

The exercises of the afternoon were opened by a dedication address delivered by Rabbi Max C. Currick. He was followed by an address by Past-President Isador Sobel. Second Vice-President Schaffner also spoke eloquently on the significance of the event and of the noble uses to which the new building will be put. Addresses were also made by Hyman Shapiro, president of the former Y. M. H. A., now amalgamated with the Lodge; Henry L. Zacks, member of the amalgamation and building committees, and President Louis Schlesinger. The amalgamation of these two organizations now gives Erie Lodge about 270 members and it is the intention of the Lodge to come to the convention with 300 members.

Oakland, Calif.

The annual installation of the newly elected officers of Oakland Lodge No. 252, I. O. B. B., took place Jan. 8, in the lodge rooms in Covenant Hall. The impressive ceremony of installation was followed by a banquet and program which was arranged by Past Grand President Morris S. Schneider, who was chairman of the committee. Much praise was tendered Morris Schneider upon the skillful manner in which the affair was conducted. Music was a feature of the evening's entertainment. The vocal numbers were contributed by Signor Albert Rappaport of San Francisco; Madam Le Noir, Mrs. Corinne Bailey-Miller, J. K. Miller and Mrs. H. Cobb, a sweet singer from the Northwest and Sara Rosenstein, violinist.

As a testimonial to the popularity of Lionel Wachs, the new president of the Lodge, the citizens of Marysville donated 100 pounds of their famous turkeys for the banquet.

Judea Lodge, Easton, Pa.

For a great number of years, Judea Lodge, No. 30, was small in number, having only eight on its list. As a result of special activities of Brother Dr. David Levy, rabbi of the congregation, a number of candidates were initiated and the Lodge now has on its roster twenty-four members.

Although the city does not offer the opportunities that a large city gives for the securing of members, it offers a splendid field for work on behalf of Jewish interest and under the leadership of Dr. Levy, who has interested others in the work, a great deal of activity can surely be expected from the Lodge.

Kansas City, Mo.

On Monday, Jan. 12, 1920, at the Temple vestry, an unusually well attended meeting of Kansas City Lodge No. 184, of Kansas City, Mo., took place. The special order of business was the initiation of candidates and the installation of the newly elected officers for the ensuing year.

At the close of the meeting refreshments were served and a social hour was spent.

Brother J. Weinberger, retiring secretary of the Lodge, presented his report, reciting the activities of the Lodge and the Order and outlining its future usefulness.

The membership of the Lodge at the end of the year was 748, being a net gain in the membership of 103, with 90 candidates awaiting initiation. The financial condition of the Lodge is also in excellent shape, the net assets of the Lodge at the end of the year being $4,254.48.

Huntington, W. Va.

On Wednesday evening, Jan. 2, 1920, a general social gathering of the members of Huntington Lodge No. 795 and their friends was held in the B'nai B'rith Club rooms in honor of the outgoing officers of the Lodge. A most interesting program was arranged with Rabbi Jacob Kaplan of Cincinnati as the guest of honor. His address was of extraordinary interest. The Dance Committee arranged for dancing, which took place at the close of the meeting. Refreshments were served. Rabbi Feinstein acted as master of ceremonies.

Fresno, Calif.

On Thursday, Dec. 4, Fresno Lodge No. 723 held one of its banner meetings with more than 50 per cent of the local membership in attendance. The meeting was in the nature of a reception to the new rabbi, Alexander Segel, who is transfering his membership from San Diego to Fresno. In the course of the evening a recess was called to permit the Ladies Auxiliary to be invited to the meeting when Rabbi Segel was introduced to the members and gave a brief tribute to the work of the Order in the field of orphan caring. He said: ''It would be an inspiration to every Lodge if it would adopt an orphan as its protege, and witness the marvelous transformation which the new opportunities produce in the orphan child. If the B'nai B'rith did nothing else but support the orphan homes from coast to coast, it would be worthy of its existence.''

Nashville, Tenn.

Under the auspices of Maimonides Lodge, No. 46, Nashville, Tenn., a banquet was given in honor of Mr. A. Leo Oberdorfer, president of the District Grand Lodge, who paid an official visit to the Lodge. The occasion was also used as the celebration of B'nai B'rith Day and more than 200 members participated. The speakers, besides the guest of honor, were Dr. Lewinthal, Nathan Cohn, Louis Leftwich and Dr. P. Bromberg.

The membership of the Lodge is now over 275, and as a result of the recent membership campaign, 75 applications have been secured.

Sioux Falls, S. Dak.

On Sunday, Dec. 28, 1919, Sioux Lodge, No. 847, of Sioux Falls, S. Dak., was instituted. Brother Gus Loevinger of St. Paul and Lewis Hart of Minneapolis, acting as the installing officers, represented the District Grand Lodge. The charter membership of the new Lodge numbers twenty-eight.

The election for officers was not a prearranged affair. There was real rivalry for all the offices, and for some officers four ballots were necessary to secure an election.

Initiatory ceremonies took place in the evening. The initiation fee was fixed at $10.00 and the annual dues at $12.00.

In the evening a banquet was held at the Cataract Hotel, attended by over fifty people.

Mr. Gus Loevinger spoke on ''The B'nai B'rith and Opportunity,'' emphasizing particularly the practical and tangible program of the Order and the opportunity which the existence of a Lodge afforded the members to participate in work for the relief, betterment, enlightenment and freedom of Jewry and humanity. Brother Lewis Hart responded to a request by making an eloquent appeal for harmony in the work of the Order and in the cause of Israel.

B'nai B'rith of Portland

The Portland Auxiliary, Daughters of the Covenant, held its election of officers last month. The retiring president, Mrs. A. D. Goldstein, was presented with a beautiful emblem of the Order by Mrs. M. Wax. A luncheon was also given by the Auxiliary at the Benson Hotel in honor of the retiring and newly elected officers.

The B'nai B'rith smoker and stag held on Dec. 30 proved a great success. The program was in charge of Dr. N. S. Reingold and consisted of eleven vaudeville acts followed by an address by Mr. D. Silas Cohen, who spoke on ''The Work of the Order.'' Rabbi Wise introduced the newly elected officers who gave two-minute talks on what they hope to accomplish during their administration.

Rabbi Wise addressed the Lodge on ''Co-operation Between the Lodge and Individual Members.'' Refreshments were served, consisting of a specially arranged buffet supper.

The annual reunion of Portland Lodge No. 65 of Portland, Ore., proved a great success. The lodge hall in the B'nai B'rith Building was crowded to capacity with members of the Order and their friends. The evening's entertainments were most interesting.

At the meeting of the Lodge held on Jan. 6, the officers for the ensuing term were installed.

Santa Rosa, Calif.

Under the auspices of Bear Flag Lodge, No. 846, a Chanukah Festival was given on Saturday evening, Dec. 20, 1919. The purpose was to bring the Jewish community together and to enjoy the feast. Mr. A. Frischman acted as chairman of the meeting. The program included lighting of the Chanukah candles, an address by the president of the Lodge, Brother M. Rosenberg, on the subject ''The Meaning of Chanukah,'' vocal and instrumental music, recitation by Miss Tyroler, an address by Brother M. Levin on ''The Future of Judaism'' and the closing address by Dr. Trachtman on ''The Right of the Modern Jew.''

The evening was brought to a close with dancing and the playing of cards, during which refreshments were served. As a result of the evening, six applications for membership were secured.

What Our Lodges Are Doing

Salt Lake City, Utah

The year of 1919 has been a banner year for B. F. Peixotto Lodge No. 421. During the year more than seventy-five new brethren were initiated into the fold, bringing the membership of the Lodge at this writing to two hundred and twenty, which is a most gratifying showing, considering the Jewish population of this community.

The Lodge enjoyed a most healthy activity during the year. By reason of the various affairs and events conducted by it, the members, and even non-members, were made to feel that the Lodge is the most vital factor in the Jewish community. The Intellectual Advancement Committee brought some splendid speakers to the Lodge, and the Entertainment Committee from time to time sponsored novel affairs.

The return of the men in service was fittingly celebrated by a cabaret dance and dinner held at the Commercial Club, and the Twenty-Seventh Anniversary of the Lodge was observed in appropriate manner. The visit of the District Grand President and Grand Orator was made the occasion of a brilliant banquet and dance at the Hotel Utah. On Nov. 25 the Entertainment Committee outdid itself in providing the Lodge with the B. B. Round-Up and Dance, which was given for the benefit of the Jewish war sufferers, who were benefited thereby to the extent of several hundred dollars. The program included various unique contests, games and cowboy stunts.

The Hall Committee has launched a program for enlarging the Lodge building, and their plans seem to be meeting with whole-hearted approval from all the members. Blueprints have been prepared, from which it appears that the contemplated additions will consist of a large hall, ladies' parlor, men's smoking room on the top floor, banquet hall, ladies' and gentlemen's rooms, kitchen and pantry room on the lower floor. As projected, the building would be a worthy center for all Jewish activities of this community and would be an important factor in the social life of the community.

On Dec. 15 officers for the year 1920 were elected.

B'nai B'rith of Cleveland

The B'nai B'rith Speakers' Club of Cleveland held its first meeting Sunday evening, Dec. 29. A great deal of interest was manifested in the club and in the afternoon's program, which consisted of a debate on the subject, "Resolved, that the removal of the segregated district was beneficial." Mr. Alfred A. Bencsch took the affirmative side and Dr. L. E. Siegelstein spoke for the negative. The initial meeting was considered a success by all who attended.

The first B'nai B'rith dance of the new year was held Sunday evening, Jan. 11, 1920. Every effort will be exerted to make the affairs of 1920 equal, if not superior, to those of the past season.

The B'nai B'rith Dramatic Circle gave an extensive program at its last meeting held on Dec. 1. A one-act play, "The Affairs of Anatol" by Schnitzler, was much appreciated.

The B'nai B'rith French Circle is engaged in the reading of French literature and a committee has been appointed to select new plays. The club is considering producing a one-act comedy in French in the near future.

On Thursday evening, Jan. 8, before the B'nai B'rith Civic Forum, Mr. John A. Zangerle, County Auditor, spoke on the subject, "Cleveland's Taxation Problems."

The B'nai B'rith Bowling League completed the third week of its hotly contested games with increased zest.

The Collegiate Club of the B'nai B'rith challenges any organization of any size or character in the city of Cleveland or elsewhere to a public debate on any public question to be determined.

The opening meeting of the B'nai B'rith Business Educational Course on Dec. 11 was a success in every respect. Mr. Isadore Grossman, a prominent local attorney, gave an able talk on "Corporations."

The B'nai B'rith Chess Circle holds regular meetings on Monday evenings at the B'nai B'rith Building. Arrangements are being made for the formation of a chess team to enter some of the city tournament games.

Election of officers of Cleveland Lodge No. 16 was held on Dec. 18. Mr. Eugene E. Wolf was re-elected president. The officers for the ensuing term will be installed on Thursday evening, Jan. 15. It is expected that all past-presidents of the Lodge will be present. The committees of the Lodge through their respective chairmen will submit reports of the activities of the Lodge during the past year.

Reports from All Districts Indicates Progressive Spirit in Lodges

District No. 2

The officers of Lake Lodge, No. 831, Gary, Ind., were installed at a public meeting on Tuesday evening, Jan. 6, 1920, in the Gary Commercial Club rooms.

The audience numbered over 400 members and their friends. The officers were installed by Mr. L. L. Lewis of Chicago, Executive Secretary of the Anti-Defamation League, who gave an address on "The Defamation of the Jew."

Resolutions were adopted in memory of late Brother Victor Abraham, member of the Executive Board for District No. 2.

The meeting was followed by a dance, after which refreshments were served.

District No. 3

Brother Marcus Feuchtwanger of Newcastle, president of District No. 3, with the assistance of Brother Morris Blum, made a personal canvass among the members in Atlantic City and secured twenty-seven applications, mostly from young men. On Sunday, Nov. 23, Atlantic Lodge of Atlantic City was agreeably surprised by a visit from Brother Feuchtwanger, who presided at the initiation ceremonies.

District No. 4

The officers of Hildesheimer Lodge No. 503, Seattle, Wash., and delegates to the coming convention of the District Grand Lodge were elected at a well-attended meeting of the Lodge on Dec. 10.

District No. 6

The officers of David Heuman Lodge, No. 807, of Jackson, Mich., were installed on the evening of Jan. 5, 1920, by Brother Edward Lichtig of Bay City, Mich. An informal dance followed the installation and refreshments were served.

Flint Lodge, No. 565, of Flint, Mich., held an unusually well attended meeting on Sunday, Dec. 28, 1919. A class of twelve candidates was initiated by the Degree Team of Pisgah Lodge, No. 34, of Detroit. Addresses were made at the meeting by Brother Edward Lichtig of Bay City, on behalf of the B'nai B'rith Loan Fund and $500 was subscribed by the members present and the Lodge pledged itself to raise $1,000. Brothers Simon D. Rosenzweig and Dr. Samuel Mayerberg of Detroit also addressed the Lodge. In the evening, under the auspices of the Lodge, a public installation of officers was held and addresses were made by the visiting Grand Lodge brothers.

On Jan. 4, 1920, Tri-City Lodge, No. 837, Rock Island, Ill., installed its officers for the ensuing year. The meeting was open to the public and was attended by a large number of the members and their families. Dancing was indulged in after the meeting and refreshments were served.

At the monthly meeting of Covenant Lodge, No. 569, Duluth, Minn., held in December, 1919, officers for the ensuing term were elected. Dr. M. Lefkovitz addressed the Lodge on the subject, "The B'nai B'rith Loan Fund," and as a result, $300 was subscribed and a large number of pledges were secured. Covenant Lodge has enjoyed one of the best years since its inception.

At the meeting of Minneapolis Lodge, No. 271, of Minneapolis, Minn., held on Dec. 22, 1919, officers for the ensuing term were elected, also delegates to the District Grand Lodge Convention. The next meeting of Minneapolis Lodge will be held on Jan. 27. A smoker and buffet luncheon has been arranged in conjunction with the meeting which will be held at the newly opened club rooms of the Gymol Daled Club.

Louis D. Brandeis Lodge, No. 833, of Regina, Canada, celebrated B'nai B'rith Day on Dec. 11, 1919. The Lodge extended an invitation to Brother S. Abramson of Winnipeg to be the guest of honor on the occasion. Brother Abrahamson, who spoke on the work of the B'nai B'rith, more than met the anticipations and expectations of the members of the Lodge. The meeting was well attended and practically every member of the Lodge was present. Brother Abramson, who is a young barrister, recently returned from England where he has been attending Oxford University, having been sent there by the University of Manitoba as a reward for winning the Rhodes Scholarship. He is the only Jew from Canada who has thus far obtained this honor.

District No. 7

On Thursday evening, Jan. 8, 1920, the annual meeting of Gulf Lodge, No. 221, of New Orleans, La., was held at the Athenaun.

Officers and delegates to the District Grand Lodge were elected, and steps were taken in the matter of securing a liberal response to the appeal for funds to aid the distressed members of the Order abroad.

Charleston, S. C.

Dan Lodge No. 593, of Charleston, S. C., had an open social meeting on Sunday evening, Dec. 7, 1919, at which the families and friends of the members were present. The hall was crowded to its capacity. The program was arranged under the direction of Past President Joseph Fromberg, General Chairman of the Entertainment Committee of the Lodge, assisted by Mrs. H. J. Williams, chairman of the Ladies' Auxiliary Committee. An enjoyable, entertaining and instructive program was provided. An orchestra of young local musicians rendered several selections and accompaniments. A chorus of ladies sang a number of Hebrew melodies. Bro. Hirsch sang two Hebrew solos. Miss Bertha Rephan recited "A Modern Thought," which was very impressive and urged our co-religionists to keep within the fold of their faith and to treasure the traditions of the proud heritage bequeathed to us by our fore-fathers. The meeting was opened by Bro. H. J. Williams, the president of the Lodge, with a prayer by the Acting Monitor Dr. Leon Banov. Bro. Fromberg in his address touched upon the history of the Jews, reviewed the history of the Order, told of the benevolent institutions it is maintaining, spoke of the work of the Anti-Defamation League and the Big-Brother movement and described the far reaching influence of the Order as an international organization. He made a strong and earnest plea to the Jewish young men and women that they bestow more of the time, energies, efforts and enthusiasm expended by them in non-Jewish movements to the benefit and in the interest of Jewish community work. He eloquentl [illegible] to the elderly folks the danger of [illegible] off-spring drifting from their [illegible] reason of the indifference [illegible] terestedness of the adults. He called upon the Council of Jewish Women, The Daughters of Israel and the other Jewish organizations of the city to cooperate with Dan Lodge in making it a community center for the advancement of the intellectual and social life of the Jewish community here. Rabbi Jacob S. Raisin spoke next and dwelt upon the thoughts and remarks expressed by Bro. Fromberg. Quoting from the Songs of Songs of Solomon he aptly compared our people to the keepers of the vineyards of others, neglecting their own. Bro. Williams in his address stressed the good work of the Anti-Defamation League. The program was closed by the chorus singing En Kelohenu and a benediction by Rabbi Raisin.

Philadelphia

A novel departure was made by Har Sinai Lodge at its quarterly meeting at the Hotel Majestic on Wednesday, Dec. 17, when the members were requested to bring ladies with them. The routine business of the Lodge was conducted as usual and officers were elected for the ensuing term, as were also the delegates to the Convention of the District Grand Lodge, which will be held in Atlantic City in January.

The impressive feature of the evening consisted in the initiation of a class of fifty candidates by the degree team, composed of Abraham Berkowitz, William Portner, Harry S. Platowsky, William H. Smallock, Harris W. Watkins and Joseph W. Salus.

After the meeting a banquet was served in the lower hall, which was filled to capacity. At the table, H. S. Platowsky presented a handsome walking stick in the name of the Lodge to the retiring treasurer, Borthold Oppenheimor, who has relinquished the position after years of faithful service.

ADOLF KRAUS
President Independent Order B'nai B'rith

Adolf Kraus' Seventieth Birthday

A Symposium

THE month of February has a world-wide significance. On the 12th Lincoln, on the 22nd Washington, on the 26th Kraus. It does not disparage the two to couple the third. As a leader of Jewry, as president of the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith, as jurist, journalist, advocate, loyal, patriotic citizen, he has at all times reached the goal that American opportunity afforded. As a man, a friend, and a brother, he has been true to the purest ideals, inspired by motives of duty and services.

To me it is a source of great happiness to sincerely congratulate, not only the chief of our great and beneficent Order, but also my dear and unselfish friend. We have for many years clasped hands in accord and good will; our aims, our ideals, have been in unison; our slogan, the equality of all men, and the happiness of our co-religionists. His deeds have squared with his words, and it must be a great joy to have reached the age of the Psalmist with a name honored and esteemed, having set an example for civic virtues most inspiring. May the years yet in store for him be replete with health, vigor and self-sacrifice.

God bless him and keep him forever and aye. SIMON WOLF.

MY associations with Brother Kraus since I have been a member of the Executive Committee of the Order have been one of the most pleasant and delightful experiences in recent years. It was a real joy to have had the opportunity to watch him handling the big questions that came before the Order in that placid, judicial way. Though masterful in manner, he never arrogates to himself any exclusive authority. His willingness to share responsibilities as well as credits for accomplishments is most refreshing in these times when so many men who have reached any eminence are self-centered and overlook giving credit to their associates. Brother Kraus has that rare combination of a fine mind supplemented by a big heart.

H. MORGENTHAU.

TO have rendered beneficent service to his fellowmen is the highest form of success man can achieve. Unless the activities and achievements of men esteemed great have been useful to and have made for the betterment of the conditions of their fellowmen they have been futile or harmful and not to be commended or emulated. Brother Adolf Kraus has not only succeeded in his individual affairs, but, measured by the foregoing tests, has been successful in the very noblest sense.

The purposes and operations of the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith are devoted wholly to the improvement of the condition of our people and the consequent benefit of all mankind. Its platform is broad, its activities numerous and extending to well-nigh all parts of the globe. The office of President of the Order, which he has held for fifteen years, has afforded Brother Kraus opportunity for splendid service to his people. As its leader, guide and chief executive, he has devoted himself whole-heartedly to furthering its interests and carrying out its purposes. He has given his time and energies and liberally of his means in performance of the duties of his office, with its multiplicity of details, in strengthening the Order and extending its usefulness. Only one imbued, as has been Brother Kraus, with high altruistic principles, actuated by love for the cause, supplemented by the necessary qualifications for leadership and for the performance of arduous labor, could have accomplished for and through the Order what has been done by Brother Kraus. His responsibilities have been great, his success equally pronounced. Through his initiative, tact and earnest efforts the membership of the Order has been extended throughout all the continents, its activities enlarged and made more effective, its helpfulness and usefulness in every emergency affecting the welfare of our people proved and its high standing as an influential and powerful Jewish international organization secured. His seventieth birthday offers a fitting opportunity for expression of our recognition and appreciation of his high service to all Jewry. May he long live in good health and may the Order have the benefit for many years to come of his wise counsel and active service.

CHARLES HARTMAN.

A man shall be known, not by his words, but by his Deeds. Thus saith the prophet of old. And true words they are.
Our tribute of real devotion, honest respect, and sincere
Love, do we pay—especially at this time—to our beloved
Friend, who gives himself unstintingly to mankind.

Keenness of intellect usually brings its materialistic
Reward. Our president has not desired that.
Attentive to his arduous duties as head of our Order, he has Used all of his splendid faculties—his time—his money—his life—in Service to the widow—the orphan—the sick—the oppressed—the downtrodden. A toast to our worthy leader—Adolf Kraus—the man.

SIDNEY G. KUSWORM.

I CONSIDER it a distinct privilege to be permitted to express a word of appreciation of the invaluable services rendered to the B'nai B'rith and through it to the Jewish cause throughout the civilized world by President Adolf Kraus.

During the entire period of his incumbency of the office of President I have been closely associated with his administration as a member of the Executive Committee from District No. 3, so that I can form a judgment based on personal observation and actual participation.

He was elected President in 1905. His immediate predecessor was Simon Wolf, America's foremost Jew, who, after long years of unparalleled and tireless service and undisputed leadership in the Order, was called to its Presidency to fill the unexpired term of our loved and lamented Leo. M. Levi, who in the fullness of his glorious manhood which he in fullest measure devoted to the altruistic mission of our Order, was stricken down by death.

New standards and conceptions of duty and opportunity had been set by President Levi which called for the assumption of solemn and world-embracing responsibilities.

These were the dominating notes of the New Orleans Convention in 1905, still exalted by the echoes of Levi's matchless eloquence and inspired by his loyalty and the force of his wisdom, spirit and patriotism.

Simon Wolf, though honored with a re-election by acclamation, was unable to serve.

Then it was that the eyes of the Convention with common accord fixed themselves upon a distinguished Brother who, in the councils of the Order, had won high respect and esteem for undeviating loyalty to its Jewish principles and purposes and best traditions, for the vigor and breadth of his intellect, his sane conception of the aims and ideals of the fraternity as applied to present and prospective problems and his public spirit and service.

It was to Adolf Kraus, gifted lawyer and journalist and sincere Jew, that the Order with one voice made its confident and compelling call for service, and, with the courage and devotion inspired by the highest human motives, he accepted the unanimous call of his brethren of the B'nai B'rith to the onerous responsibilities attaching to the office of President of the Order.

A calm review of more than thirty years of active and official participation in the local, national and international activities of the Order enables me to state that the services of President Kraus, principally owing to the complex problems growing out of the tremendous tides of Jewish immigration which swept our country, before and during his term of office, entailed sacrifices of time and effort, drafts on his physical and mental strength and constructive wisdom for practical achievement, all of which demands were met with characteristic promptness of action which proved wise, beneficent and effective.

Were I to particularize, I would unhesitatingly place to the credit of his administration: 1. The broad conception of courageous leadership which resulted in the wider recognition of the Order as the most powerful national organization of Jews, democratic and representative in its operations, which has united Israelites for their highest good and the good of humanity and to keep them so united.

2. Increasing the effectiveness of the Order by augmenting the numerical strength of its lodge units over 100 per cent. When he assumed office the membership was about 18,000. Through and by the efforts made under his leadership it now numbers upwards 50,000 men pledged to work and watch to preserve and cement our religious and altruistic union of Jews.

3. Maintaining and broadening through the assistance of ex-President Wolf the recognized status of the Order in all the branches of our government at Washington, as a duly qualified and accredited medium of dignified expression of Jewish opinion on vital national and international questions affecting Jewish interests.

4. Exerting the powerful weight and entire influences and resources of the Order independently and in co-operation with some other Jewish agencies in the demand on our government to abrogate the Treaty with Russia because of her defiant and humiliating denial to American Jews of their rights of American citizenship, of free travel and sojourn in that land of oppression.

5. Helpful and intelligently directed service in presenting to the Congress of the United States and the President of the nation, the protest of American Jews in all sections of our country, against the enactment of radically restrictive immigration laws and more especially the unwise "literacy test."

6. Pursuing with zeal and great ability the declared and long cherished purposes of the Order, to plead at the bar of civilization for the granting of equal rights to Jews in all lands where such rights were denied—especially in this connection signal and distinguished services in composing and harmonizing rancorous dissensions among more recently organized Jewish committees and associations, whose purposes to exploit differing conceptions and philosophies of Jewish life threatened the defeat of a united expression by popular assembly of demand and hope for universal Jewish emancipation.

7. Courageous consistency in the face of powerful pressure, in maintaining the lex non scripta of the B'nai B'rith, to bar action upon Jewish controversial questions upon which the great body of Jewry, lay and clerical, is divided.

8. Establishment by the Order of the Anti-Defamation League — whose national operation has by legislation and voluntary action resulted in a wider application of the principles of justice and fair play to the Jew.

9. Creation by the Order of the Social Service Bureau through which the personal service of the individual brethren of the Order impressing local social problems, has been stimulated through organized propaganda.

10. Establishment and publication of the B'nai B'rith News—our monthly magazine—whose literary and journalistic merit stimulated intellectual advancement and devotion to the doctrines of the Jewish faith and traditions, among tens of thousands of American Israelites.

11. Unceasing activities during the world war in aid of all movements to uphold the government, to arouse and intensify the patriotism of all Americans, to support the great war loans and war agencies and the foundation of the American Soldiers and Sailors League, maintained by special tax on the membership of the Order, to conduct welfare work at the great cantonments of the army and training areas of the navy.

12. Important constructive extension of the international activities of the Order requiring official personal tour through the foreign jurisdictions of the Order of President Kraus and members of the Executive Committee during which the better establishment of the B'nai B'rith in England was happily consummated through the tact and wisdom then displayed.

13. Official presentation to President Wilson before his departure to attend the Peace Conference and his acceptance of the address and prayer of the Order for his powerful intervention in behalf of the securing for Jews equal rights in those lands where such rights are denied.

14. Official representation of the B'nai B'rith on the international Jewish Committee at the Peace Conference.

In these principal undertakings by the Order at large, as well as the many other more or less important Jewish activities engaging its attention, the influence of President Kraus' enthusiasm, personality, ability and constant enlightening appeals in person or by official message, became deeply impressed upon the members and inspired them to a fuller realization of the present and future responsibilities of the Order to Jews and Judaism, and that personal dedication of the thought and service of each affiliated member was a solemn obligation which it would be unmanly and disloyal to evade. There was ever a degree of dignity in all of President Kraus' official acts, which inspired respect for his office, while his genial and kindly relationships with the fraternity in general and the force of his example of unselfishness in the ofttimes overwhelming demands on his time and thought, achieved for his leadership and administration a co-operation of the widely scattered membership which was as responsive, effective and enthusiastic in vancing the mission of the Order as must be profoundly gratifying to m.

As he arrives at the age of three ore and ten, occupying a distinguished ice in an historic body, serving a use to which he has devoted the best ars of his life, fulfilling the obligaons of responsible Jewish leadership thousands of men to whom he is und by ties of personal and fraternal fection, the tribute of honor, esteem d appreciation will spontaneously ring from the hearts and consciousss of his grateful brethren with lded prayers that his mental and ysical vigor will happily continue to ess and crown his public services for daism and humanity, and the private rcle of his delightful home. For mylf and district No. 3 I would send m as our tribute of honor, the assurce that we singly and collectively eply realize our sense of obligation r the progress of the Order achieved der his distinguished leadership from hich has ever radiated the ennobling eals of a higher reverence for God d a warmer love for man.

JACOB SINGER.

FIRST met Adolf Kraus at the convention of the Constitution Grand Lodge at Cincinnati in 1895. He as 45 years of age, the precise period an active man's life when the best expected of him; a sort of crucial c because presumably determinative whether his life is marked for faile or success. My impressions of him that time were formed instantanesly, and they have never varied in e quarter of a century of intimate quaintance which followed. I beheld man of singularly forceful personity who proved, almost paradoxically, be as gentle and modest in demeanor he was vigorous and determined in tion. His presence, suggesting power repression, revealed unmistakably a n who was silently doing big things l the time, and more silently thinkg bigger ones. Direct and terse in pression, intensively and fearlessly ank, and too genuine for pretense or laver—he was then, and is today, esntially a man of few words; but those o know him best have learned that s few words usually count as finished ragraphs. I recall him five years ter as temporary chairman of the contion of 1900 in Chicago, when he deired that B'nai B'rith ethics were mething above the standard code of orals; that we believed in telling the uth simply because IT IS the truth; doing right purely for right's sake. ere must have been a whole sermon these brief sentences, for, somehow, ey have dwelt in my mind all these years. He was then at the halfntury span and at the height of his eful leadership in journalism, law and litics; the recognized head of his rty in public affairs; a wise and conrvative executive in the organic life the several groups and communities ich made up the cosmopolitanism of icago's citizenry.

We find him today at the Scriptural ree score and ten, still in the foreont of a learned and honorable prossion, a trusted leader and safe counllor.

I know of no higher, yet no less sinre praise than to say of him now at, as the typical representative of nerican Israel and an ideal leader of n, I rejoice to call him friend and oudly acclaim him my chief.

LUCIUS L. SOLOMONS.

T has been my pleasure to be associated with Brother Adolf Kraus on the Executive Committee of the O. B. B. for a period of almost fifen years. During such a period one s an opportunity of learning the real aracter and motives of action of a lleague. From an intimate acquaintce with him I have come to regard Brother Kraus as one of the finest figures in modern Jewish life. From respect for his ability my feelings have ripened into deep affection for the man, as well as profound admiration for the capable executive.

His incumbency of the office of President of the I. O. B. B. has covered a most momentous epoch in the history of the world and of the Jewish people. There were many difficult problems to be solved, many delicate questions to be passed upon, many perilous periods, when a false step, or a mistake of method, no matter how honest and well intentioned, would have wrought untold harm. But throughout all these days of trial and of real danger to world-wide Jewry I found him to be a broad-visioned leader, meeting the problems with a keen intellect and deep sympathy and an unwearying patience, that did much to ward off threatening dangers and to alleviate unavoidable hardships. There was throughout all his guidance of the affairs of the Order a quality of statesmanship of such a high order that it performed immense service and great good, yet with it all so great a modesty of bearing that the Jews at large and even many members of the Order cannot fully realize how much was done. In addition, much of his effectiveness was preventive as well as curative.

Especially in his dealings with representatives of the governments at Washington and in other world capitals, and with the representatives of other national Jewish organizations, were his labors of such a character as to prevent objective disaster and to avoid a breach in the ranks of Israel. Yet through it all his constant and successful endeavor was to further the Jewish cause, to defend its name and to help its people. He was equal to every emergency, firm where firmness was necessary, conciliatory where conciliation was desirable, aggressive where occasion demanded, persuasive where persuasion could prevail, but never afraid to stand by his colors or to throw all of his great powers and abilities into play to save, to defend and to maintain the honor of Judaism, the cause of the I. O. B. B., and to vindicate the deep patriotism of the Jew.

All this was done at no slight sacrifice, for he gave not only of himself, but very generously of his means, his time and his comfort, at the risk of his health and strength.

He is now marking the 70th milestone on the highway of the years. Like Moses, he has led his people through a wilderness of dangers and difficulties, but, unlike Moses, may he be permitted, in God's grace, to see them enter into the Canaan of a peace with freedom, of a happiness without fear, and of prosperity without stain.

EDWARD N. CALISCH.

HAVING known Brother Kraus intimately for 45 years, having been associated with him in the practice of the law (which relation would in all probability be still existing had I not been elected to the bench), having witnessed his rise from a humble and lowly beginner, known to but few, until today he is one of the foremost citizens of Chicago, loved and esteemed by all, I am in an excellent position to testify to his possession of the qualities of mind and heart which have gained him universal love and admiration, and which make it very clear how it came about that he successively became Corporation Counsel of Chicago, Chairman of its Civil Service Board, President of its Board of Education and President of the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith. He is entitled to the greater credit because he is essentially a self-made man. Although denied all opportunities of a high school or collegiate training, although having come here as a boy, he was from the first thown upon his own resources and had no time or means to go to school, he yet, by his own efforts acquired a profound knowledge of the laws, language and institutions of his adopted country.

What perhaps distinguishes him more than anything else is his faculty of exercising a sound, wise, common sense judgment upon all affairs that come before him. He is pre-eminently a wise and safe counsellor, and, by his gift of diplomacy, readily solves the most difficult and even dangerous situations.

What he has done for the Order during his long connection with it, and during the fifteen years of his presidency, is known to all and I shall not enlarge upon it, leaving that pleasant task to others. It remains for me to say that in his family life Brother Kraus presents an example highly deserving of imitation. A sense of delicacy prevents me from going into details, but this I may say, that he is fairly worshipped by the members of his family and his numerous relatives. May he live yet for many years to come, shedding his benign influence upon our beloved Order so that it will continue to grow and spread for the benefit of humanity in even a greater degree than in the past.

PHILIP STEIN.

ON the twenty-sixth day of this month, Brother Adolf Kraus will celebrate his seventieth anniversary. Usually an event of that nature is important to the celebrant, his family and friends, and, in some instances, also the community in which the celebrant lives. Brother Kraus' anniversary, however, will be important to all Jewry. During the past fifteen years, Brother Kraus' life and activities have been inseparably bound up with the lives and activities of the Jewish people. As President of the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith, as leader of the most influential and most representative Jewish fraternal organization, he had a large personal share in the guidance of Jewish affairs, both here and abroad, and the occasion of his birthday celebration is therefore one of significance to all the Jews the world over.

I first came into contact with Brother Kraus and learned to appreciate his sterling worth twenty years ago, when I was privileged to attend the Convention of the Order in Chicago. The gathering made a tremendous impression upon me. Among the great leaders of two score years ago—Julius Bien, M. Thalmessinger, Leo N. Levi, Simon Wolf—Adolf Kraus stood out very prominently as the future leader. He had already then come to occupy an honored position in his city and community. He had attained prominence in his chosen profession, had served as President of the Board of Education, as Corporation Counsel, and as President of the Civil Service Commission. In all these offices his rare ability and integrity had been so manifest as to single him out as a leader of men. In a Jewish way, too, his splendid qualities of leadership had been demonstrated through his Presidency of Isaiah Temple and through his counsel and co-operation as a grand officer of the B'nai B'rith and as a member of the executive board of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations.

At the convention in New Orleans in 1905, all eyes turned to Brother Kraus for leadership and, after much pleading on the part of the delegates, he was persuaded to accept the Presidency of our beloved Order and to assume its burdens and responsibilities. All of us realized at the time that the office would entil great sacrifies on his part. Yet the fifteen years that have passed since his election have shown no sacrifice too great for the Order and its cause. He has ever remembered the injunction, "Be Thou a Blessing," and has given himself over unstintingly and unhesitatingly to the service of the great and glorious organization of which all of us are justly proud. To this organization he has during the past years devoted his time, his energy and his means, which made it possible for the B'nai B'rith not only to meet its many needs and requirements, but also to carry on a great deal of work of a constructive character.

His seventieth anniversary finds Brother Kraus in the midst of his accustomed championship of and devotion to the noble cause of B'nai B'rithism, and the prayer of the thousands of members and the hundreds of thousands of our co-religionists whom the Order has been serving so well and worthily ascends Heavenward that God may spare him many, many more years of life and strength and service, so that he may continue to be a blessing to his own people and to all humanity.

ARCHIBALD A. MARX.

Biographical Sketch of Adolf Kraus

ADOLF KRAUS was born in Blowitz, Pilsen county, Bohemia, February 26, 1850. When about five years of age his parents removed to Rokycan, in the same county, where they opened a dry-good store. The boy attended the public grammar and high school (real schule). Shortly after he became 13 years of age, his father died.

In those days the term of military service, to which every young man was subject, was seven years. To escape such military service, the boy's mother sent him to America when he was 15 years of age. Having been confirmed, and, therefore, under the Jewish custom counted as a member of the congregation, his mother had sufficient confidence in him to let him undertake the journey alone. The boy was confident that he would have no trouble in securing a position with good pay, but soon after his arrival in New York, he found, in looking for a position, that he was not wanted. He finally succeeded in getting a job as an apprentice to a cigarmaker, and as pay received his board and five cigars each week, but somehow he was not able to satisfy the boss, for he spoiled too many wrappers. The boss lost his patience and said to him, "Boy, you haven't brains enough to be a cigarmaker—learn something easier." His next job was as a farm-hand near New Haven; next, as a factory-hand.

By that time he had learned sufficient English to secure a job as teacher of German to a small class of boys. Before long he had saved up enough money to come West, where he took a position as salesman during the day and devoted the evenings to study.

By 1874 he had saved enough to enable him to devote his entire time to the study of law. In 1877 he passed his examination and was admitted to the bar by the Supreme Court of Illinois. He has practised law ever since in Chicago. In 1881 he was appointed a member of the City Board of Education. In 1883 he was elected president of the Board. In 1885, he was reelected president and served until 1887.

During the World's Fair of 1893, he was Corporation Counsel of the City of Chicago.

In 1895 he became the owner and editor of the Chicago "Times", then the second oldest newspaper in Chicago.

In 1897 he was appointed president of the city's Civil Service Commission. After placing all the departments of the city, which came within the civil service law, under that law, he resigned, feeling that he had done his duty.

B’nai B’rith Career of Adolf Kraus

ADOLF KRAUS was initiated in Oriental-Hillel Lodge in 1877. Immediately upon his initiation he was elected secretary to fill a vacancy. Two weeks afterwards the term ended and he was elected vice-president of the lodge and next term president. While so serving he was elected by his lodge delegate to the District Grand Lodge and at that session elected second vice-president of District Grand Lodge No. 6. He probably broke the record by being elected second vice-president of a District Grand Lodge fifteen months after his initiation in the Order. He was elected delegate to the Constitution Grand Lodge of the Order in the year 1880, and attended the convention in the city of New York.

He served on the court of appeals of the Order as a member thereof for a number of years. He was elected president of District Grand Lodge No. 6 for the second time in the year 1904 at the convention held in the city of Des Moines. The membership of the district at that time was 2,023.

At the convention of the Constitution Grand Lodge held in the city of New Orleans in the year 1905 Mr. Kraus was elected president of the Order to succeed Honorable Simon Wolf. He was re-elected president at the convention held in the city of Washington in 1910 and again re-elected at the convention held in San Francisco in the year 1915. The membership of the Order at the time of his first election to the presidency in New Orleans was about 17,000 in the American districts and now nearing the close of his third term the membership of the same districts is over 40,000.

During his administration, the Order also increased in strength abroad. A new district, composed of the Balkan States, was organized. To form that district new lodges were instituted in the cities of Constantinople, Saloniki, Philipopolis, Belgrade, Sofia and other cities in the Orient. New lodges were established in countries where formerly the Order had no representation, namely, in Zurich, Switzerland; London and Manchester, England; and Copenhagen, Denmark. Lodges were also organized in the Dominion of Canada, where formerly no lodges existed. The Order has now a membership in Canada of more than 1,500.

Mr. Kraus established the B’nai B’rith News, the official organ of the Order. The Anti-Defamation League was also organized during his administration.

Among the more notable activities of Mr. Kraus, we will call attention to the following:

Soon after his election in New Orleans he arranged for an interview with Count de Witte, the representative of the Russian government at the peace negotiations between Russia and Japan, held in Portsmouth, and in company with Jacob H. Schiff and three other representative Jews requested the Russian representative to submit to the Russian government an appeal for the potection of Russian Jews and for enactment of laws applicable to all inhabitants alike.

Mr. Kraus took the initiative in the matter of making organized effort to alleviate the distress of the Russian Jews caused by pogroms and persecutions. He requested the consent of the presidents of national Jewish organizations to attach their names to an appeal for funds and requested Jacob H. Schiff to act as national treasurer. The consent of the presidents of the national Jewish organizations having been received, he issued a call for funds, which met with generous response.

In the spring of 1906, the press reported threatened pogroms in Russia for Easter. Mr. Kraus wrote to Count Witte on February 15, calling his attention to the report of threatened massacres and requested the Russian government to protect the lives and property of Jews. On March 14 Count Witte cabled Mr. Kraus:

‘‘Adolf Kraus:

‘‘I am sure you have no doubts that I cannot approve violence, no matter against whom it is directed. The deplorable events which have taken place were the result of riots. You may be persuaded that the government will use all possible measures to prevent violence against peaceable inhabitants, without regard to what nationality they belong.

COUNT WITTE.’’

The following day the Associated Press published a dispatch from St. Petersburg to the effect that the Czar was reported to have been shocked and amazed at the revelations of Jewish oppression made to him, and as a result Premier de Witte was able to force the Minister of the Interior, Duronovo, to issue instructions to prevent further massacres of the Jews, and to prosecute all persons guilty of instigating them.

On March 16 he requested permission from Count de Witte to publish his cablegram and on the following day the correspondence was published. There was no bloodshed on that Russian Easter.

On April 25 the Chicago ‘‘Daily News’’ published the following cable from its correspondent in St. Petersburg:

‘‘The publication of a letter written by Adolf Kraus, of Chicago, and Premier Witte’s reply thereto, has caused a sensation in Russia. The entire press recognizes the Chicagoan’s communication as statesmanlike and humane.

‘‘A gentleman who is prominent in Jewish circles and is a member-elect of the first Duma, which is soon to assemble, said to the ‘Daily News’ correspondent today: ‘Mr. Kraus’ letter was timely, in that it induced the authorities to take measures for saving the lives and property of Jews in Russia.’ ’’

As a result of Russian pogroms many children became orphans. Arrangements were made by Mr. Kraus with the American government for the admission of pogrom orphans to this country.

In September, 1909, the public press published a massacre of Jews at Kiev. The State Department, at the request of Mr. Kraus, caused investigation to be made. It was found that the reports were unfounded.

In response to agitation to create some organization to represent, speak and act on behalf of the Jews of this land, Mr. Kraus called a meeting, which was held on December 17, 1905, in Chicago, of representatives of the then leading twelve Jewish organizations in the country.

In 1906 the B’nai B’rith was the first organization to forward funds to the San Francisco earthquake sufferers.

To aid the Rumanian sufferers, President Kraus issued a call for aid and the lodges contributed liberally.

On receiving a cable that an attack on Jews in Jaffa, Palestine, had been instigated by the governor, Mr. Kraus invoked the aid of the Department of State. The fact that our government caused inquiries to be made was sufficient to prompt the Turkish government to remove the governor.

In the matter of white slave traffic Mr. Kraus called a conference of leading members of the Order in Chicago for the purpose of finding means of combating the traffic. He drafted a new law, caused the same to be introduced in the Illinois state legislature, where it was adopted. Nearly all other states have since then adopted the same law. He caused a vigorous prosecution against the offenders, giving instructions to promptly bring Jews engaged in that business to justice. The result was speedily felt. The charge that white slave traffic is almost exclusively in the hands of the Jews is heard no more.

On Mr. Kraus’ request, Mr. Melville E. Stone, manager of the Associated Press, issued instructions not to publish the religious faith of offenders.

In the matter of abrogating the Russian Treaty, the Order, through President Kraus, was most active.

In February, 1911, the B’nai B’rith, the U. A. H. C. and the American Jewish Committee, through its presiding officers, attended a conference at the White House. As a result of the conference an appeal was made to public opinion, which brought about the abrogation of the treaty. At a banquet of the B’nai B’rith lodges in Chicago in 1911, the then Secretary of Commerce and Labor, Honorable Chas. Nagel, presented to the Order the pen with which President Taft signed the Act of Abrogation.

In the year 1912 President Kraus caused a meeting of the Executive Committee of the Order to be held in Berlin, Germany, the first time in the history of the Order that such a meeting was held in Europe, and the result, as far as increasing the prestige of the Order abroad and strengthening its influence, was most apparent.

During his administration the awarding of a gold medal to the man or woman, regardless of creed, who had contributed most during the year to the welfare of the Jewish cause, was brought into life. This, the B’nai B’rith Gold Medal, has so far been pesented to ex-President William Howard Taft, ex-Ambassador Henry Morgenthau, Dr. Adolphe Stern, President Woodrow Wilson and Brother Simon Wolf.

In 1911 Constantinople was visited by a great conflagration. President Kraus issued an appeal for funds, which was promptly responded to by the lodges. District Grand Lodge No. 11, Constantinople, in acknowledging receipt of the contribution, said: ‘‘By this quick and decisive action our Order has rendered humanity a noble service.’’

During the earthquake in Turkey President Kraus again took the initiative by promptly sending relief by cable to the sufferers.

For the relief of the Balkan war sufferers President Kraus issued a call for funds, which resulted in prompt relief being furnished.

Also for the relief of flood sufferers in Ohio and tornado sufferers in Nebraska President Kraus caused moneys to be forwarded for first relief.

The war between the Balkan States and Turkey was an opportunity which President Kraus utilized on behalf of the Jews in the Balkan States. He caused an appeal to be presented to the British grovernment in case it participated in the settlement of the affairs of the Balkan States to urge equal rights for all, regardless of religious belief.

President Kraus, through various B’nai B’rith lodges and District Grand Lodges, caused resolutions to be introduced and passed by a number of state legislatures, expressing the sentiment that all inhabitants of the Balkan States be accorded equal rights. He also caused a successful appeal to be made through the press to influence public opinion to the effect that Jews in territoy to be ceded to Rumania be not deprived of the rights of citizenship theretofore enjoyed by them.

In the case of the Mendel Beilis trial President Kraus sent a cablegram to Pope Pius IX at Rome, requesting that the weight of the Pope’s influence may be used to overcome the ignorance and superstition through which our co-religionists are made to suffer.

In response to his urgent appeal the Constitution Grand Lodge enacted a law creating an emergency relief fund to enable the Order to render aid in case of a calamity.

During his administration the 75th anniversary of the institution of the Order was made a nation-wide celebration, particularly so in Chicago and New York.

After America entered the World War the Order took prompt measures in creating a score of recreation centers and clubs for the social uplift of the Jewish men in miiltary service and arranged for proper entertainment in their behalf. The necessary funds for the upkeep of these clubs and centers were raised among the members of the Order. Subsequently, the activities of the Order on these lines were merged with the Jewish Welfare Board.

In the matter of the American Jewish Congress Mr. Kraus, on behalf of the Order, acted in a conciliatory capacity and endeavored to bring to an understanding the two large factions in American Jewry, one insisting upon the holding of an American Jewish Congress, and the other opposing such a proposition and advocating instead the holding of a conference of representatives of national Jewish organizations. At the suggestion of Mr. Kraus a conference lasting an entire day was held in the city of New York of representatives of twenty-four national Jewish organizations, at which conference Mr. Kraus presided. At this conference the question of congress or no congress was the only subject discussed.

Subsequently, all parties came together. The B’nai B’rith also joined the movement for the creation of an American Jewish Congress, and at the meeting of the Congress Organization Committee, attended by over 100 representatives of various Jewish organizations, Mr. Kraus was elected and acted as temporary presiding officer.

At the outbreak of the World War Mr. Kraus, on behalf of the Order, made representations to nearly all belligerent nations and to neutral governments, appealing to them to make the granting of equal rights and liberties to all peoples, irrespective of faith or race, one of the subjects to be considered at the time when the Peace Treeaty shall be considered. He received favorable promises. He also presented this issue to the President of the United States and received assurances that if the American government shall be represented at the Peace Conference the subject matter will receive the support of this government.

On the eve of President Wilson’s departure for Paris to participate in the peace negotiations a committee of the Order, headed by Mr. Kraus, had an audience with the President. After presenting to him the B’nai B’rith Gold Medal for service rendered by the President in the cause of humanity, Mr. Kraus again made a plea that the rights of the Jews be considered in the Peace Treaty, and appealed to President Wilson to exert his influence and power to that end. President Wilson gave assurances that, as far as it lay in his power, he would do everything possible to afford equal treatment to the inhabitants of all lands.

Mr. Kraus caused an official of the Order to go abroad and to make a survey of the condition of the Jews in the various lands.

When reports of pogroms in Ukrania were published Mr. Kraus appointed a

Gamaliel, the Jewish Leader

It was a stormy time for Israel beween the capture of Jerusalem by Titus nd the desperate attempt of Bar Cochba to throw off the yoke of Rome. uch a period required leaders, moderate nd at the same time firm. It found hem in Johanan Ben Zakkai and in amaliel. The personality of the later must have very strongly impressed self on his contemporaries, for Christion legend made him the teacher of the postle Paul, a sympathizer with Christianity and finally a Christian. His rmness naturally aroused opposition. . Joshua called him an autocrat, but ohanan Ben Nuri said: ''The body ust follow the head'' (Erubin,41a).

The Independent Order B'nai B'rith tands before a severe task of reconstruction in establishing ''brotherly ove and harmony'' among the memers of the house of Israel, divided by he catastrophe of the last six years. t also faces the task of organization n the Orient and in the former Russian mpire where now freedom made Jewish self-emancipation possible. At this oment the constructive genius, the firm ill and the hope in the future are ecessary. The Order looks with condence to its Gamaliel, the president, dolf Kraus, though he has now comleted the three score and ten, to lead onward in the new task which will ave to be devised in the next constiution Grand Lodge, and ''the body ill follow the head''.

Poland, ''Where Truth Is Hid''

We finally are in possession of the reort, presented by Mr. Morgenthau and he two other members of the mission ent to investigate the pogroms in Poand, published as Document No. 177 of he U. S. Senate, 66th Congress, 2nd ession. It is our first duty to say that Mr. Morgenthau was unjustly attacked s if he had allowed himself to be used or whitewashing the Poles. The mere act that his two colleagues, General adwin and Mr. Johnson, disagreed ith him so far that they found it ecessary to present a separate report, though they do not disagree on a sinle fact, clears Mr. Morgenthau of such ispicion. And these facts are the main sue. We have now authentic information that 300 Jews were actually illed in pogroms, although the members the mission prefer to speak of ''disders''. The Talmud says: ''We do ot go by the name but the taste of the ing'', and Cicero says: ''In verbis mus faciles''. So in the course of disorders'' in Lemberg which started ust as Austria was breaking to pieces, ov. 21-23, 1918, sixty-four Jews were illed, thirty-seven houses were deroyed by fire, and a synagog was urned. During the ''disorders'' in insk which occurred under the eyes General Jadwin, Aug. 8, 1919, thirtyne Jews were killed, only one of whom ad any connection with the Bolshevist ovement which is supposed to have irtated the long-suffering, kindhearted opolskis, and eighteen cases were ''deberate murders''. In addition 377 hops were looted, all of them owned by ews, and not one Christian suffered om pillage. To cap the climax, the disorder'' of Pinsk is now officially ecorded, and this report is in all esntial features the same which we had rough the Jewish press. A number of ews were peacefully assembled in the ewish meeting house on Sabbath afteron, April 5, to discuss the distribution relief. Major Luczynski, of the regur Polish army, entered the hall, arsted those assembled, and within an our thirty-five were executed. The atement of General Listowski that the olish troops had been attacked by ews is ''devoid of foundation'', and ''none of the offenders have been punished''.

As You ''Lein'' the Letter

It is a well-known Yiddish story. A student writes to his illiterate father for money. The father has the letter read by a man with a harsh voice, and says indignantly: if he writes in this way, he shall not get a cent. Another neighbor passes by, and the indignant father wishes him to see how impudent our present day youth is. The neighbor reads the letter with his pleasing, soft intonation, and the father is moved. It all depends how you ''lein'' the letter. General Jadwin and Mr. Johnson ''lein'' the letter of Messrs. Krapulinski and Washlapski in A-minor. ''Only 300 Jews'' were killed. In Congress Poland ''only eighteen'' lost their lives. The Jews speak a language which recall ''the heavy hand of the oppressor'', and were charged with German sympathies. The ''Neue Freie Presse'' spoke of 2,500 to 3.000 victims of the Lemberg ''disorder''. You can see the clever Jesuit prompter, taking advantage of the political situation which has got to scrub and lathe the infant nation just liberated from the heavy hand of the oppressor under whose unendurable tyranny such ''disorders'' only occured once within 150 years, and that was in 1848 when the Poles thought their time had come. Congress Poland is the territory which had a short existence as a vassal state under Russia, 1815-1832. The report insinuates that the Pole who a hundred years ago was a super on the Holy Alliance stage is a noble character, due to his seventeen years of Cossack training in ''true democracy'', while those whose grandfathers did not have this advantage, are in spite of their native chivalry tinged with militarism. As to their language we could ask, why are the public schools denied to them, if they are to become Poles? But the meanest piece of Jesuitism, worthy of the time of Stephen Bathory, who called the Jesuits into the country, is the reference to the ''Neu Freie Presse''. This is again in A-minor. The real meaning of the reference is the hint that the ''Jew-press'' wildly exaggerated the ''disorders'' for the sake of discrediting that lustry infant nation, who, as infants do under such conditions, kicked and splashed in the bath. Mr. Homer H. Johnson hails from San Francisco. He is persumably old enough to remember the earthquake, or as the San Franciscans prefer to call it, the fire of 1906. Were the first reports not exaggerated? The flood in the Ohio-Miami valley in 1913 was very bad but the loss of life, including those unaccounted for, was less than 100. Yet the press dispatches of the first day spoke of 5,000 victims in Dayton alone. In plain language, the two members of the mission who disagree with Mr. Morgenthau present the natural result of excitment to which in this case the absolute impossibility of obtaining definite information must be added, as an international Jewish plot to discredit Poland in the interest of Germany. It is but consistent that with all the evidence of ''disorders'' Jadwin and Johnson are sufficiently optimistic to make us know something of the history of Poland since the days of Stephen Bathory believe: ''That the Polish nation is disposed to religious tolerance and self-control in religious disagreements''. It is highly creditable to Mr. Morgenthau's Americanism that he says in the conclusion of his report: ''All citizens of Poland should realize that they must live together. . . . There must be but one class of citizens in Poland, all members of which enjoy equal rights and render equal duties.''

Popolski's Idea of Religious Toleration

The peculiar interpretation of the clause in the Treaty of Versailles, guaranteeing the rights of religious, racial and linguistic minorities, which expressed itself in Sunday law, prohibiting not only the Jewish cobbler to work in the back room of his attic but even the kosher butcher to sell meat to his Jewish customers and the Jewish burial society to keep its office open, has received a sequel. The sejm passed a law, disenfranchising all Jews who are not registered in Polish towns. The average American will not understand this provision, for he has no conception of the backwardness of Russian legislation which required that the citizen had to be naturalized, if he selected another town for his residence, so that a man from Witebsk whose grandfather had moved to Warsaw fifty years ago, is still considered an alien. All Jews—and there are said to be 100,000 of them who are not registered in Polish towns—are now declared Russian subjects and will be expelled. Again in the former Prussian Poland which has the proportionately smallest number of Jews, Polish Jewish citizens are not permitted to settle. Public posters in Warsaw call a boycott against Christian Poles who dared to sell houses to Jews. Professor Gregory Stanislawski held a public lecture in the main auditorium of the University of Cracow in which he read, what he declared was, a set of resolutions adopted in an executive session of the first Zionist Congress. These resolutions pledge the members of the congress to ruin the ''Goyim'' by propaganda for socialism, communism and anarchism. Attacks on Jews in the streets or in railroad cars and cruel tortures inflicted on prisoners, placed in jail under the most absurd charges, are of daily occurrence. The situation is distinctly outlined by Isaac Don Levin, correspondent of the Chicago ''Daily News'' who reports that the Polish Jews see their only salvation in emigration to America or Palestine.

Bad Neighbors

Conditions in Ukraine are evidently as bad as ever, and one might be inclined to think that the czarist ''champion of democracy'', Denikine, is the worst of offenders against humanity because William Archer in ''Current History'' (Feb. p. 290) finds it necessary to admit that the Bolshevists are not the only ones and ''atrocities are not peculiar to any party in Russia and Siberia''. If the bitterest opponents of Bolshevism make such an admission, it is probably true, as the Yiddish press reports, that Denikin ordered all Jewish prisoners to be killed, but Isaac Don Levin also reports that all parties in Ukraine are equally guilty of atrocities committed against the Jews which would make the Indians of King Philip blush, and the latest news coming via Copenhagen is that in Slavetchno, Volhynia, Petlura's bands, going from house to house, beheaded ninety-five Jews, among them the rabbi. General Jadwin whose denunciation of the German plot in the exaggeration of Polish massacres should entitle him to trust in conservatism on such cases, reports 29,000 victims in Ukraine up to Sept. 9, of whom 10,712 are known to him by name. One can imagine how this figure must have been increased, if the case from Slavetchno dates from Jan. 11. Lord Curzon promised in a meeting of the Anglo-Jewish Association in January that the British government will do its utmost to protect the lives of the hapless Jews in this section of Russia, but help will have to come quickly, if it is to come at all. Judging from conditions in other parts of Europe which are not so entirely cut off from communication, as is Ukraine, we are inclined to believe the report contained in a Copenhagen message that 90 per cent of the Jews living there are dying from starvation. It sounds like a fairy tale that the soviet government of Kiew appropriated 5,000,000 roubles for the publication of a Jewish Encyclopedia, but it is an authenticated fact that a Lithuanian Jewish congress was held in Kovno which was greeted by the premier who promised the Jews in the new republic complete autonomy, and sent a message to this effect to the Jewish delegation in Paris. We would have to await the recognition of the Lithuanian republic before holding thanksgiving services, but if Polish imperialism should succeed in gobbling up Lithuania, we may apprehend a repetition of the events of Wilna and Minsk.

Victorious and Neutral Countries

Abraham Mappu, the pioneer of the Hebrew novel (1808-1867) in a childlike naivete, quite natural for a Melammed from Slobodka, often closes a chapter in his ''Greedy Hypocrite'' with the remark: the situation is so sad that out of regards for the feelings of the reader we must take him into a more pleasant scenery. So we jump from Ukraine to Italy, where the Jews in modern times have never been disappointed in their trust in the effects of political emancipation. The king appointed four Jews members of the senate, two politicians. Ernesto Artom and Dario Cassuto, and two scholars, Achille Loria, professor of political economy in Padua, and David Supino, professor of law and for twenty years dean of the University of Pisa. With these new accessions the Italian senate has actually eighteen members, and the number of Jews appointed since Isaac Artom entered as first Jew in 1876, is thirty. Isaac Artom, 1829-1900, the uncle of the newly appointed senator was the right hand of the great statesman Cavour, who spoke of him in 1860 as ''giovane d'ingegno singolare e precoce e di carattere aureo''. It will have to be awaited what the result of the active participation of the Catholics in parliamentary life will bring, especially in view of the fact that Claudio Treves, one of the leaders of radicalism in the lower house, is a Jew, but for the present Italy is really the only country where the Jew has come into his own.

The Successors of Cromwell

What would have been the fate of one who in 1882 when the London ''Times'' so extensively reported the protest meeting against the Russian atrocities held in the Mansion House, Feb. 1, 1882, had predicted that the same paper will become a regular antisemitic organ of the type of ''La Vraie Parole'' and the ''Krueuzzeitung''? An article, headed ''Eye for Eye'', published in December, might have originated from any of these sources. The idea is briefly this: the Jews are Bolshevists, Bolshevists are bent upon destroying society, ergo. . . . Zangwill in his inimitable genius coined the clever repartee: Jews are the only people who have outgrown this principle. Passing by the utterances of Hilaire Belloc who sees in the recognition of a separate Jewish nationality the only solution of the Jewish question, which Professor Paulus of Heidelberg declared in 1830 when the first bill of emancipation of the Jews was introduced into the House of Commons by Robert Grant, and other trivial incidents, as the attacks on the ''very unorthodox Jew'', as Sir Alfred Mond styles himself, which led to a libel suit in which Sir Alfred silenced his antisemitic slanderer, we have to register the painful fact that a member of the government, Mr. Winston Churchill, said in a political address, delivered in Sunderland: ''The Bolsheviki believe in the international soviet of Russian and Polish Jews, we believe in the British empire'' (Jan. 3).

Anti-Semitism in Central Europe

The Land of Mirabeau

The remark of Mr. Churchill becomes more grievous when we learn that just two weeks before he delivered his address (Dec. 21) the Temps of Paris in an article given considerable publicity in England, proved by actual figures and lists of names that the charge of the importance of the Jews in the soviet is greatly exaggerated, that Leon Trotzky is the only Jew who holds a prominent position in the soviet government and that he as minister of war could not hold his position, had he not the backing of the army officers who served under the Czarist government. The Temps sums up its remarks with the statement: "La part prise par les israelites dans la mouvement bolcheviste enmble avoir ete singulierement exageree".

To the twelve Jews who in the French November elections were returned to the lower house, four senators have been added, one of whom, Paul Strauss, was re-elected, while the three others are new men. Among them, bsides M. Schrameck, governor of Madagascar, Lazare Weiller, a native of Schlettstadt, deserves mention, for in these elections, as in those to the chamber the desire to win the Jews over to the new regime is manifest. All parties at the election to the chamber in Alsace placed a Jew on their ticket, and Simonin, mayor of Schirmeck, was returned. It must, however, not be overlooked that the antisemites of the most rabid type succeeded in electing Leon Daudet, the son of the famous father, the novelist Alphonse Daudet—the Talmud would call him vinegar, the son of vine (Baba Mezia, 83b)—and that Barres who, however, like Libre Parole has moderated his tone. With great reserve we note a cable to the Yiddishes Tageblatt (Feb. 3) claiming information from a most reliable source that Clemenceau's defeat in his candidacy for the presidency of the Republic was due to his supposed pro-Semitism because his closest adviser was the Jew, George Mandel, and that the new premier, Milerand, had a secret understanding with Roumania and Poland, assuring them that the guarantee of minority rights in the Versailles treaty will remain stage scenery. The latter, whether promised or not, is a fact, as the Sunday law of Poland and other acts, both legislative and administrative, amply prove. Without comment we register two strangely contrasting facts: The military commander of Morocco expelled the editor of an antisemitic paper, but in Algeria, now for ninety years in French possession, the law excluding Jews from entry in government lands issued in 1904, is still in force, and a veteran who served as officer in the artillery during the world war and was several times decorated was refused registration in such a case. The religious situation of France is not very bright, as appears from the fact that elections to the consistory had to be postponed because the legally required number of voters did not put in an appearance.

To the pioneer country of Jewish emancipation we add the freest country of Europe which was almost the last to extend the principle of freedom to the Jews. The federal police authorities—something akin to our department of labor—of Switzerland, issued a circular advising the canton authorities to refuse permits of residence to Polish Jews as underisable. Indeed, the famous Hebrew essayist, Asher Guenzburg, who asked the Swiss consul to vise his passport, wishing to visit a health resort in Switzerland, was turned down. It seems that the humorous rule in a Talmudic law of right of way applies to the Jew of today: If you can not get it by concession, you may fly.

Spilled Quicksilver

What has become of Austria? "As sheep that no man gathereth, they shall turn every man to his own people, and shall flee every man to his own land" (Isaiah, 13,14). The distress in German-Austria is sufficiently illustrated by the one fact that new-born infants literally froze to death in a Vienna maternity hospital because there was not sufficient coal to heat the place. A monk was sentenced to eight months for burglary. His diary contained a list of his crimes with the entry: Sunday a hard job, but had a square meal at last. Daniel Salom, the son of a rich Sefardic Jew from Serajewo and a student of medicine in Vienna, took poison because he could not see all the misery around him. The congregational institutions are all suffering. The blind and the deaf mute institutes, both pioneer institutions in their line, appeal frantically for help. The rabbinical seminary has a salary item in its budget of 30,800 crowns which is to support three professors and probably clerical force and a janitor, but even at 10,000 crowns for each professor it means at the present prices that he has to spend half his annual salary, if he needs a suit of clothes. What the students shall begin with the annual stipends of 600 crowns, $2.40, at the present rate of exchange, is hard to guess. The numerous employes of the congregation threatened to strike and received some increase. The scochets are given 10 crowns (instead of four) for every head of cattle killed, but 10 crowns hardly buys two pounds of potatoes. This misery does not in any way influence the antisemitic movement. In spite of the fact that the large majority of the Vienna Jews are actually starving, the Jew is still decried as profiteer and as the cause of all misery. The loudest agitators are the clericals and monarchists who brought on the war, and Prince Alois Lichtenstein, of Tyrol, with the support of the anti-clerical nationalists is clamoring for pogroms which in a country with a weak government and unstable finances may at any time lead to a catastrophe. Nor are the internal conditions very reassuring. One issue of "Dr. Bloch's Wochenschrift", selected at random shows the extraordinary figure of fifty-five withdrawals from the congregation in one week. This would make—although the figure may be above the average—about four times the already disquieting number of apostacies recorded before the war.

The Crown of St. Stephen

In Hungary the reaction is developing into a regular white terror. Premier Hussar "advised" Max Szabolcsi, the editor of a Jewish paper, that the Jews will bring disaster upon themselves, should they support the radical ticket. Meantime Jews are assassinated either under the form of a trial as communists or without trial by the "white" soldiers. The government, unable to relievo the famine, tries to humor the population by wholesale executions. Even the Vienna "Reichspost", the organ of the Hapsburg junkers who are waiting for a call, admits that the executions were needed in order to prevent pogroms, which is as much as saying that Jews have to be killed in order to calm the mob which demands some kind of vicarious atonement. On the other hand a Catholic priest, although convicted of participation in the communist terror, is discharged by the court. The internal Jewish tragedy with a farce as side issue, such as we see on the Yiddish stage, is presented here too. The candidate of the "Christion National Union" for the Jewish district of Budapest is one Joseph Szterenyi (nee Stern), the son of a reform rabbi, and grandson of the scholarly rabbi, H. B. Fassel, who in his campaign spoke unctuously of the Christian spirit which has built up the land of St. Stephen and must continue to do so. The Jewish voters of the district had originally nominated a Jew, but he was given to understand that he must decline the nomination, else no one could answer for the outburst of popular passion.

Czecho-Slovaks and Yugo-Slavs

Our education is broadening. In spite of Mr. Creel's activity in the line of public information we are getting posted on ethnology, although even the Review of Reviews like Spakespeare in Winter's Tale, placed Bohemia on the Adriatic, and a Jewish editor in the United States whom regards for my personal safety prevent me from naming, did the same. So to make it sure that none of our readers should look for the Karlsbad Lodge in Karagoujevatz we wish to state that Czecho-Slovaks are the Bohemian and Hungarian Slavs and the Yugo-Slavs are those of the Balkans, comprising the Servians and Croatians known to us from "Wallenstein's Lager" and from Nestroy's comedies. At the head of the Czecho-Slovak republic is Thomas G. Masaryk, formerly professor of philosophy at Prague University and known to us for his brave advocacy of the innocence of Leopold Hilsner, the victim of a ritual murder conspiracy. Masaryk is a true liberal. He converted to Protestantism, feeling that the clerical landed proprietors were until lately the chief backers of Austrian autocracy, and he succeeded even much to the grief of Rome in inducing numerous priests to marry. This, of course, concerns us only insofar as it shows the man's liberalism. He is not entirely isolated. Emanuel Radl, professor of philosophy in Prague, comes out in the Czech press with a bitter condemnation of antisemitism which he calls a sin against the faith in mankind's future. Yet in the political bodies the "Svuj k Svemu" is like the Polish equivalent of Finn Sein an appeal to boycott the Jews. The peculiar national composition of the country which is divided into two distrinct groups each of which, Czechs and Germans, are trying to suppress one another, adds to the difficulty. It happened that in Prague the leaders of the two German groups, the democratic and the socialist, were Jews and the Czechs taunted them. They received their reward when, at a German national convention of the Czech republic, resolutions were adopted declaring that the Jews can never be "Volksgenossen". So it is Svuj k Svemu in German. Starving in Czech does not seem to be more exhilarating than starving in German. A Jewish family in Prague, consisting of six people, has been living for months in the morgue of the Jewish cemetery. It was the only shelter they could find. From Yugo-Slavia our reports are scanty. They reach us in a roundabout, absolutely uncontrollable way. We learn of expulsions, and do not know whether it is a case of war refugies or of Jews with Magyar sympathies or just one of these acts of barbarity to which in five years all mankind has become habituated. If deserves special mention, however, that Narodna Politika declares d'Annunzio, whose expedition to Fiume is naturally a setback to Yugo-Slav ambition, is a Palestinian Jew. The Austrian antisemites at tho time when Italy entered the war claimed that his real name was Rappoport and that he was from Galicia, which the French antisemitic journalist Ponsot still considers sufficiently disgraceful, while the Paris Cafe Chantants aro even so far accommodating as to claim that he is an Italian Jew by the name of Rapagnetta. We expect next to hear that his namo is Baron Cohn, and that he is the grandson of old Kaiser Wilhelm's private banker by that name, born i Potsdam.

Potsdam and "Umgebung"

Fedor von Zobeltitz, a typical junker in a Berlin letter which seems to b syndicated for the German America press, chronicles a resolution introduced in the town council of Schmorgendorf, a suburb of Berlin, to change the name of Hohenzollernstrasse into Heinrich Heine Allee. Herr von Zobeltitz adds that Oscar Cohn or Levinestrasse would do equally well. Captain von Ruckteschell in a lecture on the former German colonies of East Africa described the Massai whom he called the original Jews because like the Jews they pose as warriors but are cowards. Besides they are dirty, rub themselves with butter and have an unbearable odor. Professor Hans Delbrueck, Treitschke's successor as professor of history in Berlin and as editor of the "Deutsche Jarhbuecher", historically famous a the depository of Treitschke's "A Word About Judaism" which has been so liberally used by our Professor David Starr Jordan, declares Jewish influence a menace for the Fatherland, and Eugene Kuehnemann, professor of philosophy in Breslau, well-known in this country as exchange professor and propaganda lecturer, writes in a letter to a St. Louis German pastor that the Germans have such a genuine child-nature that mimicry nations like French, English and Jews fail to understand them. All over Germany antisemitic student societies are formed and even high school boys are annoying respectable Jews in the streets. A "Deutscher Schutz und Trutzbund" sends circulars inviting membership with the motto: "keinen Pfennig den Juden", the German for Svuj k Svemu. "Vorwaerts" publishes a confidential circular, issued by the antisemites, to prepare for a pogrom to be staged on March 1. It is strange that the clerical party takes a fair stand in this question. Its leading organ, the "Koelnische Volkszeitung", surprised us by even defending the Talmud against the latest antisemitic charge that it teaches Bolshevism, at the same time strongly condemning generalizations from the fact that individual Jews are leaders in the Bolshevist camp because Judaism is bound to be antagonistic to Bolshevism which fights all religion and sees the Messianic age exclusively in material progress. It is also reassuring that both in the Prussian and Bavarian diet the ministers condemned antisemitic propaganda. The Prussian minister of the interior also declared that under the existing conditions he would not order the expulsion of Polish Jews who fled from the terror at home, although they came into the country illegally. Tw tragedies might be mentioned in this connection. Maximilian Spaeth, a student in Munich, shot himself because the fraternity to which he belonged voted to exclude Jewish members. He had served throught the war with distinction as a volunteer. A similar case was the suicide of the Halle attorney Weissler, who left a note that he did not wish to survice the disgrace of hi country.

The Higher Diplomats on the Lowe Danube

Rumania at last signed (Dec. 10) th troaty with articlo 7 which stipulate that all residents of Rumania who hav not availed themselves of any othe citizenship (se prevaloir d'aucune autr nationalito) become without any formality citizens of Rumania. Clemencea announced this fact in the chambe with tho significant and somewhat am biguous phrase: "elle a fini par nou confier". Does this mean: Rumani may rest assured that we are not goin to hurt her, if she repeats what she ha done in 1878? There are—and this i indeed a progress—two Jewish members of the parliament, and on the ground of this fact the Rumanian government ordered the Jewish National Council of Bukowina, existing there from Austrian times, disbanded, while again in Besarabia the same organization is encouraged. The difference is this: In Bukowina the Jews are politically welltrained, they had members of the diet, of the national parliament, they elected mayors of the capital, they had university professors and judges of high rank. The danger is they may organize themselves with the Germans, the Ruthenians and the other small nationalities against the Rumanians who are a minority. In Besarabia the Rumanians (Moldavani) face only one nationality, the Russians, and therefore they expect that the Jews organized as a body would sooner join the nationality in power than the one which is in opposition. Meantime old fashioned pogroms, as Father Bratiano used to make them, are performed freely in Transylvania and in the old Russian territory, antisemitic posters and pamphlets are distributed all over the country, and army officers, having sent Mackensen home, are practicing victory on helpless Jews. With all this it appears strange, though rather credible, that the government offered Dr. Gaster, the retired rabbi of the Portuguese congregation in London, a seat in the Rumanian academy. Gaster was born in Bucharest, has written on Rumanian folklore, and was in the beginning of his career privatedozent in Bucharest, but discharged and, although born in Rumania, expelled from the country for having exposed the trickery with which Bratiano violated the obligation of the Berlin treaty. It is quite possible that the high diplomats on the lower Danube heed what the German antisemites called a ''Renommierjude''.

Zionism. Facts and Hopes

Herbert Samuel, the first Jew to hold a seat in a British cabinet, was selected as adviser to Lord Allenby, the military governor of Palestine. Does it mean that he shall be the first British civil governor of the Holy Land? It does make such impression. The Zionists, however, are not quite satisfied with the developments. Zangwill, in a letter to London ''Times'', declares that the present move is not fulfillment of the Balfour declaration. The Palestine, as planned, could at best be a refuge for persecuted Jews, but not a homeland for the Jewish people. Max Nordau again who, while in Spain, denounced the British promise as a deception, is now busy writing letters and making addresses, expressing confidence in Great Britain and suggesting a loan to the Jewish people—a novelty in history—to build up the new state. Mr. Lloyd-George is said to contemplate a visit to Palestine as soon as the treaty with Turkey will have been signed. Lord Northcliffe, like antisemites in general, is very much in favor of Zionism and also hopes to visit Palestine. Mr. Jacob H. Schiff whose sympathy for Zionism in view of his previous attitude is a gain to the cause, worth ninety-nine veterans of the first Basle Congress, issues a public appeal to the Jews of this country, asking them to contribute to the Palestine Restoration Fund. At a dinner given by the Zionist Organization in New York, Feb. 1, Secretary of the Navy Daniels spoke enthusiastically of the Jewish center, and Herbert Samuel, before leaving for Palestine, pledged the support of the British government to a broad plan of Jewish colonization. The Yiddish press adds the rather unintelligible note that the Zionist committee to whom Mr. Samuel made this remark promised to transfer 130,000 Jewish colonists from Argentina to Palestine. The report of the J. C. A. for 1912, the latest at hand, perhaps the latest issued, states that Argentina had 2,527 colonists, representing a population of 17,414 souls. This was read at the meeting, held June 29, 1913, so that the year 1913-1914 would have to have shown an increase more than the total of all immigration since the organization of the work in 1890 to justify this statement. In strange contradiction with this announcement we read that the Zionist organization in Buenos Aires petitioned the government to relax the immigration laws in cases of Jewish immigrants fleeing from lands of persecution. The Jews of southern Russia do not wait for organization and are fleeing from Denikin's and Petulra's hell as fast as they can. Quite a number hired fishing smacks in Odessa with a desire of reaching Palestine. Some came as far as Constantinople, where they swelled the large number of sufferers, others perished at sea.

Difficulties

While nothing tangible has been accomplished and the fate of Palestine is not yet officially decided, Christian Arabs sent a protest to the Pope against the pro-Zionist attitude of the British government, and the Syrians of Damascus held a mass meeting in which France was condemned for its designs on Syria. The Beduins express themselves even more forcibly. They attacked the French garrison in Galilee, and in the course of the raid two Jewish colonists were killed. It is said, however, that the Beduins are friendly to the Jews and only opposed to a French protectorate. It is interesting to learn that before the Balfour declaration which was issued Nov. 2, 1917, the French commissioner to Syria had received orders to make the Jews feel that France was sympathetic to their aspirations. So the Manchester ''Guardian'' claims, although it is rather surprising that M. Pichon should not have made this statement when he was interpellated on the subject in the chamber.

Adolf Kraus Lodge

A resolution to amend the by-laws of Oriental-Hillel Lodge, No. 72, was presented at its meeting on January 26th, as follows:

Resolved, That Article 1 be amended by striking out the words ''Oriental-Hillel'' and inserting in lieu thereof ''Adolf Kraus''. It was the wish of the Lodge to thus express its respect for the President of the Order, who has been a member of this lodge since its inception.

The resolution was adopted and was approved by the General Committee of District No. 6 and referred to the Executive Committee of the Order for action. Following favorable acttion by the Executive Committee, the new name of the lodge, ''Adolf Kraus, No. 72'', is now in force and effect.

Springfield, Mass.

One of the most interesting elections in the history of Springfield Lodge, No. 684, of Springfield, Mass., took place on Dec. 30, 1919. The contest was very keen, more than twenty-five candidates running for the various offices. Ninety-five percent of the membership was present.

A report covering the activities of the Lodge for the year 1919 was read at the meeting held on Jan. 12, 1920, at which occasion the officers were installed by Rev. Dr. Jos. Silverman of New York City.

Seeking Unto the Dead

By Dr. Max L. Margolis

THE presence of a noted English scientist in this country, of a gentleman much given to dabbling with matters beyond science, has aroused popular comment on the subject of spiritualism. The matter is one which will bear looking into. There is certainly a Jewish poiut of view on which Jewish readers should be posted. At the outset let it be said that matters of pure science are out of the jurisdiction of faith. Religion and science would never have conflicted had each stuck to its province or ''sphere of influence''. In former times scientists were burned at the stake or made to recant. Then it was religion that meddled with science. Today science invades the precincts of religion. There are scientists and scientists, just as there are ecclesiastics and ecclesiastics. The true scientist has to do with the things demonstrable. The ultimate test is that he can reduce abstraction to mathematical formulae or make things infinitesimal, like an atom or electron, visible, measurable. He is a searcher after reality. When in developing a thesis or a proposition he casts a sidelight at his next-door neighbor and seems to say to him, You see, I have robbed you of an article of faith, he steps out of his scientific sanctum and submits himself to the just criticism that he talks about things he knows nothing about. There are fanatic scientists like the fanatics in religion; they would ram down your throat their atheism, for instance. The belief in God has a philosophical or metaphysical aspect; science can make no pronouncement on it. When the mockers are wont to say that they scanned the heavens and found not God there, they forgot that the expounders of religion do not conceive of God as a body occupying space. Nor is it a whit better when scientists deem it their business to come to the rescue of religion. They are apt again to misconceive the religious interpretation, and they tacitly substitute their own notions. The proper attitude of the religious person is to acknowledge scientific truths when they are demonstrated. It is a false statement that religion deals with the things not demonstrable, and that the more of them become definable religion is ever narrowed down to a minimum. Scientific questions can always be reopened. There are no dogmas in science. A theory may be accepted until a man arises and demonstrates that he has a better, more perfect theory, and the old teaching is relegated to oblivion. Religion deals not with the undemonstrable, but with the invisible, that which in the nature of the case remains forever beyond the ken of scientific method. Religion deals with the realm of the spiritual. But spirituality is not spiritualism.

There used to be a time when God was conceived as a Spirit among many. The progress of religion did with them all away and named them ghosts. God ceased to be of them. It was not so that when the ghosts were banished, He, like some autocrat, succeeded to their domain. He was lifted out of comparison with them. It was a long struggle. The ghosts would not be banished so unceremoniously. Popular belief clung to them. The popular religion is always of the idolatrous kind. The Supreme Reality is too far above the comprehension of ordinary intelligence. So men construe images, counterfeits of the reality. They love to worship them, they long to fear them. Even fear is a pleasurable emotion. The human heart craves for objects of fear. You simply learn to propitiate them, and you are secure. Men also would lift the veil of mystery. Anything mysterious fascinates. It is at the root of the scientific instinct. Wonder is the beginning of knowledge. What is life, and what is the soul, and how do the souls fare when they leave the body? It is natural to long for communion with our departed. Our lawgiver recognized the human need for communion with God, so as to ascertain His will. The prophet was to be the only legitimate organ of revelation. Now, the prophets used all sorts of similes to explain their singular gift and the mode in which they are admitted to intimate intercourse with the Source of all knowledge. But their figurative language must be interpreted into the underlying thought. We know perfectly well what that thought was. If we give it a mechanical twist and take their veiled statements according to the meaning of the letter, we fail to grasp their uniqueness. Not even the prophet can see God with the eye of the flesh or hear God with the physical ear. The organ is within. It is a mental process. Only through the operations of the human soul can communion be established between man and God. The rabbis aptly say that not even the prophets caught a glimpse of the bliss which awaits mortal man as he is lifted to the spheres of the immortal.

But the people kept harking back to their preconceptions. The prophetic religion was too high. And so they reverted to seeking unto the dead. As the prophet Isaiah mockingly puts it, they sought unto the ghosts and the familiar spirits, that chirp and that mutter, on behalf of the living unto the dead for instruction and for testimony. The Law might forbid consulting the dead through media (witches, they used to call those of the female sex), but the people ignored the prohibition. In the days of the nascent Church it had to be forbidden to Jews to go to those healers who mumbled a charm in the name of the Nazarene. The sick will go to any kind of a healer. Spiritualism has its votaries among us Jews. All of us keep an open mind on the question. It is a scientific question. But we shall approach it with a critical attitude. The tests must be beyond doubt. But the dead of religious teaching are not disembodied spirits who have nothing else to do but to converse with the living. The business of the dead is to have their existence in the presence of God, aye, in God. To get access to them, commune with them, one must himself be transferred from this life to the life beyond. Some gifted mortals, gifted religiously, the saints, are privileged to have a foretaste of the immortal life while on earth. They are of those who, as it were, taste no death. But that communion is always of the heart. It requires no medium, no mediator. To have God within is the height of religious experience. And with God we have our departed, and in no other way. They live in us and we live in them through God. Just because the majority of mankind find it so difficult to have God,—for to have Him means rigid discipline of mind and heart, the regulation of one's every action in accordance with the Divine will, of living as He would have us live,—just because the normal man acts and lives away from God, he becomes a prey to every vagary which promises a mechanical grasp of the things beyond. But the mechanical is a thing made, an idol. There is no approach to God but through purity of conduct and thought. There is no other way to commune with the dead except through God, in Whom they are. All else may be science of a kind, or a fad, or a fancy, but it is not religion, and it is not Judaism.

HAIL TO OUR CHIEF

THERE is not a member of our Order in its eleven districts and its 400 lodges, there is not a reader of this paper, there is not a Jew, fair-minded and right-thinking, that will not join with us in our felicitations to the man who, for the last fifteen years, has stood at the head of the Order of B'nai B'rith, on the occasion of his rounding out the threescore-and-ten years of his life. His predecessors in the highest office within the gift of the Order had set so exalted an example of efficiency and zeal that it is no mean praise to say that President Kraus has fully rivaled their great achievements. Brother Kraus is too modest a man to claim the credit for himself. If left to state his own case, to borrow an expression from the phraseology of the profession which is honored by counting him one of its own, he would, as he will, no doubt, when the next Quinquennial Convention meets at Cleveland, ascribe the great and unprecedented progress of the Order in numbers and in accomplishments to the firm foundation laid by the master-builders and to the hearty cooperation of his fellow workers. But the case is out of his hands at this time, and he must, perforce, suffer us to say the things in our own way, or rather, to say them as they will appear to a latter day historian as he will chronicle the events of so momentous a period as that covered by the fifteen years now hastening to their close. Substantial as the growth in membership has been, the record of the Order's usefulness in so many notable deeds done and of its acknowledged weight and standing within Jewry and without, is a matter which will go down to history and which will forever be connected with the name and fame of Brother Kraus. The beginning of his administration, as does now the culminating point when we hail him as a septuagenarian, fell at a time when a war was completed by the signing of a peace treaty. If it is a truth, so forcibly borne in upon us in these days, that the fortunes of the Jewish people are conditioned for better or for worse by great world movements, it was doubly the case when one of the contracting parties was Russia, which then harbored the greater half of our people, at a time when, worsted on the battle fields of the Far East, it witnessed the internal rumblings which in these days resulted in the crash with which Czarism collapsed. But then the end was by no means discernible, just as little as we are now able to lift the veil of the mysterious future and to tell what the issue of the present chaos will be. The Jew has been charged with opportunism, with making the most of an opportunity as it presents itself. But for a Jewish leader to act otherwise would be tantamount to the worst statesmanship. Brother Kraus was right when he took advantage of Witte's presence in America as the plenipotentiary of his government at the Portsmouth Peace Conference to lay before him the American condemnation of the iniquitious treatment of Russian Jewry. In the pogroms which followed shortly after and in the subsequent years President Kraus was alert to take the initiative both in making presentations to the Russian government and in coming to succor of our unfortunate co-religionists, particularly in caring for the orphaned children. He acted with similar alacrity on behalf of the Jews in Rumania and in taking steps to ameliorate Jewish distress in Galicia. The part which the Order played in the abrogation of the American treaty with Russia received tangible attestation through the circumstance that the pen with which the President of the United States signed the abrogation resolution was presented to the Order. It was but fitting that the Order instructed its president to present to President Taft the first B'nai B'rith Gold Medal awarded for having contributed most during the year to the welfare of the Jewish cause. Only a year before the Great War we find Brother Kraus interceding for the Jews in the Balkan States and on behalf of the unfortunate Beilis, the victim of the slander of moribund Czardom. Then came the World War. Before any general relief measures were undertaken by any Jewish organization in this country, Brother Kraus remitted by cable the sum of $100,000 for alleviating immediate distress abroad. The Order was first on the scene with establishing recreation centers for soldiers and sailors in the various encampments in this country in order to strengthen the morale of the Jewish contingent in our fighting forces and was far-sighted enough to merge this activity with that of the Jewish Welfare Board, created later. One of the important actions of the Order in the matters that grew out of the universal conflict was the preparation for the presentation of the Jewish cause at the Peace Conference. Not only was the Order ably represented at Paris, but it was the conciliatory agency through President Kraus, during the perilous times when American Jewry was threatened by a split in its midst, calculated to endanger the very cause of the Jew. It is no exaggeration to say that at this juncture pre-eminently there stood revealed the man, the Jew, whom we honor as our chief, in all the saneness of his judgment, in all the soberness of a logical mind, in all the single-heartedness of a life-long devotion to the cause of the Jewish people. It is Kraus that lent an attentive ear to arguments for and against the proposed Jewish Congress; it is he that considered the issue in all its bearings in a dispassionate manner, with whom nothing weighed as much as the conviction that internal peace must be kept at all hazards and a united front maintained; and the proof came when he was elected Chairman of the New York Conference, which office he relinquished solely again from the highest motives of consideration for the best good to be attained. Again and again President Kraus gave expression to the unique position of the Order in keeping the peace in American Israel, ever ready to lend the Order's great weight to righting Jewish wrongs, ever mindful of the traditions of the Order in constructive statesmanship and in maintaining strict neutrality in all matters on which Jewish opinion is divided. It is in the Order that all kinds of Jews mingle and blend, the older strata and the newer, united in a common purpose, which transcends petty policies and the bickerings of organizations or individuals. There is so much work for the Jew to do, both here and abroad. The domestic problems have occupied Brother Kraus' mind quite as intensively. Witness the creation during his administration of the Anti-Defamation League and of Social Service departments. Brother Kraus has kept in direct touch with all the manifold ramifications of the Order's activity, he feels its pulsating life; he is responsive to every new stirring that will mean added strength. On the occasion of his European visit in 1912 he was welcomed by the old and the new lodges over there. The editorial staff of this paper knows itself beholden to our genial head for the great interest which from the first he has evinced in this publication which he was sagacious enough to perceive would constitute the most potent link uniting all the lodge members in four continents to one another and to the administrative bodies as well as all the institutions created by this Order. It is a privilege for us to join in congratulating Brother Kraus on the occasion of his entering upon the years of strength, and our prayer ascends to the God of Israel that He may continue to pour out His spirit upon this valiant champion of Israel for many, many years to come, that we may have him with us, standing at the helm of the Order, and in it and through it bringing unity and peace to our disjointed forces, relief and succor to brothers far and near, vindication to the Jew's fair name, rights to the rightless, and that with his aid we may realize to the full the potencies of our Order for advancing the cause of Israel and of humanity at large.

Victor Abraham

In the death of Victor Abraham, who passed away at his home in Cincinnati on January 4, 1920, the Order loses one of its most active and lovable leaders.

As a member of the Executive Committee of the Order, representing District No. 2, and as Chief Justice of the Court of Appeals of the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith, Mr. Abraham rounded off many years of service to the B'nai B'rith, of which he was a life-long member. Admitted to the Cincinnati bar in 1867, he was vice-president of Y. M. Mercantile Library, and the Ohio Chess Association; director and president of the Hebrew General Relief Association; director of the United Jewish Charities; vice-president of the Walnut Hills Business Club; president of the Cincinnati Club of Walnut Hills, from its organization in 1889 to May, 1905; trustee B'nai B'rith Israel Congregation and its vice-president, 1897-1899, and president, 1899-1901; Worshipful master of Miami Lodge No. 6, A. F. & A. M., 1881 and 1882, 1883 and 1885; member Scottish Rite 32; vice-president of District Grand Lodge No. 2, Independent Order B'nai B'rith, 1876-77, and president, 1877-78; representative to Quinquennial Conventions of Constitution Grand Lodge, 1890, 1895, 1900, 1905, 1910; chairman of Convention at Chicago, 1900; member of committee which formed the Ritual of the Order, 1895, and chairman of committee which formed the present Ritual, member of Court of Appeals of Order from 1905 and president of Court since 1910.

Rabbi Grossman of Cincinnati officiated at the funeral, which was attended by a very large assembly, among them being Sidney Kusworm of Dayton, Ohio, president of District No. 2; Samuel Rosenfeld, vice-president; A. B. Frey, member of the General Committee, as well as all officers of the District and members of the General Committee. Among those atending from afar were also Rabbi S. Kornfeld of Columbus, Ohio, and Emil Mayer of St. Louis, Mo., both of whom attended as past presidents of District No. 2, and Brother A. B. Seelenfreund, secretary of the Executive Committee of the Order.

Religion and Thrift

The Omaha "World-Herald", one of the great newspapers of the Middle West, has preached a sermon which might well have come from the pulpit of any denomination in America. The subject of that sermon is "Religion and Thrift", and it is based on the Thrift campaign of the Savings Division of the Treasury Department. In a recent editorial the "World-Herald" says:

"To the young men and the young women just starting out in life, whether singly or in pairs, there can be no appeal more important, save that of religion, than that which is made by the Thrift campaign. And thrift and religion go hand in hand. The precepts of, not alone the Christian religion, but of every religion that is worth its salt, are the precepts of thrift. Thrift is the opposite pole of extravagance—of self-indulgence. And self-indulgence is the road to spiritual ruin as it is the road to material disaster and to national ruin. It is by self-control, by self-denial, by rational sacrifice today for the sake of a more than compensating gain in the future that the will-power is made strong and character is built.

"A revival of the habits of old-fashioned thrift, coupled with a revival of the steadying influence of old-fashioned religion would do more for the salvation of this country right now and for the happiness of the homes that are in it than all the politicians could do if they were all working together.

"The home whose members practice thrift intelligently and systematically on the one hand, ond who on the other go to church, fear God and keep his commandments, will house neither "reds" nor profiteers. And when the storms descend and the winds come, as they will, all unexpectedly, some fine day, that home will stand on a solid rock though all about it are the shifting sands.

"The 'World-Herald' urges its readers, especially those who still are young, to think seriously about the meaning and purpose of the 'Thrift campaign' Take the question home to yourself. Consider it, if you please, selfishly, for your own good, rather than from the viewpoint of your country's good.

"Have you ever stopped to consider what it means—TO YOU—that the majority of men and women who live to be sixty-five years old are dependent on their friends or relatives for support at that time?

"But if you start—now—to save fifty cents a day, or a dollar a day, everything will be different. You will acquire strength of character. You will develop foresight. You will gain the precious power—without which the gates of heaven are closed to you—of self-control. And on top of all that, in twenty years from now, when you are still young, you will have several thousand dollars that are your own. You will have them in ten years. Do you know what a few thousand dollars can be made to do in the hands of a man who has learned wisdom, who knows the worth of a dollar, who has acquired the qualities that enable him to use money wisely and well?

"It means independence. It means the opening of the doors of Opportunity It means success. It means a home that is happy and safe.

Special Correspondence from Austria

Zurich Lodge Sends Food to Starving Vienna Brethren; Relief Work of Society for Homeless Children

WITH the coming of the coal and wet season the situation of Vienna became worse than it ad ever been before. In addition to e insufficient food supply, we have deal with serious shortage of coal. e cannot complain of lack of sym- athy. Indeed, even our enemies con- ole with our misfortune. But with l the committees, commissions, sub- mmissions, reports and with all the xpert opinions rendered by the numer- us missions of the Entente States rep- esented in Vienna, we have not been elieved in the least. There is no lack f will to help us, but the difficulty es in the lack of railroad cars, coal nd raw material.

The consequence is that people are hivering in their cold rooms, the rail- ads have stopped running, the fac- ories are idle, while unemployment ncreases, and with it profiteering and ood hoarding is growing apace.

Misery Unabated in Vienna

The Peace Conference created a con- ition which differs from war only in- ofar as firing has ceased. The misery as remained, if it has not grown worse. n addition, the high cost of living rings the middle classes to the verge f ruin. Nothing but a well organized olitical action on the part of the En- ente and a welfare committee, com- osed of the representatives of all parts f the Vienna population, could bring elief. The annual reports of our wel- are organizations furnish a true pic- ure of our misery. We quote as a pecimen the report of the general meeting of the Adas Jisroel. held No- vember 9, 1919. This society was orig- nally established for the maintenance f an orthodox synagogue, but it has rown beyond its original purpose. To- day it is engaged in all kinds of social ervice among the strictly orthodox ews of our city. Its annual budget, which in 1916 amounted to 26,000 rowns, rose in 1918 to 461,000 crowns, which is a proof of the self-sacrificing charity of our Eastern Jews, most of whom come from Galicia. It is also a no less striking evidence of the mis- ery prevailing among them.

These people have established for their conutrymen public tea rooms, kitchens for the feeding of children, and in addition they collected substantial sums for the relief of the pogrom sufferers. As this society grew out of a narrowly confined activity into a large scope, so have numerous other societies grown. Many of them have become unable to cope with the present situation. One of these is the Society for the Maintenance of the Blind Institute, which for so many years has done wonderful work. This institution, which for fifty years saved many blind children from poverty and want, is now facing complete bankruptcy and unless philanthropists are soon found who will come to its assistance with substantial subsidies, it will have to close its doors. An appeal to the public, which appeared in the most prominent Vienna papers, resulted in some tangible assistance, but this can merely tide the institution over a very short time, and cannot secure its continuance. In the interests of the poor blind, quick help is very much needed and we hope that we will find it.

The Children's Hejira

A bright spot in this picture of misery is the interest taken in the children of the poor. Frau Anitta Muller, the wife of one of our brethren, won immortal laurels through her activity in this cause. For years she has been the soul of the Jewish welfare work for Vienna children. Her activity is, indeed, a glorious record in the history of Jewish womanhood of Vienna, and arouses pride in the B'nai B'rith Lodges of Vienna, which assisted her most effectively both with financial means and with able workers from the circles of our brothers and sisters. Recently she succeeded in finding homes for twelve hundred of the poorest and most delicate children with Jewish families of Holland for the next four months, thus solving the problem for the hardest winter season. One who knows the winter of Vienna, with its danger to young people in the period of growth and the terrible distress and misery of these poor, undernourished and insufficiently clad children during the severe winter season, will appreciate the importance of this brotherly act on the part of the Dutch Jews who feed, clothe and care for such a large number of children. Our hearts are full of gratitude for their noble act.

Swiss Lodge Sends Food

Our brothers of the Augustin-Keller Lodge in Zurich also gave us noble evidence of benevolence, brotherly love and charity. They sent us a carload of wholesome and necessary foods for Jewish children, and the Lodge undertook its distribution in the most conscientious manner. Our heartfelt thanks would be brought home to our brethern more impressively if they were able to see the happy expressions on the faces of the children who receive their gifts. May the Lord bless them and reward them with happiness in their own families.

The care for the physical work of our children is supplemented by the interest in their spiritual training. The educational committee of the Jewish National Council established without much ado a ''real'' gymnasium (high school with a mixed classic and science course), of which we have so far opened the first grade. We have so many applications that three rooms had to be provided, while some applicants could not be accommodated. The principal of the institution is Professor Kellner, who, before the war taught at the Hebrew ''gymnasium'' in Jaffa. The principles on which this new institution is managed are guided by a modern and at the same time genuinely Jewish spirit. The Hebrew instruction naturally receives the highest consideration. Its scope is a thorough familiarity with the Bible, which is taught, not in a dogmatic sense, but as the most important monument of the Jewish spirit. A thorough instruction in the German language is also provided. Equally important is the care taken of sound physical training. The physical and the intellectual training are going hand in hand. The children are taken on excursions to the beautiful environs of the city, and gymnastics are cultivated. The old adage, ''mens sana in corpore sane'', has become a reality in this institution.

Communal Work

We can say but little of the activity of the Board of Tustees of our venerable historic community. The trustees are occupied with the heavy task of caring for the maintenance of the charitable institutions and with the support of our numerous poor. In order to meet the deficit the rate for the patients in the Jewish Hospital had to be substantially increased. This increase, however, was limited to the wealthier patrons, while the third class, which includes the less prosperous elements, the former rates were left. This fact does honor to the Jewish hearts of our trustees. While the surface of our congregational life appears calm, there is considerable activity noticeable in the agitation for the next elections. Both parties are active in stirring up the interest of their followers, and both are confident of victory. Let us hope that the elections will result in the return of candidates whose activity shall benefit the congregation.

B'nai B'rith Activities

The Vienna B'nai B'rith Lodges are working for harmony. In this period of internal strife they are uniting Jews of all parties and are helping all to work in harmony for the best of Judaism. There is, indeed, no lack of opportunity for work in which Jews of all views can take part.

One of these activities which appeals to every Jewish heart is the care of the 30,000 Galician refugees still detained in Vienna, who, by order of the government, are compelled to return to their former homes. This deportation meets with the greatest difficulties. Rapid removal of these aliens—as they are termed now—is simply impossible at present, because of the shortage of railroad cars. While many of them are willing to leave Vienna, their departure can only be accomplished slowly, which, during this severe winter, is rather a blessing to the many delicate women, children and old people. It seems that the government will not stand in the way of extending the time, for their number is of hardly any consequence in the population of 2,000,000.

It is self-evident that our Vienna lodges have a large field of activity under the present conditions. They are doing their utmost to increase the number of workers by a campaign for new members. The new lodge, ''Wahrheit'', founded with 40 brothers, started with the creation of a fund of 10,000 crowns for charitable purposes. The lodge ''Wien'' consolidated several funds, previously existing, for the same purpose. In the meeting held December 2nd several new brothers from Vienna, Linz and Presburg were initiated. Amongst the newly initiated brothers from Vienna is Professor Alois Pick, who served through the war as Surgeon-General, and holds a high rank in the medical fraternity.

With the three brothers from Linz initiated at that meeting, the number of members residing in that city has reached 24, and the chances are very bright for the establishment of an independent lodge in that city. We hope to see this accomplished within the next six months. While the number of members in the new lodge is relatively small, we place great hopes in its activity, in view of the high standing of these members, both in public life and in the Jewish community.

The same may be said of Presburg. The number of members in that city is slowly but steadily increasing. They are at present affiliated with the two Vienna lodges, ''Wien'' and ''Eintracht''. We hope that in the not too distant future a lodge will be established in that city.

Society for Homeless Children

Limited space compels us to restrict the report of our activities to a few remarks, which are hardly more than headlines. The figures published here show its beneficial activity. They are taken from the reports of the annual meetings and, having been examined by the public authorities, the statistical data are absolutely authentic.

The society was established in the summer of 1915, when a considerable section of Galicia, liberated from the Russian invasion, was sudden confronted with the question of how to deal with the numerous war orphans and homeless children. Thousands of such children were wandering aimlessly in the cities and villages and on the public highways, without shelter, without food, without garments, most of them dressed in mere rags, looking for shelter in abandoned trenches and in cellars of houses destroyed by shells. During the day they eked out their livelihood begging from door to door. To abandon these children would have meant to deliver them to a slow but sure death. District Grand Lodge No. X strained all efforts to save the lives of these children and for this purpose established the society named at the head of this report. It published appeals in the most important newspapers for funds to support these poor orphans; offerings were made in all synagogues of the former Austrian Empire, especially on the High Holydays. In this way we collected during the first year 1,036,310 kronen. In addition, we received a subsidy from the state to the extent of 1.50 kronen per capita per day for those that were maintained in the homes. This comparatively small sum, in view of the large number of our wards, amounted to millions.

The society has been in existence for four years and the claims on it are steadily increasing, in view of the constantly increasing number of children, which again, means an increase of expenditures. The activity of the society was recognized by the public, received its helpful sympathy and met with liberal support on the part of its members who recognized its beneficial work. There are at present 24 homes for war orphans in existence, all of which, with the exception of the one which is located in Ernsdorf, Silesia, are situated in Galicia, and require support, now exclusively furnished by our society. In addition, we care for about 5,000 orphans who had to be placed in private families because there was no room in the orphan homes. The society, through its branches located in various cities, placed the children with respectable families, where we pay for their maintenance according to local conditions. The Lemberg branch alone placed in this way 2,861 children.

Expenditures of the Society

For establishment of homes, including the alterations of buildings	300,000 Kr.
Maintenance of these institutions	500,000 Kr.
Maintenance of children in private homes	200,000 Kr.
Shoes and clothing	600,000 Kr.

While these figures testify impressively to the beneficial activity of our society, we have a special right to be proud of what was done in the way of spiritual welfare. In connection with the B'nai B'rith Lodges, the society provided for those who left the institutions work either at mechanical trades or in business, this method raising them to be useful members of society.

For the same purpose the society supports mechanical and trade schools and supervises the education of boys who are apprenticed to a trade. The real benefit of the society will only be fully realized when its wards will have grown to be men and women.

Even today we may claim for its activity that it is a glorious page in the history of District No. X, I. O. O. B.

How Yossel Horzhovitch Climbed a Little

A Narrative by Lewis Brown of Hebrew Union College

I

IN the hamlet of Mecklovsk in the government of Volhynia there lived many years ago a Jewish innkeeper who was before all things else a grotesque and pitiable little fool. His name was Yossel Horzhovitch, and because of his excessive foolishness and the liberal dash of knavery with which he flavored it, he came to be quite a famous character throughout the countryside. His body was short and rotund, and his head was big and black-bearded; and he was rich—as riches went there—uproarously simple, naively cunning, and astoundingly unlearned. An ideal rustic innkeeper he would have been and a paradisiacally happy man were it not for one fatal flaw in his make-up—ambition. He was frenziedly ambitious; he hungered for respect and recognition; he craved to climb into what our civilization would call "society."

Now, among the Jews in eastern Europe, it was learning infinitely more than wealth that served as the measure of social standing, and Yossel, despite his riches, was not nearly so respected as it was his passion to be. In his own hamlet his ignorance was not so marked, for of the few Jews there, none were at all learned. But whenever he went for the Sabbath of the Holydays to Rovno, the nearby town, his inferiority was thrown up to him with bitter cruelty. In the synagogue men would titter behind his back when he was "called up" to the Torah. In the House of Learning, where he would sometimes sit and listen to the disputations with a grave air of erudition, the townsmen would poke fun at him and howl derision if he dared offer an opinion. After meals at the Rovno inn, unconscionable humorists would ask him to lead in the Grace, knowing full well the boorish villager was not sufficiently familiar with the ritual to do so. And poor Yossel was not so boorish in his soul as to rest unmoved by this scorn and derision. Indeed, he was mortified by it.

"What do you want of my life?" he would sometimes cry despairingly to those persecutors, his hairy little fists beating the air and his big brown eyes brimming with tears. "You think you are all learned ones, gantze knackers, because you can sit and weigh down the benches! Pooh on all your learning!" And Yossel would spit breathily, though with striking emphasis. But in his heart he felt none of that expressed disdain for the learning of the others. Rather, in his heart he was profoundly awed by it, and bitterly covetous of the high social standing which that learning procured for its possessors. Few realized how bitterly covetous he was—few at least, until he made his extraordinary vow.

It was with the taking of that vow that Yossel first revealed his passion for social climbing.

II

The first child born to this innkeeper was a boy, Schmilik, and having been raised in the village, his education had been unavoidably neglected. Of course, he had learned to read Hebrew after a fashion, but compared with the town children he knew nothing. So little did he know, indeed, that on his thirteenth birthday, when he was brought to Rovno to be ceremonially confirmed in the faith of Israel, he could hardly read his "portion" out of the Torah-scroll—and it was on that occasion that Yossel made his vow.

It was a Sabbath forenoon, and all Rovno Jewry was gathered in the synagogue. Grouped around the reader's desk stood Yossel, the cantor, the synagogue officials, and the rav, and in their midst stood the little confirmant weakly hacking his way through the unpunctuated Hebrew in the scroll before him. A harrowing occasion it was for the boorish innkeeper. Little as he himself knew of Hebrew, still he could see only too well that his son was performing wretchedly, and even had he known no Hebrew, the subdued tittering of many in the congregation would have enlightened him with unmistakable directness. But it was not until near the conclusion of the ceremony, when, in the midst of the brochos, Schmilik halted completely and had to be prompted through to the end by the cantor, that Yossel swore his oath.

"Yo, yo," he then muttered vehemently to himself. "Never again shall this happen to me. With my next I shall do otherwise. May I not live to take joy in my children if my next son I do not make a rabbi! Yo, mark my word. A rabbi, nothing less! . . .

And that very day, badgered and teased to madness by a few mockers in the town, Yossel blurted out his vow in public.

Already at that time Yossel was a father of five other children, but all of them girls; yet that gave him no ground for anxiety. "Ach, that is the least of concerns. More will come, more will come," he cried confidently to the laughing townsmen when they questioned his ability to beget more children. And more did come—four more. But those four also were girls! So after all Yossel did not have a son a rabbi. Schmilik, his only male issue, occupied all his time in cleaning out the stables and sleeping. And the poor innkeeper, wildly ambitious but altogether impotent, was chagrined to complete misanthropy. And, to aggravate matters beyond endurance, the town wags teased him incessantly. On every occasion they twitted him about his utter failure to keep his quixotic vow, and now, more than ever before, Yossel was the laughing-stock of the region. Often when he entered the Rovno House of Learning several of the younger men would suddenly make as though they were in the midst of a heated Talmudical altercation over the question of whether Yossel should be permitted to divorce his wife on the ground of her inability to bear him another male child. "Yossele av ha-rav," someone ironically dubbed him: "Little Yossel, father of the rabbi." And the soul of this little Yossel was gloomy and steeped in gall.

III

But it is the chiefest virtue of a fool that he can never be despondent for long at a time, and at last one night there came to Yossel that for which he had hungered for months past—a way of turning the tables on his mockers. For those mockers and their jibes had grown intolerable. The very evening before that scheme came to him, he had been teased almost to distraction in the Rovno synagogue, and on his long cold drive back to Mecklovsk that night, the whole world had appeared incredibly malevolent in Yossel's eyes. The whole wide world had seemed to be in a conspiracy against him; the fat, round, silver moon had grinned at him maddeningly, and even the tiny stars had seemed to be winking to each other knowingly. And in his bed over the oven that night Yossel wept bitter tears and cursed the very day he was born.

But though the beginning of that night was sad, its latter end was full of great joy, for it was in the midst of that night that the long-sought way of salvation presented itself to the innkeeper. He could hardly wait for the night to end, and when at last he saw the sky-line graying, he hurriedly crawled down from his bed, washed his hands, prayed, harnessed his telyege, and drove off madly to Rovno. He arrived there just as morning services were being concluded, and, rushing noisily into the synagogue, he cried aloud:

"Hear me, you wicked ones of Rovno! All these years you have badgered and mocked me, but now I will show you who is the fool. I will have a rav for a son! I will!"

"But how?" one of the worst of the offenders—his arm still strapped in the phylactery, his shoulders still covered with the praying-shawl—managed to howl above the uproarous laughter of the rest.

"How? How?" returned the frenzied little Yossel. "I will tell you how. If my wife cannot give me a rav, then one of my daughters will take one!"

IV

He was in earnest, too; ludicrously in earnest. From that day forth he began to cultivate the company of learned men with an heroic persistence born only of a steel-hard craving. Yossel had determined with all that determination inherent in little minds to procure a rabbi for a son-in-law, and in the pursuit of his end he quailed at nothing. He knew, of course, that to pluck a full-fledged rabbi was almost impossible, and for that reason he interested himself chiefly in the bachurim, the young men preparing for the rabbinate. There were several of them in Rovno studying under the aged rav of the town, and they often led the Talmudic disputations in the House of Learning; and Yossel made it his business to meet with them on every possible occasion. But it was exceedingly painful for the little innkeeper; a more sensitive nature would have found it intolerable. Everywhere he was snickered at and made fun of, and even the little children in the Rovno streets came to think it their indefeasible right to pelt him when he passed by, and jeer at him with such epithets as "Yossele der Shoteh"—"Little Yossel the Fool."

Yet never for a moment did his efforts flag, and with a patience so vast as to exhaust even the worst wags in Rovno and a hand so unsparing as to daunt the most intrepid of the children, he labored on unfalteringly. More and more frequently he went to town and sat in the little House of Learning, pertinaciously listening through endless stretches of pilpul. Whether or no an egg laid on a holyday may be eaten by a Jew was a grave problem discussed even by the children in their elementary school; the grown men with whom Yossel congregated—and most of the grown men of the town who made any pretensions of learning, would meet regularly each evening and Sabbath afternoon and study Talmud under the rav and his disciples—had advanced far beyond that. These adults occupied themselves with far more intricate questions, and spent whole weeks arguing, for instance, whether an hermaphrodite ought to have been permitted to make the ritual declaration when he brought the first fruits to the Temple in those early days, twenty centuries ago, when there was a central sanctuary at Jerusalem. (By no means an unimportant concern, for it involved the grave problem of whether or not in matters of law an hermaphrodite might be considered a male.) And most of the time Yossel was gapingly awed by the depth of erudition displayed by the scholars; he would be choked by the fogs of citation with which they obscured each issue. They would arrive at decisions and then discover objections to the decisions and then proceed to remove those objections by raising still others in their place; they would unearth contradictory statements from obscure baraithas and pit them against judgments accepted in the Mishna—and Yossel would sit back on the rough deal bench and drink it all in thirstily. But once in a long, long while his simple common-sense (his yetzer ha-rah, his "evil inclination," he used to call it penitently) did gain control of him, and, pale with fear, he would stutter some naive question and with it wreck the intricate disputation like a millstone falling on a slug. Such occasions, however, were rare, and they never redounded to his glory among the learned. Most of the time Yossel was silent, listening intently and staring spell-bound at the thumbs of the excited disputants jerkily circling through the air.

And often the matters discussed were far from dry and unintelligible even to this innkeeper. Many of the passages read from the Talmud he found to be intensely interesting and stimulating. There were naive and fanciful legends and wise maxims, and noble ethical statements among those passages. Even the laws were not always uninteresting, for many of them concerned strange sexual matters, and the discussion of them invariably led to short interludes during which some of the younger laymen would laughingly indulge in telling risque stories. They were not crudely risque, those stories. There was about them none of the nastiness and nauseating filth, none of that odour of the sexually perverted, that characterizes most of the risque jokes of our civilization. On the contrary, many of them were so clever that they were almost clean, and Yossel took huge delight in retelling them whenever and wherever he could find a willing audience. On such evenings as he could not get to Rovno he would sit in the tap-room of his inn and repeat those stories again and again to an admiring circle of villagers, and soon a sort of regular story-hour came to be an institution in the village of Mecklovsk. Once or twice each week the Jews of the vicinity, Avramtschik der Brakker, Schmiril der Schneider, Chesskel der Baal-agalah, and the rest, would come together at the inn and listen to Yossel's droll recitals. And as the months passed by and the fame of that story-hour grew, the little innkeeper began to rise in the estimation of his fellows, until at last he came to be considered a great wit, and even a scholar. Indeed, in the eyes of the villagers he appeared a very wonderful scholar, for not only could he now talk familiarly of every tractate in the Talmud, but he could also crack a broad joke, and pitch a bale of hay, and milk a refractory cow without spilling as much as a mouthful.

Yossel, of course, was not insensible to this change in his position among men, and to give outward manifestation of his inner distinction, he began to affect the costume worn only by the most learned of the Jews. He discarded his rough clothes and high boots and peaked cap and began to go about clad in an immense black silk kaftan reaching to his heels and tied with a broad girdle about the waist, black pantaloons tucked into long stockings at the knees to simulate knickerbockers, heavy pious-looking tzitzis hanging to his shins and none too carefully concealed, low slippers on his feet, and a big fur-trimmed shtreimel on his head.

And—glory of all glories!—people in he village began to speak of him as 'Yossel der Chassid''—''Yossel the 'ious One.''

V

But it was only in the village that is newly acquired scholarship was recognized—and in the village he did not eed that recognition, for his wealth lone made him the leading Jew there. n Rovno he was still to an extent ''Yossele der Shotch.'' And he realized hat only some startling coup d'etat, ome signal victory like the capturing of a bachur for a son-in-law, could win or him the respect of the men of the own of Rovno. In the planning of hat coup d'etat he suddenly found e had to reckon with a newly arisen nd clearly insurmountable obstacle—Yente, his shrewish wife. This Yente was a scrawny little creature, thin-ipped and hard-featured, with a pecu-iarly keen eye for things material and a bottomless scorn for all else. Not that she was irreligious (God forbid!), but her religion was for the most part a matter of dietary and hardly a matter of spirit. There did exist such Jewesses in those days, just as there do exist such today; good women all of them, very good—but lacking a theological basis for their goodness. Yente was one of them—excessively vigilant in the kitchen lest treife food might enter; scrupulous in separating dishes used for meat from dishes used for milk, and cloths for wiping dishes used for meat from cloths for wiping dishes used for milk; but rather skeptical as to the value of most of the other phases of her religion. Especially skeptical was she as to the worth of those pious young men who spent all their days studying that religion, and violently antipathetic was she to her husband's desiring such a young man for a son-in-law.

Many months passed, however, before her antipathy grew belligerent, for at first she did not realize how impassioned was her husband's desire. So long as Yossel merely idled in the Rovno House of Learning she raised no objection; on the contrary, she urged and encouraged him to continue doing so. Yossel was really only a nuisance at the inn, persistently interfering in other people's affairs, and continually ''standing treat'' to pasersby. Nor did she object to his wearing pious-looking clothes. The extravagance it incurred was not too great and Yente, being very negligent about her dress, it pleased her immensely to see her husband in such distinctive apparel. But when she caught him taking trips to Tschinsk—ah, then it was a different matter!

Tschinsk was a fairly large city about forty verst from Mecklovsk, and its attraction for Yossel was its famed rabbinical seminary. After two long years of incessant search in Rovno, the little boor had come to realize that his chances of capturing an unattached bachur there were exceedingly poor. The few unordained students under the rav of the town had already been chosen—though they themselves knew nothing of it—as mates for the rav's granddaughters, and although Yossel had been conscious of this from the very beginning, yet he had hoped to win one of those students nevertheless. But after numerous broad hints from the rav and even some direct invectives from the rav's old spouse, the innkeeper saw his hope was altogether a forlorn one; and in the end he was reduced to transferring the seat of his operations to Tschinsk. And in Tschinsk he would undoubtedly have found a tractable bachur, for most of the students in its seminary were penniless beggars just praying for the opportunity of mating with the daughter of some wealthy man. To a youngster subsisting from day to day on crusts of bread and weak tea and sleeping on vermin-infested sacks of straw, any sort of a father-in-law is welcome so long as he brings with him a promise of wholesome food and a half-comfortable bed.

But it was just then, in the moment when triumph was almost within Yossel's grasp, that Yente interfered.

And she interfered with distressing firmness. Night and day she berated him, screeching at the top of her shrill voice and beating her flat breasts passionately.

''Thou are mad, altogether mad, ganz meshugah'' she shrieked repeatedly. ''Of what use are those learned young fools thou covetest for thy daughters? Only to eat, sleep and weigh down a bench—nothing more! Good working boys, smart business lads, those are the fit husbands for thy daughters.'' It was futile for Yossel to attempt to argue. ''Murderer, gazlan!'' she would wail whenever he attempted to reason with her. ''Wouldst kill thy daughters? Madman! Wouldst tie them to young ne'er-do-wells, snivelling schlemiels who will leave them to starve in the streets?'' And with the terrific force of her shrieking, Yente's stringy neck would turn purple and grow stringier still, and her green-brown eyes would flash consuming fire.

Of course, against such tirades poor Yossel was impotent, and to escape them he would rush off to the stable, harness the britschka, and flee pell-mell—to Tschinsk. But Yente was not to be eluded, even by flight. Soon she began to pursue her husband to the city of Tschinsk itself and, shamless as she was, berated him out in the open market place and in front of the synagogue, and even in the very halls of the seminary.

''I don't want thy pious nincompoops for sons-in-law!'' she railed. ''I don't want them, I don't want them, I don't want them!''

And, needless to add, she did not have them. . . .

VI

Thus was little Yossel the innkeeper foiled in his grand passion.

And yet completely and utterly foiled he was not, for as the matter ended, Yossel after all did indeed succeed in climbing somewhat. It happened thus:

In a little house near the synagogue in Rovno there dwelt an extremely pious Jew of so noble an ancestry that despite his poverty he was counted one of the first men in the town. He was not an ordained rabbi, but his learning and piety ranked him high above many who were; he was simply a chassid, an extremely pious layman. His name was Elijah Grodno, and it was said his family produced more great rabbis and chassidim than any three other families in the Pale. Indeed, he was a direct descendant of the great Elijah Gaon of Wilna himself! Yet he was wondrously modest withal; as modest as he was pious—and as poor as he was modest. A cadaverous grey-bearded old man, lanky and gaunt like a long black empty sack hanging from a nail, he seems to have fared at the hands of his God little better than did Job of old. In truth, his neighbors often called him der zweiter Iov. He was a chronic asthmatic, a widower, and a father of four daughters still unmarried. And, characteristically, he often insisted in the House of Learning—and insisted with an emphasis born only of secret misgiving—that this world is but an ante-chamber to the next. . . .

It was his daughters that gave him the gravest concern, for unmarried daughters in the Pale were, even under the happiest conditions, a tremendous burden. Among the Jews of those regions husbands were frankly bought, and if they were pious students, were for years supported by the parents of the bride. And, moreover, marriage feasts were elaborate seven-day affairs. A thrifty mother would put money from the very birth of her daughters to provide for their dowries and weddings. But for these poor daughters of Elijah not a kopeck had been laid aside, and they had little reason to dream of illustrious marriages. They were all of them pale and anemic, especialy one, Rivka—and Rivka was the eldest and had to be married off first. Zilikel, the town match-maker—a merry little red-bearded soul with a stomach perenially receptive—had lauded her many virtues and extolled her resplendent ancestry to the parents of numerous eligible young men; but he had met with no encouraging response. He had never approached Yossel for the sufficient reason that the innkeeper's son, Schmilik, had never seemed eligible. Schmilik had developed into a disgusting young lout, ugly, morose and boorish. But when Yossel heard that Elijah's daughter was in the marriage market, he did not consider his Schmilik nearly so impossible as did the match-maker. Yossel knew Elijah and knew of his noble birth and great piety. He had heard the chassid lead in prayer in the synagogue and had seen with what reverence all in Rovno looked up to him. And Yossel at once realized that to obtain one of Elijah's girls for his son would indeed be for him, the innkeeper, almost as great a triumph as obtaining a rabbi for one of his daughters. It would be for Yossel a great ascent in the social scale, and a very enviable achievement. But of course there did lurk in his mind the disquieting consciousness that Schmilik had some rather appalling failings. It did not lurk there long, however, for incessant covetous pondering on the possibility of the match gradually blinded Yossel to his son's imperfections, and soon he broached the matter to Zilikel. But he broached it with cunning diplomacy, endeavoring earnestly to give Zilikel the impression that he, Yossel, was not at all attracted to the match—rather that he was deeply humiliating himself by even considering it.

''What bargain is it?'' he argued loudly, and with a heat manifestly insincere. ''My Schmilik, my Schmilik, should take such a girl! . . . A maiden dowerless, without even as much as a kerchief to cover her head! . . . A girl thin as a splinter and white as a washed stone . . . and I suppose sickly, too. Ach, go away, Reb Zilikel, go away! Come not to me with such proposals.''

But Zilikel was not to be deceived by any such bare imposture, and quickly he retorted:

''But I did not come to you. You came to''—

''Sha, sha, sha. Enough, enough,'' interrupted Yossel with cunning haste. ''I will hear no more of the matter.''

''So?'' returned Zilikel with equally cunning nonchalance. ''Very well, then, I will go. A good week to you, Reb Yossel, a good week to you.'' And with that the little matchmaker crossed his hands in his sleeves and betook himself slowly down the street. But he had hardly gone a dozen paces before he heard the defeated Yossel calling him back.

''No, no, no, Reb Zilikel! I did not meant to send you off. Wait a minute. Listen.'' The matchmaker, however, did not halt at once. First he feigned a slight deafness, and then he made out he had more urgent matters to attend to elsewhere at that moment. But Yossel would not let him go. ''No, no, no. Listen. I did not mean all I said. No, no. Maybe it might be a match after all. Who knows? But hear me out a minute—yo, a minute, no more . . . You know, Reb Zilikel, if it is a match''—this sotto voce and with a meaningful nudge—''there'll be money in it for the matchmaker. You know''—wink—''I'm not a poor man, Reb Zilikel. No, no, I'm not a poor man.'' . . .

So Zilikel broached the matter to old Elijah.

It was a saddening proposal for the poor chassid. Meek and humble as he was, the thought of becoming a mechutan to Yossel and of taking that Schmilik for a son-in-law was acutely distressing. Probably he would never have become reconciled to it had not his sister-in-law, Malke, an aunt of the girl, urged the match with all her fearsome strength. Malke was an exceedingly unsentimental person, tall, bony, with a long face, a tight mouth and hard glinting grey eyes; a widowed mother keenly conscious of what marrying off poor girls means. She had had several of her own, none of whom had married with any great brilliance, and she was not a little piqued at the fastidiousness of her brother-in-law. She could not understand how so beggarly a man dared find fault with any sort of a match for his daughter, and she expressed her sentiments with no reluctance.

She was one of those women who have maddeningly shrill voices, but yet seem not to object to them in the least, Malke used hers constantly, talking, talking all day long. Always she had something to contend for, always something to squabble about, and once she espoused a cause she would contribute to it unstintingly all the powers of her redoubtable lungs. Poor Elijah lived in terror of her, and his one constant aim since he had married her sister had been never to afford her an excuse for complaint. But in this matter of Schmilik's—or rather Yossel's—suit he had tragically failed to evade her. Malke's shrill-voiced arguments dinned in his ears continually:

''Not a learned man? Ach, to support a wife nowadays one needs money, not learning. . . . What? Learning comes first? Pooh! Nonsense! All thy learning is mud, rubbish, if thou canst not give thy wife bread to eat. . . . Oh, Eliyahu, if only thy poor wife, my sister, could speak now from the grave she also would tell thee that. . . . He is not of fine ancestry, sayest thou? Nu, whom does the girl marry: the young man or his great-grandfather? No, no. Enough that thy wife—may she rest in bright Eden—enough that she was led astray by that talk of 'fine ancestry.' . . . Ah-hah! Now thou takest that argument, eigh? Well, what if he is not handsome? Who looks for beauty in a man? Who, I ask thee? Only fools like thy wife! And what did she get for it? An empty stomach and a cold oven, and a houseful of starving children. Yes, yes, I am not afraid to say it in thy face, my pious brother-in-law. She learned what marrying a handsome man means! . . . And, aside from that, what right hast thou to talk of beauty? Do not forget thy Rivka herself is none too comely—and none too strong—and utterly poor. And this Yossel—a fool and a boor true enough—is rich, very rich. He asks no dowry. He will even pay for the marriage-feast. And, most weighty of all, the young man is an only son and will not be conscripted. He will not have to run off to America as soon as he is twenty-one, and there make infidels of thy grandchildren. . . . Nu, what more couldst thou ask? What more?''

Thus argued the relentless Malke—and she easily prevailed. Old Elijah, limp and broken by her unsparing tirades, meekly capitulated. The match was agreed upon.

Of course it was but in the nature of things that neither of the two persons most intimately concerned should be at all consulted in the matter. The day of their betrothal the two youngsters were permitted a glance at each other—and a very brief and timorous glance it was—and a month or two later, still complete strangers to each other, they were joined together in marriage—joined together in holy and eternal (and indeed almost inextricable) marriage.

And thus it was that Yossel Horzhovitch climbed—a little.

News from London

By Our Correspondent,

DR. M. EPSTEIN

London, January 20, 1920.

If American Jews desire to know the true meaning of the Jewish War Memorial which it is intended to set up in this country, they cannot do better than to refer to the statement issued by the organizers of the scheme. What do they say? Their aim is to ''establish in the Empire a permanent center of Jewish learning and a monument to the spirit and the purpose which are the heritage and the privilege of Jews. Such a Jewish center in the British Empire, with its powers for the spiritual life, and for the full, pure knowledge of God and man, on which alone those powers are safely based, radiating from a fixed point in all directions and extending the beneficence of Hebraism over the wreckage of militarism and materialism, is the obvious, urgent form which the Jewish Memoial must take''.

The scheme, it is pointed out, ''leaves no Jewish instinct unsatisfied. It fills gaps in the existing organization of Jewish religious education, and it builds on those tried foundations a new and a stronger edifice for the preservation and spread of the moral law. By insuring that every Jewish child shall be brought up in the knowledge of Judaism, that no Jew or Jewess in the future, no Jewish soldier in the battle of life, need be confounded by teachers of other creeds on account of his indifference to his own, the memorial is intended and will contrive to insure the adherence to Judaism by Jews. This is the root idea of the Jewish War Memorial scheme''.

Jews' College Registration

This is finely put, and raises the endeavor to a high plane. On this basis it deserves to succeed, and there is little doubt but that it will. When that stage is reached one of the first institutions to profit will be Jews' College. With us here, as with you, there is a growing shortage of candidates for the ministry. All the apparatus of Jews' College, for instance, serves only thirteen students all told, of whom seven are in the preliminary class. In effect, therefore, there are only six full students at Jews' College. The prospect is not pleasing. There may come a time when Jewish communities in this country will not be able to find spiritual leaders. The phenomenon is intelligible; nor does our community stand alone in having to face this problem. As in the country generally there is a marked tendency for university men to be attracted into commerce because commerce offers better prospects than academic callings, so in the ministry, promising candidates are sucked up in the stream of business because business yields more for the needs of life. It is an economic problem. Who can blame a young man if, conscious of the beggarly pittances given to ministers, he decides to seek his fortune in other walks of life? Nay, more, many ministers already in harness have thrown up their work for more mundane activities because the latter are able to furnish more of the material things of life. Some of these men have turned their backs on the ministry because they are worldly minded. Others because human endurance has its limits. What is the result? Only the weaklings are left, at a critical time when the very best brains are needed for the guidance of a rising generation.

New Responsibilities

A great responsibility rests on Anglo-Jewry. Before the war the Jewish communities of Germany and Austria nobly shouldered part of the Jewish burden. They assisted their brethren in the lands of oppression in eastern Europe; they had their splendid organizations for assisting the helpless and coming to the rescue of the weak. The war has changed the face of the central empires. Economically, conditions are likely to be hard there for many a day, and the disease of anti-Semitism, the symptom of a decaying morality, is making terrible ravages among the German people. The position of the Jews is thus unenviable. They will require all their strength for internal consolidation, and it will be long before they will again be able to play a leading part in Jewry. Their burden will naturally pass to Anglo-Jewry, and for two main reasons: Anglo-Jewry has a noble tradition and is well able to maintain it, and this country is likely to become the political center of gravity in Europe.

A League of Jewries

If in this statement of the position no reference is made to America, our American brethren will understand that this is not due to any lack of consideration, but merely to geographical conditions. America is far away from Europe; England is near. That is why England will have to shoulder the burden first. But American Jewry cannot be left out. It ought to be a point of policy with Jewish leaders in both countries to bring about co-operation between the two communities. Why not a close working arrangement for all English-speaking Jews? Here the Order may possibly be able to lead the way, and the London Lodge destined to play a part in cementing such an understanding. One way might be for the Order to open an office in London, which would be a clearing house of ideas and needs for the Old World, a channel of intercourse between the Old World and the New, and a transmitting station of American enthusiasm for the Jewries of Europe. Is there not great scope for the Order here? And is not this the psychological moment? The problems of Jewry are the same the world over. Religious education, the supply of ministers, helping the poor and healing the sick, defense against defamation, combatting the lies of the anti-Semites—are not these needs common to all of us? This is the age of the League of Nations. Why not a League of the Jewries of the world? Whatever happens in Palestine, the majority of Jews will still be in the Diaspora. Why should they not unite for common action? In the multitude of counsellors there is safety.

Dr. Nordau in London

We have in London at present a Jew who is well-known all over the world—Dr. Max Nordau. His head is graced with the crown of old age; but his spirit is young still. We saw him recently fondle a little girl; only a woman could have shown such touching tenderness. Children and animals are his passion; and those who love children must be forever young. Nordau has suffered much during the war; and now he is finding sympathetic and kindly attention among friends. It is quite clear that he has not yet become accustomed to his present environment, and his public utterances are wisely guarded. Only to one, made quite soon after his landing, was exception taken as being ill-advised. Here it is—a conversation between a journalist and Nordau:

''On the question of dual nationality, Doctor, what will be the attitude of the Palestinian Jewry towards other Jews?''

''There can be no question of double nationality.''

''Then, to the Jews of Palestine, Jews living in England will be foreigners?''

Dr. Nordau hesitated. ''I have my own ideas on that, but I could not say it will be adopted by the new State. The Palestinian Jews would have their status as citizens of Palestine. If other Jews in Britain prefer to hold to their British citizenship we should not try to prevent them. On the other hand, those who live in foreign countries, but desire to be Palestinians, can do so; they would be subject to certain small taxes. But there can be no double nationality admitted by the new State.''

This is a personal view only, although the person concerned is a prominent Zionist leader. It should be remembered, however, that the movement as such has formulated no views on this question. How could it, seeing that nothing definite has yet been settled about the status of Palestine and the Jewish population there? The leaders are, however, making plans in regard to practical questions, such as colonization and economic developments, and Nordau is assisting with all his might. Meanwhile, Mr. Herbert Samuel has gone out to Palestine to consult with Lord Allenby, and no better choice could have been made. Mr. Samuel's brother, Sir Stuart, has likewise been on a mission in which Jews are concerned; he has just returned from Poland, and his report is awaited with interest. In order to show public appreciation of the services of Sir Stuart, a dinner is to be given shortly in his honor.

Obituary

Public men of the type of the Samuel brothers are not too numerous, and when one joins the great majority the community is the poorer. During the last month we have had to deplore the loss of Sir Charles Henry, a prominent politician, a distinguished Member of Parliament, and one of the foremost leaders of the Liberal Party. In the community he was known as the principal supporter of the Jewish Soup Kitchen, and as the main financial power behind the new Jewish paper in London. His views on Jewish problems may not have found ready acceptance among all classes of his fellow-Jews, yet Sir Charles Henry was a prominent citizen. Different from him in every way was another Jew of distinction, who has also gone to his eternal rest. Philip Ornstein, the secretary of the United Synagogue, wielded a great influence on the internal organization of the community in that he managed the communal machine. The United Synagogue controls the majority of the Jewish ministers in London, and the chorus of praise which came from them is a good indication of the tact and common sense of Ornstein. In the domestic economy of the community his was a position of some importance, and it looks at present as though it will be difficult to fill it adequately. But we shall see.

Hospital Sunday

It is to illustrate this spirit that we again call attention to a fact worth noting. We have in London an institution called Hospital Sunday, one Sunday in the year when collections are made for the Metropolitan hospitals. Needless to add, Jews participate, and though they form one of the smaller communities in the capital, their contribution is the second largest, coming after that of the Church of England. A total of £40,000 was collected in 1919, of which some £29,000 came from the National Church, and £2,000 from the Jews. In order to place this amount in its proper perspective, the following figures should also be given: From the Congregationalists there came £1,800; from the Wesleyans £1,100; from the Baptists, £1,000; from the Congregationalists, likewise £1,000; from the Roman Catholics, £938, and the rest from numerous smaller bodies. But the Jews, in point of numbers, are among the smallest, yet their share was great. This is as it should be.

The Woman Preacher

The women are coming into their own. We now have at least one lady in the House of Commons, and women's influence is making itself more and more felt for good in public life. It is not, therefore, so very surprising to hear that at one of our Synagogues there was recently a woman preacher. The Synagogue was that at Cambridge. which is conducted by and for the students of that ancient university, and the preacher was a lady learned in Hebrew lore. She was no other than Mrs. Redcliffe Salaman, whose husband is an old Cambridge man, and whose home is not far from the university town. But Mrs. Salaman is also the daughter of the late Arthur Davis, who taught his girls so much Hebrew that they could vie with many a Jewish minister in knowledge of Jewish literature. Mrs. Salaman has rendered many an old piut into beautiful English verse, and may lay claim, apart from this, to be a poetess. Who, then, could be more fitted to preach in a Synagogue? But this interesting event does not stand alone. We believe that one of the Jewish congregations in Glasgow has enfranchised its women members, giving them equal rights with men. The prospect holds out some puzzling possibilities. Will women sit in the ''warder's box''? Will a woman distribute the Mitzvot? And what far-reaching consequences will all this have on the religious education of Jewish girls? It may appear strange, but stranger things have happened. Perhaps the United Synagogue, that stronghold of anti-deluvianism, may also open its doors and its ears to women's advice. It must be confessed that there are many women who would be glad to join the Lodge as full members. So far, however, they are contenting themselves with the Women's Auxiliary, which appears to have found favor. The first official meeting of this body is to be held towards the end of the month, and no doubt more will be heard of it in this column in due course. The Lodge, too, commences its full peace year in February, and all the brethern entertain hopes of considerable achievements before it closes. Last year still had some of the difficulties of the war period, and Brother Goodman, our president, has been a tower of strength throughout.

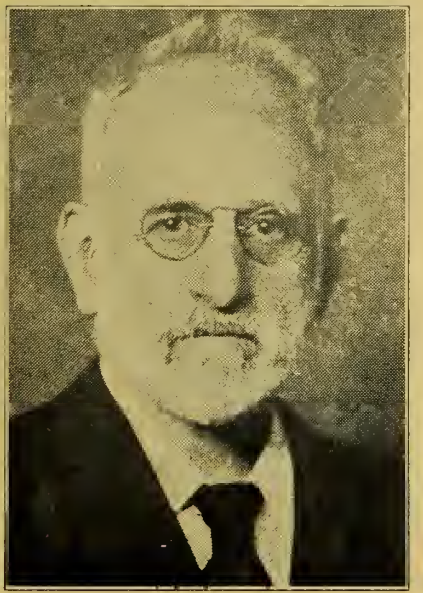
European Fund Distributor

Announcement is made by Felix M. Warburg of Kuhn, Loeb and Company, chairman of the Joint Distribution Committee of the American Funds for Jewish War Sufferers, that Dr. Julius Goldman, of this city, active in Jewish philanthropy for nearly half a century, has been selected to head all the American Jewish relief activities of the Joint Distribution Committee in Europe, with the title of director general.

Dr. Goldman, Mr. Warburg stated, sailed this week on the Mauretania and will be absent more than a year. Dr. Goldman accepted the responsibility upon the solicitation of the members of the Joint Distribution Committee, who comprise the leaders of Jewry throughout the United States, and has given up all of his personal affairs to devote his entire time to the tasks of immediate relief and future rehabilitation of the Jews in every country abroad affected by the war.

The selection of Dr. Goldman and his departure marks the extension of the plans of the Committee for affording permanent aid on behalf of American Jewry to the Jews of Europe and the distribution of the funds and supplies secured in the United States.

It will be the task of Dr. Goldman to receive the reports from the different countries where relief for the Jewish populations is so urgently needed, to negotiate with the officials of the various governments, to co-operate with the American Relief Administration European Children's Fund, headed by Mr. Hoover, the Red Cross and other organizations, and to transmit to the Joint Distribution Committee the information which is only to be obtained at first hand, so that the Committee, in its appropriations and in its shipments of clothing and foodstuffs, may be guided by a knowledge of the situation as it affects all of the countries of Europe rather than any one locality.



Dr. Julius Goldman

The Joint Distribution Committee will now be in a position, through its American representatives abroad, to judge much more accurately and to act with much greater efficiency in relieving the conditions which afflict the great percentage of all the Jews in Europe.

Student Service at Ann Arbor

Approximately four thousand students, members of the factulty of the University of Michigan, and townspeople of Ann Arbor assembled in the great Hill Auditorium on the evening of Sunday, January 18th, to participate in the seventh annual union service, held under the joint auspices of the University of Michigan and the Jewish Student Congregation of the University of Michigan.

The music on this occasion was furnished by a chorus of eighty students, and was highly inspiring. The service was participated in by Rabbi Leo M. Franklin, of Detroit, Supervising Rabbi of the Student Congregation; the Scripture lesson was read by Prof. Trueblood, of the Department of Oratory, and the traditional three-fold benediction was pronounced by Rev. C. C. Robbins, of the Unitarian Church.

Rabbi Louis Wolsey, of the Euclid Avenue Temple, Cleveland, Ohio, was the preacher of the evening and he gave a masterful and inspiring address on the subject, "Religion and Honest Doubt". The sermon was pronounced by many who heard it to be one of the most stimulating addresses that has been made to the students of the University in a long time.

The Jewish Student Congregation of the University of Michigan is steadily growing, not only in numbers, but in influence from year to year. Each week religious services are held in Lane Hall through the hospitality of the University Y. M. C. A. However, there is a growing need for a Jewish chapel at the University of Michigan, in which all distinctly Jewish activities may center. It is hoped that means may soon be found for the building of such a chapel.

Students Hold Services

More than three hundred persons, including members of the Jewish Students' Congregation of the University of Missouri, Columbia, Mo., met recently under the leadership of Dr. Leon Harrison, of St. Louis, supervisor of synagogue and school extension in northern Missouri. Due to the general favor with which this meeting was received, a program of fortnightly Sunday evening services has been arranged for the remainder of the academic year. Mr. Rabbinett, a citizen of Columbia, pledged $100 for the support of the student organization. A movement is now on foot to secure permanent quarters.

Dr. Englander Visits Colleges

Dr. Henry Englander, professor at the Hebrew Union College, recently lectured at the Ohio State University, Columbus, Ohio, to a congregation of 125 students. Dr. Englander also addressed the Jewish students of the University of Kentucky, at Lexington, Ky.

D. G. L. No. 3 Convenes at Atlantic City

Cleveland, Ohio

Under the auspices of the B'nai B'rith Civic Forum and the Collegiate Club, a discussion of the city managing plan was given at the B'nai B'rith Building, January 22nd, by Prof. Halton, chairman of the City Managing Committee.

The B'nai B'rith Chess Team engaged in a contest with the Cleveland Chess Team on January 26th. This far, the B'nai B'rith Team holds first place in the Cleveland Chess Tournament with a percentage of 1.000.

The B'nai B'rith Drama Club read "The Tidings Brought to Mary", by Paul Clandel, at its meeting on February 1st. The reading was directed and the discussion led by M. Raymond O'Neil, director of the Play House.

The third regular meeting of the B'nai B'rith Speakers' Club was held at the B'nai B'rith Building, January 25th. The subject, "Resolved, That Zionism is the solution of the Jewish problem", was defended by Brothers David L. Rubin and Morris Friedman. Some of those who opposed them were Western Reserve University students. The discussion was general, nearly all of those present taking part.

On January 15th, Cleveland Lodge held a regular old time meeting, at which its newly elected officers were installed. A number of past presidents and members of long standing were present, as well as many of those recently admitted to the Order. After the program of the evening was over, there was a meeting of officers and members, a greeting of long known brothers and a cordial welcoming of new brethren. Remarks by the new officers were put before the gathering in motion picture films. Smokes were passed around to all and entertainment numbers rounded off a most enjoyable evening.

Pittsfield, Mass.

On Monday evening, January 12th, Adullam Lodge, No. 326, held a public installation of its newly elected officers at the Hotel Wandell, which was followed by a banquet, at which several able speakers addressed the audience. Between the speaking local talent entertained and at the conclusion of the entertainment dancing followed until 1 a. m. Brother Julius Illch, of Albany, N. Y., installed the officers, and was the first speaker of the evening. He spoke very eloquently on the work of the Order and impressed on his hearers especially the Americanization work that the Order is doing, and also dwelt on the activities of the Anti-Defamation League. Brother Dr. Louis Smirnow, of Bridgeport, gave several readings of his own original poems, and Brother Rabbi A. J. Abrams, of Bridgeport, concluded the speaking of the evening with a stirring address.

Monitor George A. Newman acted as the toastmaster for the evening and as usual exceeded the expectations of his brethren in the capable manner in which he introduced the various speakers and his very witty remarks.

Adullam Lodge was very active in the raising of $16,000 for the Jewish War Relief, from approximately 1,200 men, women and children of the Jewish faith. Pittsfield as usual went over the top, as our assignment was $15,000. Considerable credit is due to Brother George A. Newman, who not only contributed very generously himself, but was the means of getting a good many to increase their subscriptions. Brother Newman was practically responsible for the raising of $7,000 of this fund through his own efforts.

Comprehensive Revision of By-Laws; David Bortin Elected President

DAVID BORTIN, of Philadelphia, was elected district president of the Independent Order B'nai B'rith unanimously to succeed Marcus Feuchtwanger, of New Castle, Pa., at the biennial convention of the Grand Lodge, which was held in Atlantic City on Sunday and Monday last at the Hotel Breakers. Three hundred delegates, representing forty-five lodges in Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Delaware and West Virginia were in attendance.

Marcus Feuchtwanger, of Newcastle, Pa., president of the Order in the Third District, in the course of his annual address on Sunday morning, asserted that there had been a gain of 43 per cent in the order's membership in the Third District. The membership is now over 4,500.

President Feuchtwanger recommended that $5,000 be contributed to the B'nai B'rith Orphanage at Erie, Pa., which now contains forty-eight children. He recommended also that fifteen delegates to the convention of the Constitution Grand Lodge, which is to sit in Cleveland in May, be selected from the eighteen surviving past presidents of the district organization, and he urged that every effort be made to bring the younger element of foreigners into the Order, which was the pioneer among Jewish benevolent fraternities in the United States, in order that they may become familiar with the spirit of Americanism through meeting native-born Americans on the lodge floor.

Mr. Seelenfreund Speaks

At the session on Sunday afternoon Mr. A. B. Seelenfrenud, of Chicago, secretary of the Grand Lodge, described the condition of the Jews in the war-torn lands of Europe.

Mr. Seelenfreund, who lately returned from Europe, where he went to obtain first-hand information concerning the plight of Jews in foreign lands, declared that conditions among the people of his race could not be much worse, that their sufferings were intense, and that their immediate relief was necessary.

He made a vigorous plea for contributions of money to assist the stricken people and declared that the order in America expected to raise a fund of at least $150,000 through subscription. This fund would be sent to Europe to be used in relieving distress in the stricken countries.

The gathering was addressed on Sunday afternoon by Jeanette Miriam Goldberg, of Philadelphia, representing the Jewish Chautauqua Society. She made an appeal for an appropriation for a course of lectures in the universities of the district by Jewish men.

The Social Service Committee in reporting asked for $2,500 for social service work, and a similar amount was asked for by the Intellectual Advancement Committee.

Isidor Sobel, for sixteen years postmaster of Erie, presided over a meeting of the Board of Governors of the Erie Orphanage and Home for Friendless. $5,000 was appropriated toward the maintenance of the home out of the treasury of the Third District.

Gold Medal Awarded Simon Wolf

The annual gold medal awarded by the Order in America to the man, who rendered the most conspicuous service to the Jewish race during the year, was presented Sunday night to Simon Wolf, of Washington, founder of the Orphans' Home for Jewish Children at Atlanta, Ga. Last year the medal was awarded to President Wilson. The presentation was made by Jacob Singer, of Philadelphia, former Register of Wills.

Mr. Wolf delivered an address in the course of which he stated that the endowment fund for the home had reached a total of $102,000 in five years. He paid a glowing tribute to Mrs. Joel Hillman, of Atlantic City, for her work in behalf of the home.

Dr. S. Goldenson, of Pittsburgh, and Isidore Rosenthal, of Lancaster, delivered interesting addresses.

Committee Reports

Jacob Singer was chairman of a committee comprising also Judge Strauss of Wilkes-Barre; Judge Josiah Cohen of Pittsburgh; Frederick Jay of Newark, and Dr. Isador Rosenthal of Lancaster, which presented a report on Monday recommending a comprehensive revision of the by-laws and rules governing the forty-five Lodges in the district, embracing Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Delaware and West Virginia. The codification as adopted places the organization upon a more effective basis than ever before.

Samuel Grabfelder, formerly of Philadelphia, presented the report for the Denver Hospital for Consumptives, one of the largest of the Jewish philanthropies in the United States, and the district delegates voted as a unit to continue their support of the institution through a per capita tax. The convention voted also to make an annual subscription for the support of the Eagleville Sanatorium in Pennsylvania.

Enthusiasm was manifested also over reports that the nation-wide campaign of the Anti-Defamation League for the barring of the "Merchant of Venice" from school play repertories and the elimination of race prejudice on the stage, the screen and in the press is growing steadily.

One thousand dollars was contributed by the district towards the fund being raised for B'nai B'rith members in Europe.

Officers Elected

The following officers were elected: David Bortin, president of the Third District; Maurice Schaffner, Erie, Pa., vice-president; Harry W. Platowsky, of Philadelphia, second vice-president; Joseph Herbach, of Philadelphia, secretary, and M. S. Meyerhoff, of Philadelphia, treasurer.

St. Joseph, Mo.

Twenty-five new members were initiated on December 28 at Temple Adath Joseph by the Kansas City Degree Team, Rabbi Harry H. Mayer of Kansas City assisting in the initiation. A Kosher supper was served.

On December 19, the lodge was addressed by Bro. Sidney Kusworm of Dayton, Ohio, President D. G. L. No. 2.

St. Paul, Minn.

Minnesota Lodge No. 157 of St. Paul, Minn., gave a splendid banquet and celebration of B'nai B'rith day on Jan. 5, 1920. More than 250 people attended. Installation of officers of the Lodge took place at a well attended meeting on the evening of Jan. 12, 1920.

THE JEW AND THE LODGE

The idea of the lodge has vastly changed since the day of its original institution, itself lost in the midst of the ages. In our time, the business of the lodge is for social fellowship and good deeds, a splendid purpose and one to be encouraged. Of course, its labor is frequently abused, yet even this fact does not detract from the lodge's worth. Its lingering secret business grates on the sensitive nerves of those who understand the ancient need of secrecy and that in these times such is unnecessary; even so, the insistence on secrecy, anomalous and insignificant, does not depreciate the lodge's potentiality. Apart from certain religious discriminations in some quarters in lodges organized on non-religious, non-political, and all other non-devisive factors, discriminations, which contradict the lodge's fundamental constitution, the lodge has invaded the field of religion. Thus, we Jews have the Independent Order B'nai B'rith, the national and international mouthpiece of Jewry, irrespective of the national and religious differences of Jewry and many other lodge bodies, catering to particular circles and existing successfully or precariously for endowment and benefit features.

The I. O. B. B., however, is the distinctly supreme Jewish lodge. It is the bounden duty of every Jew, worthy and honorable, to be identified therewith. Strange, however, it is that a large number of our coreligionists frown with disfavor on the Order, but seek to be identified with non-Jewish orders, even regard membership and in instances tolerance in the latter as a privilege. The Jew, in our opinion, who is not a Ben B'rith is not a fit subject or citizen for any of the non-Jewish lodges. We have known of Jews who have been accorded subordinate and even grand lodge honors in our Order, and have resigned in order to affiliate with non-Jewish orders, as if the latter would give them a neshamah yetherah, and condemned the Jewish order; or who have become sore-heads because they could not have their way and quit, as if their loss would be any hurt. The time will come, and it is near at hand, when the Jew who is not a Ben B'rith will not possess any standing in Jewish life. Every city and town must have their congregation or congregations, but must also have their B'nai B'rith lodge, each giving and receiving strength from the other.—(Montague N. A. Cohen in the Portland Jewish Tribune).

Yonkers, N.Y.

Yonkers City Lodge No. 451 held a public installation of officers on January 4, on which occasion also twenty-six new members were initiated.

A concert given by the children's orchestra at Temple Emanuel followed the meeting.

Yonkers City Lodge, which only about a year ago was about to lose its charter, has since that date enjoyed a general awakening and at the present time has a membership of seventy-five, all in good standing. Credit for the revival is due largely to the efforts of Bro. E. J. Goodhart, a governor of the I. O. B. B. Home at Yonkers and Bro. Max Rothschild, secretary of the lodge.

Reno, Nev.

Reno Lodge and the Ladies' Auxiliary held a banquet and dance early in January, which was attended by practically all of the 99 members of the two organizations. This lodge, which, according to its secretary, is located in the "biggest little city in the United States of America", assessed its members $3.00 at its last meeting for the loan fund.

Bridgeport, Conn.

The seventh annual charity ball of rmony Lodge took place this year the Stratfield ballroom on February n. The proceeds are being distrib- ed in equal portions to the local Jew- 1 charitable organizations. The Char- Ball beneficiaries are all doing rthy work among different lines for e relief of the local poor and needy.

Flint, Mich.

Sunday, February 8th, was a big day r Flint Lodge, No. 656. In the after- on a class of 39 candidates was initi- ed by the Detroit Degree Team. A rge delegation from Pisgah Lodge of etroit attended, coming to Flint in ecial chartered cars, and Bay City d Saginaw sent special delegations. ne of the big features was the Pisgah odge Glee Club, composed of 15 mu- cians, who participated in the ritual- tic work and gave a musical program the evening entertainment in Dryden all. Brothers Joseph Cummings, edi- r of the "Jewish Chronicle", of De- oit, Rabbi Samuel S. Meyerburg, abbi Lupo, Adolph Finsterwald, presi- nt of Pisgah Lodge, and Brothers osenthal and Alexander delivered in- resting addresses at the afternoon and ening sessions. The out of town uests were tendered a dinner at the resden Hotel in the evening.

Miami, Ariz.

Miami Lodge, No. 826, held the in- allation of its newly elected officers t the regular meeting Jan. 12.

The lodge has closed a lively year. ost of the meetings were well at- nded and were the scenes of many ebates. Though the community is nall, the Jewish population totaling bout a hundred persons, the interest in ommunity affairs was tense. The mem- ership, numbering 23 at the beginning f 1919, was raised to 36, leaving only bout a half dozen eligibles not mem- ers.

Among the accomplishments of the odge during the year were the estab- shment and operation of a Sabbath chool for the nominal fee of one dol- r for each child, the launching of a 'nai B'rith Building Fund, the ban- uent given to the visiting officers of he District Grand Lodge No. 4, the elebration of the Rosh Hashonah and om Kippur holidays by services; also he Purim, Sukkoth and Chanukah days y social entertainments. The Lodge esponded generously to public appeals.

The new year bids fair to be as in- eresting as the last one and everyone primed to delve into the work with enewed energy.

New London, Conn.

About 15[illegible] [illegible]d two or ies and guests sat down to a [illegible] there enu in the main dining room o[illegible] otel. The jazz orchestra furnished nusic during the meal and community inging was one of the interesting and njoyable features of the evening.

President Morris Labchansky pre- ided as toastmaster and addresses were elivered by Rabbi S. Abram of Bridge- ort, Brother Charles H. Shapiro, past resident of District No. 1, and Brother oseph Koletsky, president of Horeb odge.

Many Notables Address Springfield Meeting—Henry Lasker Elected District President—Impressive Initiation Ceremony

The annual convention of District Grand Lodge No. 1 was held at Springfield, Mass., on Jan. 31, Feb. 1 and Feb. 2. On the Friday evening preceding the opening of the convention, special B'nai B'rith services were held at Temple Bethel, a B'nai B'rith choir participating. The sermon was delivered by Rabbi Samuel M. Gup.

Mayor Opens Session

An informal reception was tendered to the visiting delegates and guests at the Hotel Kimball on the following evening. On Sunday the business sessions were opened with a word of welcome from Mayor Adams, of Springfield. Retiring president, Charles H. Shapiro, of Bridgeport, replied for the convention.

Henry Lasker

The election of officers occupied the remainder of the time of the convention during the morning. The officers as elected are: President, Henry Lasker, Springfield, Mass.; first vice-president, Dr. J. L. Blumenthal, of New York; second vice-president, Archibald M. Hillman, of Worcester; treasurer, Herman Asher, of New York; secretary, Max Levy, of New York; chairman of committee of finance, Louis W. Osterweis, of New York; president of board of governors of the Home for Aged and Infirm, Yonkers, N. Y., William Goldsmith, of New York; chairman of the committee on general fund and charitable objects, George A. Newman, of Pittsfield; chairman of intellectual advancement committee. William Klapp, of New York; chairman of committee on endowment and reserve fund, Meyer L. Victorius, of New York; chairman of District Court, Julius Illch, of Albany; chairman of committee on employment and rehabilitation, Philip M. Winkler, of Boston; chairman of social service committee, Dr. Herbert S. Goldstein, of New York; chairman on law, former Mayor Samuel Campner, of New Haven; chairman of committee on religious activities, Dr. Joseph Silverman, of New York.

Initiation Ceremony

[illegible]ose of the morning session [illegible]sident Shapiro was given a Bible by the children of Beth El Synagog. Presentation was made by President Henry Lasker. Initiation of candidates from Springfield, Holyoke, Hartford and New Hampshire took place in Odd Fellows' Hall in the afternoon. The candidates entered the Lodge under the direction of Isadore H. Hurowitz, president of the degree team. The degree team which initiated candidates was composed of: President, Isadore H. Hurowitz; vice-president, Charles V. D. Siegel; monitor, Frederick Rabinovitz; assistant monitor, Harry Goldman; treasurer, J. J. Davidson; secretary, William Gelin; warden, Paul Dorfman; impersonators, light, Dr. Charles W. Krasnoff; justice, Joseph Bonchi; peace, Henry Cohen; benevolence, Herman Green and Frank Barnett; Moses, Joseph Webber; brotherly love, Dr. Joseph Ginsberg and Walter Bearg; harmony, Jacob Katz; truth, Bernard S. Feiner; spirit of '76, Dr. A. E. Palmer, David Kaplin and Abraham Chiz; shepherds, Israel Glickman, Nathan Sobel, Louis Wolf, Samuel Brisk and Louis Radner; choir, Rabbi Samuel Price, Abraham Cutler, William Smith and Max Baker; organist, B. B. Kalman; violinist, Milton Aronson.

A. B. Seelenfreund, of Chicago, executive secretary of the Executive Committee of the Order, gave an interesting address at the close of the initiation exercises. While in Europe recently Mr. Seelenfreund had the opportunity of seeing the wrongs perpetrated upon Jews in Poland, Roumania, Germany and Austria. He said thousands were killed without any reason whatsoever. He stated that $30,000,000 had been distributed among the people abroad and that more money was needed for the furtherance of the work.

During the afternoon session the visiting ladies were shown the sights of Springfield and the surrounding country and after a long sleigh ride returned to Temple Beth El where tea was served.

A banquet in Hotel Kimball in the evening to which more than 500 sat down served to bring to the convention an array of speakers of prominence in state and Jewish affairs. Lieut.-Gov. Channing H. Cox and Rabbi Samuel Schulman, of Temple Bth-El, New York, were the chief speakers.

Address by Governor Cox

Lieut.-Gov. Cox gave a brief but straight to the point talk on present day affairs as they relate particularly to the Jew. He declared that during the war the barriers of religious pride had been swept away and that with the coming of peace the people should not rebuild such barriers. The lieutenant-governor also said that, although the war across the water has been ended, the people of the country must prepare to fight against the nation's internal enemies in the shape of anarchy and radicalism.

Dr. Schulman's address was an appeal to all Jews not to forsake their Covenant for false ideas of the present day.

Other speakers of the evening were: Dr. Myron Wessler, president of Springfield Lodge; Charles H. Shapiro, past president of the district; Henry Lasker, newly elected president, and Charles Hartman, member of the executive committee for District No. 1.

The business sessions were resumed on Monday morning at the Municipal Auditorium, and in the afternoon the visitors were taken on a tour of the prominent manufacturing plants of the city. The convention closed Monday night with a grand ball at the Municipal Auditorium.

District No. 4 Convention

Preparations are now in full swing for the Grand Lodge Convention to be held by the B'nai B'rith lodge in Los Angeles February 15-16-17. There was a meeting Tuesday evening of the general committee, at which the program of events was outlined and arrangements made for carrying on the work of getting ready for the big affair.

It is expected that guests will begin to arrive in the city for this affair Friday, and for the early comers Rabbi Edgar F. Mangin, vice-president of the Order, and Rabbi of Temple B'nai B'rith, has arranged to deliver special lectures at the Temple, Ninth and Hope streets, on Friday and Saturday.

Sunday morning the General and Reception Committees will meet the delegates at the various stations and hotels. Sunday afternoon the guests will be taken on a trip to the Jewish Orphans' Home, where special memorial services will be held. This meeting will be open to the public.

Sunday evening will be marked by a reception and other social activities.

Business sessions of the lodge will be held on Monday for the men, while the ladies will be entertained with automobile rides.

Monday evening there will be an initiation of a large class of candidates, followed by a smoker for the men. The ladies will be entertained at a theater party.

Tuesday morning will be taken up with business, and automobile trips to points of interest will be taken during the afternoon.

Tuesday evening there will be an elaborate dance at the Alexandria, which will be the closing event of the convention.

Mr. Harry Holzer is chairman of the automobile committee and announces that he will have need for about fifty automobiles during the convention days.

The Ladies' Auxiliary will assist in the social features of the convention and will look after the entertainment of lady visitors.

Spokane, Wash.

Abraham Geiger Lodge, No. 423, installed the newly elected officers for 1920 at its meeting on January 16th. Brother Samuel Edelstein, who installed the officers of the lodge and of the Ida Bloom Straus Auxiliary, who were installed at the same time, congratulated the two organizations on the splendid showing for the year and on the increase in membership. The lodge was also addressed by Brother Julius A. Liebert, who urged the lodge to cooperate in the establishment of a community center in connection with Temple Emanuel. Refreshments were served by the members of the Auxiliary and the proceedings were closed with dancing.

Vancouver, B. C.

The first meeting of the year of Samuel Lodge, No. 688, was held on Wednesday, Jan. 7, at the Labor Temple. A record-breaking crowd was in attendance. All the newly elected officers were duly installed by Brother Max. M. Grossman. After the installation a supper was served. Brother Grossman's appeal for the Loan Fund netted over $260.00

The Immigration Committee, of which Brother J. W. Herman is chairman, is rendering excellent service. This committee meets every boat that comes from the Orient, and gives first aid to any Jewish immigrants arriving. This committee works in conjunction with the Hebrew Sheltering and Immigrants Aid Society of America.

What Our Lodges Are Doing

Marshall, Texas

Observing the annual B'nai B'rith Day, Reuben Lodge, No. 257, of Marshall, held very appropriate services on January 29th, at Temple Moses Montefiore. The principal address was delivered by Dr. F. Farber, of Texarkana. Dr. Farber explained the principles of the Order, dwelling at length on its wonderful accomplishments in the establishment of benevolent insitutions as well as its very generous responses to appeals for aid from peoples in all countries. A musical program was given by the choir and organist.

New York City

Akiba Lodge, No. 173, started the New Year with a dinner meeting on January 13th, at the B'nai B'rith Hall, 2307 Broadway, New York. The ceremony of installation of officers was performed by prominent citizens and influential members of the Order. Akiba Lodge looks ahead confidently to a 500 membership goal. One of the interesting activities of the lodge is the B'nai B'rith Symphony Orchestra, which is now being organized and for which a large number of musicians have already been secured.

Kansas City, Mo.

The newly elected officers for 1920 of Kansas City Lodge, No. 184, were installed on January 12th. The announcement of the meeting as issued by the Secretary contains a full report of the membership and of the financial status of the Lodge. The net gain of the Lodge in membership as it appears from this report is 103, with 90 candidates still uninitiated. The report shows that, starting with a deficit of over $300, the Lodge, on January 1st, 1920, had a surplus of over $4,000.

Flint, Mich.

Brothers Rosenzweig of Detroit and Robinson of Bay City installed the officers of Flint Lodge and initiated a class of twelve members at its last meeting. Over $500 was subscribed to the war loan fund and pledges thus far received indicate that this amount will be doubled. Reports received from Brother Ed Lichtig, of Flint, who is devoting much of his time to the welfare of the Michigan lodges, indicates that large classes will be initiated this month on ''Adolf Kraus Day''.

Pontiac, Mich.

Application for charter to be granted to a new lodge to be organized in Pontiac, Mich., has been aproved by the General Committee of District No. 6, and the President and Secretary of the District have been authorized to delegate officers to institute the lodge. The new lodge expects to buy a home, which will be used for social activities of the lodge, a subscription fund of more than $5,000 having been sucured.

Sioux Falls, So. Dak.

A new lodge, known as Sioux Lodge, No. 847, was instituted recently with a charter membership of twenty-eight, by Brother Gus. Loevinger, of St. Paul. Brother Loevinger expects that this lodge will soon have a membership of from 75 to 100.

After the institution of the Lodge, a banquet was held at the Cataract Hotel, at which an address was delivered by Brother Loevinger on the work of the Order.

Large Increase in Membership Shown by District and Lodge Reports

District No. 1

A life sized portrait was presented to Col. I. M. Ullman by Harmony Lodge at the meeting of Horeb Lodge, held on January 11th. Additional medals were presented to members who saw service in the World War. The officers for 1920 were installed by Brother Joseph Rosenzweig.

District No. 2

Ebn Ezra Lodge, No. 47, held an initiation of candidates and installation of officers for 1920 on January 9th. Many new members have joined the lodge within the past few months. Important new activities for 1920 were considered at the meeting, among these being the establishment of a B'nai B'rith Home for working boys.

District No. 3

Connellsville Lodge, No. 801, Connellsville, Pa., entertained at a dance given in the state armory on January 20th. The function was enjoyed by the entire community and by many out of town guests.

Monongahela Valley Lodge, No. 776, Monessen, Pa., installed new officers for 1920 at its meeting on January 11th. Mr. Max Jonavitz, a charter member of the lodge, installed the officers with a very impressive address. It is expected that a class of 25 new members will be initiated at an open meeting of the lodge to be held on February 28th.

District No. 5

Rimmon Lodge No. 68 of Richmond, Va., held its monthly meeting on January 18th at which officers for the year were installed.

District No. 6

A class of candidate[illegible]ently initiated into Wausau I[illegible]0, by Brother Julien J. Gusfield of Chicago who also addressed the lodge at an open meeting. In spite of the extremely cold weather and the fact that trains from surrounding towns had been taken off, the meeting was very well attended.

Lincoln Lodge No. 377, Lincoln, Nebr., succeeded in raising more than $1,100 for the I. O. B. B. Loan Fund at its meeting on January 8th. A Committee headed by Brother J. L. Kuhn and David Phillips gives promise of raising an additional large sum for this worthy work.

A dinner dance was given by the lodge on February 1st at the Adelphi Hotel.

Gilead Lodge, No. 41, Milwaukee, Wis., is in the midst of a membership drive which was opened recently at a luncheon given at the City Club.

District No. 7

Edar Lodge, No. 211, San Antonio, Texas, celebrated B'nai B'rith Day at Temple Beth-El on January 19, 1920. Brother L. N. Lee was the principal speaker of the occasion and delivered an address on the subject, ''Is the B'nai B'rith a mere charity society?''

The new officers for 1920 of Houston Lodge, No. 434, Houston, Tex., were elected at a meeting of the lodge in the Concordia Clubrooms on January 22nd. The officers were installed on January 27th, at which meeting refreshments were served.

District No. 7 has added another lodge to its long roster in Bartlesville Lodge, Bartlesville, Okla., which starts off with a membership of 27, and which has every prospect of largely increasing its membership.

East St. Louis, Ill.

On January 10, 1920, at East S Louis, Ill., Illinois Lodge, No. 794, hel a public installation, the officers bein installed by Brothers A. Levy an Judge Samuel Rosenfeld, of Missour Lodge, No. 22.

After the installation a program wa rendered and dancing continued unt 11 p. m., when luncheon was served.

Toledo, Ohio

On February 10th, a meeting of Toledo Lodge, No. 183, was held in memory of Victor Abraham, member of th Executive Committee for District Gran Lodge No. 2, and for many years secretary of that District. Victor Abraham's death last month was a great los to the Order.

The February 24th meeting will b in honor of the seventieth birthday o Brother Adolf Kraus, president of th Order. As a tetstimonial to Brothe Kraus a special class will be initiated. Each past president of Toledo Lodg will give a three-minute talk at thi meeting.

Omaha, Nebr.

The coal restrictions and local activities that had a tendency to interest the membership placed somewhat of a damper on the activities of Omaha Lodge, No. 354, during the past few months.

Withal, the lodge showed an excellent increase in membership for the year just past. With new and active officers, this lodge is now beginning a series of intellectual advancement meetings that is certain to stimulate interest among the members. These meetings generally include speakers of note, who present topics of vital interest.

With the planning of a membership drive that will be participated in by all the active workers, Omaha Lodge is confident of attaining its quota of members for the commemoration of the seventieth anniversary of President Adolf Kraus.

Warning to Lodges

A man, passing under the name of Harris, well built, full face, light complexion, appeared before officers of Kansas City Lodge, No. 184, passing a worthless check for $25.00. He claimed to be a member of the lodge at Portland. If anyone encounters him let him be held for investigation, and communicate by wire with the undersigned.

Meriden, Conn.

Meriden Lodge, No. 848, initiated 41 new members at its meeting on January 12th. Brothers Charles Hartman, Joseph Ullman and Charles Shapiro addressed the meeting.

Forrest City, Ark.

A birthday program of Barnet Lodge, No. 754, was carried out at the Elks' Hall on January 8th. The principal address of the evening was delivered by Rabbi Leonard J. Rothstein of Pine Bluff.

The meeting was followed by dancing and refreshments.

Regina, Canada

Louis D. Brandeis Lodge, No. 833, recently celebrated B'nai B'rith Day and Kraus Day in a most impressive manner. The class of candidates was initiated by the Special Degree Team and officers for 1920 were elected. In the evening a large meeting was held at the Allen Theater, which was attended by nearly all of the local Jewry, as well as by a large number of non-Jews, the audience numbering more than six hundred. The meeting was addressed by Brother Simon Abramson, Professor of Roman Law and Jurisprudence in Manitoba University, who took as his subject, ''The War and the Jews''.

The ceremonies were concluded the following evening with a banquet and dance at the Kitchener Hotel.

Denver, Colo.

At its meeting on February 8th, Denver Lodge, No. 171, was addressed by Brother George Dock, who spoke on ''A Survey of Jewish Newsboy's Home Life''.

On February 29th, the Lodge will initiate fifty candidates. A program of musical numbers and other social events will constitute the evening's entertainment.

Bridgeport, Conn.

Forty years ago, in a little hall in Bridgeport, Bernard Klein, acting as Grand Installing Officer, inducted into office the leading Jewish citizens of Bridgeport as members of Abraham Lodge, No. 89. On January 18th, 1920, his son, Brother Jacob B. Klein, past president of District Grand Lodge No. 1, installed the officers of Abraham Lodge in a hall only a few hundred yards distant. The new officers include some of the most influential and well-known business men of Bridgeport.

Minot, N. Dak.

Installation of new officers of Minot Lodge, No. [illegible]42, was performed by Brother Louis B. Schwartz, of St. Paul. The installation was public and was attended by practically every Jewish resident of Minot, as well as by many from surrounding towns. Minot Lodge, which was instituted on June 22, 1919, has practically doubled its membership since that date and is now working on an intellectual program.

The Lodge intends to make an intensive drive for membership in the adjoining towns, which are too small to have lodges of their own. Much credit for its strong position is due to the retiring Monitor, Brother Dr. I. Diamond.

Russian Jews Against Bolshevist Rule

Chicago Daily News Correspondent Says Economic Ruin of Jews in Russia Makes Them Enemies of the Soviet Government

By Isaac Don Levine

Isaac Don Levine is the correspondent of the Chicago Daily News who made two trips into Soviet Russia in 1919. He brought back with him the famous "Willy-Nicky" Correspondence and four hundred letters from the Czarina to the Czar, which were published simultaneously all over the world and created a universal sensation. Before going to Russia Mr. Levine was associated with the New York Tribune. He is the author of "The Russian Revolution", an autobiography of Botchkareva, the Commander of the Russian Women's Battalion of Death and other works. Mr. Levine was called into consultation by the Anti-Defamation League to assist in answering the "Jew-Bolshevist" Libel and is rendering most effective assistance in the League's work. This article was prepared from an address delivered by him under the League's auspices.

IT IS indeed a great privilege and a duty for one who has been in contact with the Jewish masses within the boundaries of Soviet Russia to be able to convey a vital message from them to those in America who do not understand their status under the Bolshevist regime. One of the first revelations to me on arriving in Russia was finding that the thought I had entertained regarding the number and influence of Jews in the Bolshevist government was quite erroneous. At heart I suspected, as so many casual readers have, that the Jews were indeed the leaders of Bolshevism in Russia. I had this misconception because of the prominence given to a number of men of Jewish parentage connected with the Bolshevist movement, in reports of newspaper correspondents who had come in touch with these Jews in Russia.

Only the other day, I read some articles by a certain Mr. Davis, who represents himself as a major of the American Red Cross, rehashing the old yarns about the Jews of Russia. Mr. Davis was not in Soviet Russia, and has no first-hand information on the subject of the Russian Jews. Yet his tales about them, refuted by all that frightful actuality which I am going to portray, are published in many American newspapers and given national circulation.

But it is not my object here to argue against Mr. Davis. I intend to tell what I found in the course of my two visits to Russia for the Chicago Daily News in 1919. I found that there were Jews in the Commissariat for Foregn Affairs, where a knowledge of foreign languages is required, and I found Jews in a number of other departments with which foreigners, newspaper men from America and Europe, would necessarily come in touch. These Jews were there mainly because of their knowledge of foreign languages or because they had lived in foreign countries. But when I got away from these departments and went to the internal vital organization and bodies of the Soviet government, I found a surprisingly low number of Jews. The Communist Party, which is the new name for the Bolshevists, is composed of about eighty per cent pure Russians and twenty per cent all other nationalities, among which, indeed, there is a considerable number of Jews. The reason for this is twofold: First, the Jews are the most intelligent of all the non-Slav races in Russia; second, the Communist Party is recruited largely from the cities and the Jews form a large part of the urban population in Russia.

Are the Bolshevik Leaders Jews?

Of course, there is Trotzky, and there are Zinoview, Kamenev and two or three others. On the other hand, there is Lenine and there is Krasin, the so-called economic dictator. There is Kalinin, the President of the Congress of Soviets—the Russian Parliament. There is Chicherin, the man who is responsible for the foreign policy of Russia. There is Lustacharsky, Commissioner of Education. These are all non-Jews. Three of them are of noble birth. If you go further, if you visit the various Commissariats, you will find that there are no Jews at all in many important departments.

The Origin of Bolshevism

Now, this as regards the first impression that an observant visitor obtains in Russia. Then, when you go deeper into the matter, you find that what the western world thinks of the origin of Bolshevism, that the theory of Karl Marx is Bolshevism—you find that this is nothing but nonsense. Lenine might be the finest exponent of Karl Marx, but the majority of the Russian masses know nothing about Karl Marx, neither do they understand Lenine's interpretations of Karl Marx, nor doctrinaire Socialism of the various brands. Nevertheless, the masses, the peasants, are Bolshevists, not in the sense of really intelligent fanatics for the cause of Socialism; but Bolshevists insofar as the idea bespeaks to them a movement of the peasantry against the landlords for the purpose of securing first of all the peasant ownership of the land.

One finds in walking the streets of Moscow, some peculiar things. One of these is a monument erected last year. It is a monument not to a Jew, not to Karl Marx, not to a Socialist or a Communist, but to a man by the name of Stepan Razin, of whom very few have heard. You will find in Russian history that Razin, three hundred years ago, when Karl Marx, Lenine and Trotzky were unkown, raised the banner of rebellion on the Volga, Russia's national river, against the rule of the Czars in Moscow. And Razin who was nothing but a serf leading rebellious slaves is the typification of Bolshevism to the Russian peasants. If you want to know Bolshevism, look up tonight in the Encyclopedia Britannica the history of Razin, the history of his dramatic rise until he seized many provinces, enlisting in his ranks hundreds of thousands of rebellious peasants, and threatening Moscow. For three hundred years Bolshevism has been smoldering in Russia.

Less than two hundred years ago, a man by the name of Pugachov, also a rebel leader, repeated the episode of Razin. He also was stopped. Razin was publicly tortured and executed in Moscow and where he was executed three hundred years ago, you will now find a monument raised by the risen Russian people, who see it in the symbol of their centuries-old aspirations. This is Bolshevism. On top of this is built Communism and Lenine's ideas of a new social order, but if not for the peasant movement which is three hundred years old and which is purely Russian and is the mainstay of Bolshevism, Soviet Russia would not be where she is today. So much for the part of the Jews in the origination of Bolshevism and its leadership.

Jewish Masses Are Anti-Bolshevik

Now, go down to the Jewish people, down into the ghetto. Go to a town like Dvinsk, or Gomel, not very big towns, but still having thirty or forty thousand Jews each. Begin to talk to Jews of all kinds, of all types and classes. You are an American newspaper correspondent. Those dispatches which told of the Jews being leaders of Bolshevism are still in the background of your mind and here are the real Jews of Russia. Are they Bolshevists? No. Emphatically no.

First of all you find they are more bitter in their opposition to Bolshevist rule than any other class of the population. You find upon investigation in a city like Gomel, where there are thirty-five or forty thousand Jews, less than two hundred Jewish Communists. You find most of them are waiting for some miracle to happen that would change the Soviet government so as to strike a medium between Denikin and the Soviet, and evolve a democratic government as it is understood in this country, allowing the individual the oportunity to develop his own genius, particularly in the field of commerce.

The Jew will not stand the unlimited power of the state, the pressure from the top. The Jew is individual. He has his own strivings and ambitions, whether in business or in any other line. And the present state in Russia is a condition approaching a dictatorship in which individual enterprise in business is suppressed.

Now, why are the Jews against the Bolshevists? The Bolshevists have made no pogroms; and Denikin has. Of course, they are against Denikin. Take that for granted. They are against all those indulging in massacres. You ask, why are they at the same time against Bolshevist Russia? There are some very convincing causes. The first is that the Russian Jew is against capital punishment, against any dictatorship. It goes against the grain, the make-up of the Jew, and many Americans know it from contact with the Russian Jews in this country. The Soviet government was responsible for quite a number of executions. I am not speaking of the red terror of which people in this country have very crude and distorted ideas. I am speaking of executions after a tribunal had passed upon the cases. There were numerous executions of that type.

Some of the executed were Jews. In most cases the executed are bandits; to be sure, many former officials of the Czar and some members of the Communist Party found guilty of corruption are executed. Many of the Jews could not stand capital punishment in a government which professes to be Socialist. This affected the younger Jews, those of radical tendencies. A far more potent reason is the fact that the mass of the Jews in Russia were small business people. They were commissioners, brokers, trades people of various descriptions, and shopkeepers. And the Soviet government has closed nearly all the private shops; has discontinued all the brokerage businesses of various types, and has deprived the Jews of Russia of their means of livelihood. I am speaking of the majority of the Jews.

Peasant Supremacy

The Soviet government is essentially a government of the peasants. Now these Russian peasants are the majority of the people; and in spite of their dislike of the Communist government or the Communist theories, they are for the Soviet government, and we, who believe in majority government, cannot help facing this situation. Here is a more or less legitimate government, peasant government, which aims to eliminate the Jew as the middleman from the economic field, which means from life itself.

Now, when you find this out, when you discover that the Jews are simply deprived of their source of income, of their shops, which are either confiscated or sold out, you are not surprised at finding that the bulk of the Jewish population of Soviet Russia is against the government. They apreciate that there have been no massacres in Soviet Russia. They appreciate the efforts of such people as Maxim Gorky, Lunarcharsky and the wife of Lenine, who have constituted themselves into a committee to combat anti-semitism.

But, here is the situation. Here is a government which seeks to be proletarian. In the system which the Soviet government seeks to erect there is no place for a middle class; and the Jewish peole, it must be acknowledged, are a middle class element almost everywhere in Europe, especially everywhere I saw them. And when you come to the prospects for the future of the Jewish people in Russia, you are up against this dead wall, worse than any massacres, a wall of reality, that there is no place for the Jew in the Russia of today and in the Russia which the Soviet leaders are trying to erect.

Bolshevik Regime in Ukrainia

Now, take the case of the Ukraine. In the Ukraine, there were massacres;

Jews of Soviet Russia Anxious to Emigrate tens of thousands have been killed, and hundreds of thousands maimed and robbed of their homes and their property.

But in the Ukraine, under Denikin and Petlura, there was more in the future for the Jews who remained alive, because Petlura and Denikin stand for business, for private property; they stand for all those things which allow individual efforts and transactions in which the Jews engage in order to make their living. But today the Ukraine is in the hands of Soviet Russia, eigthy-five or ninety per cent of it; and there is no question but that Petlura will be wiped out, if he is not already. Now the Ukraine, as far as I can figure out, is going to stay in the hands of Soviet Russia. The reason why it left the hands of the Bolshevists last summer was due to the fact that they sent down into the Ukraine a lot of people who didn't know the country and tried to impose upon the Ukraine the same Soviet rule that functioned in Moscow, a system that did not meet with the approval of the Ukrainian population. Lenine and the others recognized this because they paid dearly for it; and when I left Soviet Russia they did not intend to repeat their mistake of last summer. They will probably go a long way to meet the peculiar demands of the Ukrainian peasants and allow them a certain freedom of individual effort and private ownership, even if limited; and because of the present extraordinary military strength of the Soviet government, in addition to the reason I have just given, I believe Ukrainia will not leave the hands of Soviet Russia. You then get about four million Jews adrift from Odessa to Petrograd in the hands of the Soviet government; thousands who are torn away from the old moorings, who can't get back into the old channels because the government will not allow them; and if they try to do so, they are considered speculators, they are profiteers. Now that the war is over and the Soviet government is paying much attention to internal conditions, speculation will be stopped, because there is no ''fun,'' to use a slang expression, about the methods of the Soviet government. If it intends to stop speculation, it will stop it, even if some lives will have to be sacrificed on the gallows.

Jews Anxious to Leave Russia

Now, what do the Jews say? What do they think? They want to leave Russia. That is the first thing. And this I conceive to be my duty to try to interpret as closely as possible their sentiments. I can tell you what they told me, that they are waiting for the first opportunity to get out of Russia. They want to go to Palestine or to America. Finally, they want to go where they can be sure of making a living. I speak of ninety per cent fully, without exaggeration, of the Russian Jews; both of those who had gone through the massacres in the Ukraine and of those who lived under Soviet rule and had their shops and stores confiscated.

It is a very grave dilemma. One could not answer those people. They expect miracles. Miracles from America. They came to me in crowds after finding out that I was from America; they considered me more than a Godsend; a man who had dropped from the skies; from the United States! It seemed unbelievable! And many of them actually didn't believe and don't believe to this day that I was there amongst them. They came to me with the same words, repeating again and again the question as to what they should do, and as to what the American Jews, America, Humanity, Wilson, would do for them.

Now it must be stated as a fact that most of the Jews are Zionists in Russia. I left Russia not so very many years ago—I am speaking of my first coming to the United States—and there were a good many people there whom I had known who were not Zionists, people who did business with Moscow or some other interior Russian cities, and who considered Russia a good country, with certain reservations. Now these people were Zionists.

They were Zionists because life has made Zionists of them; not because they learned more of Palestine and of its possibilities, but because they felt that they had to go somewhere and because they believed that perhaps Palestine will be the land where they could go.

Economic Desperation of Russian Jews

Meanwhile the Jews of Russia drag out a miserable existence. Most of them do it by selling piecemeal the chattels that they had succeeded in concealing in the last two years. Now, take my native town, for instance, sixty per cent of the population of which are Jews. The Jews there were not well off. They were poor, on the whole, from the point of view of American standards; but somehow they made a living. There were more shops and stores in that town than one would imagine the population could support. Such was the typical Jewish town in Russia. I came there now and I found most of the shops empty and closed. It was a Sunday. The town used to have a fair when the surrounding peasants would come into town. They were poor peasants. The land was not fertile; it was marshy and woody. But still they had something to bring and they brought it in the good old days and sold it cheaply. Now I found that the same poor peasants who used to wear shoes of bark of their own manufacture and coats and caps of their own making, these peasants, especially the peasant girls whom I remember so distinctly coming into town ten or fifteen years ago barefoot, now came into town dressed amazingly well, wearing good shoes and silk kerchiefs and silk waists. The poor ignorant peasant who used to wear shoes of bark now had a pair of good boots. Where did they come from? They came from the city, not exclusively from the Jews, but the Jews were in the majority in the city. So, you understand, it was mostly Jewish boots and shoes and silk kerchiefs and waists and the hundred and one little things such as pins and watches that these peasant girls were wearing while bringing a few eggs or some butter into the city to exchange for additional finery. In other words, these peasants were sucking out the life blood of the town. I saw that not only in the Jewish, but also in the Russian towns; and I left Russia with no sympathy for the peasants because they are the worst exploiters. If certain people in Russia used to think that the Jews were exploiters, they now see that the Russian peasants themselves are drinking the blood of the Russian cities.

I will tell you the story of a relative of mine who had a piano in the good old days. I stopped in his house this time. The piano was not there. Where was it? Did he sell it? No, he had not sold it; he had it hidden away, probably in some cellar. He formerly was a fur merchant, but now he was doing nothing. And for two or three months, this relative of mine had been bargaining with a neighboring peasant for the exchange of the piano for some flour. You see, the piano was once worth about six hundred rubles. A pood of bread, thirty-six American pounds, was then worth a ruble and fifty kopecks in the same town. The peasant was quite willing after several weeks of bargaining to give now six poods of bread, costing according to the old standard nine rubles and according to the present standard seven thousand rubles, for the piano, which if bought today in Moscow, where such things are being sold and bought even now, would cost fifty thousand rubles. Well, my relative was not yet at the end of his rope and so he was quite slow about it. He did not conclude the deal, but when I left he said: ''We don't know how long this will go on. The day may come when I will sell the piano, and after the bread that I got for it is consumed I may have to sell my last shirt.''

Things will not come to that pass now because of the improving international situation; but the future of the Russian Jews is not bright, not because of massacres, but because of the social system which certain people, including some of Jewish origin, are endeavoring to build up in Russia.

Now, one can be for this social system or against it. This is not the question here. The point to be driven home here to everyone, to every Jew and to every non-Jew is this: The economic situation of the Jews of Russia is desperate. They are predominantly of the middle class, the only large middle class element that Russia has ever had. There is no place for a middle class under Soviet Russian government. The Jews of Russia cannot be Bolsheviks. Their stomachs compel them to be against Soviet rule, against Bolshevism.

It must be admitted that in the new order which will emerge in Russia there will be a place for a certain number of Jews. A certain number of Jews, intellectuals of a certain type and other young bright chaps who can adapt themselves to conditions will get into the various economic departments and make good undoubtedly. But the majority of the Russian Jews will be found at the gates of Russia, opening into Western Europe, as soon as these gates are flung open, and it is incumbent upon all humanitarians, Jews and non-Jews alike, to face this problem with all the gravity that it deserves and solve it in a constructive and broad-minded manner.

New Wave of Pogroms

According to reports from a reliable source, Southern Russia, particularly the region of Odessa, has undergone during the retreat of the volunteer army, a new wave of terrible pogroms. Up to date massacres have occurred at Bogopol, Golta, Golovanewsk, Oloiopol, Kodima, Kachtchevata, Goloskof, Savragne, Krivoie-Ozero and Elisavetgrad.

Several Jews arrived from Krivoie-Ozero (Government of Elisavetgrad) in Odessa and have communicated to the Council of the Jewish Community of Odessa the fact that a terrible pogrom took place in the small town of Krivoie-Ozero. On Dec. 24 a gang of 750 men calling itself the Volotchansk Regiment, arrived in this little town and immediately began to loot Jewish shops, kill the Jews and assault the women. About 200 were killed. All the pharmacies were destroyed, and the town is absolutely without medicaments. On the 26th, a new gang arrived and joined the first one. Then the pogrom became still more violent. All the Jews were horribly tortured.

At Golovanevsk the number killed exceeded 50. It is not yet known how many were killed in the other towns.

In Bogopol, Golta and Olviopol the pogrom lasted five days (Dec. 31, 1919, to Jan. 4, 1920). All Jewish houses and shops were looted and destroyed by the bandits. The Jewish population, homeless and completely plundered, is escaping to Odessa. For refusing to denounce the rich Jews the old Rabbi of Golta was dragged to the gallows three times.

Reliable information has been received that a terrible pogrom took place at Elisavetgrad. The Jewish population in the region of Odessa is in a fearful panic.

Soldiers Allowed Passover Leave

The War and Navy Departments have issued orders granting furloughs to the men of Jewish faith in the service for the period covered by the first two days of Passover. The dispatch from the War Department was sent to every Army Commander and reads as follows:

''The Secretary of War desires, in order to permit soldiers of the Jewish falith to participate in the celebration of the Passover, that members of that faith be granted furloughs from noon April 2nd to midnight April 4th, 1920, provided no interference with the public service is occasioned thereby.

''Matzos (unleavened bread) and Haggadahs (Passover prayer books) will be distributed by the Jewish Welfare Board. Commanding Officers will lend assistance and co-operate with representatives of the Board in this distribution.''

Similar orders have been issued by the Navy Department with the added provision for transportation of the men in the service to their homes.

The Sabbath Bill

Renewal of the fight on the part of the Jewish constituency of the State of New York was begun anew March 9th, when the Assembly Codes Committee held a public hearing on the Sabbath Bill No. 310, introduced by Assemblyman Samuel Dickstein at the instance of the Jewish Sabbath Alliance of America.

Rev. Dr. Bernard Drachman, President of the Jewish Sabbath Alliance of America, explained to the Committee that Jewish citizens who are fulfilling all the duties as such should at least be given the same recognition by the State lawmakers as is accorded the Christian citizens of the State. That the State should not force these Sabbath Observers to abandon their Day of Rest and take up another which is altogether strange to them. He also mentioned that the Sabbath Alliance received a number of petitions endorsing the Sabbath Bill from Christian clergymen who thought that this would in no way interfere with Sunday, the Christian Day of Rest, and that this Bill is meant only for the conscientious Seventh Day Sabbath observers.

Assemblyman Dickstein in his address showed that the Jewish people of New York have been very patriotic and that they have shed their blood on the battlefields of France and therefore they should be granted this request of religious liberty in recognition of their devotion to the U. S. A.

Council of Jewish Women

DECLARING that the ''ten commandments and the constitution of the United States must be the decalogue of every American Jew'', Mrs. Rebekah Kohut, of New York, National Chairman of the campaign to be launched by the Council of Jewish Women on April 25, today announced that the council is prepared to send women workers to seaports of Europe, and begin there, the Americanization of the immigrant. Mrs. Kohut was a ''dollar-a-year'' member of the Council of National Defense, and is the recognized leader of America's Jewish women. She recently accepted the chairmanship of the campaign to secure funds to extend and carry on the Americanization and Immigrant Aid work which the Council of Jewish Women has been performing for the last thirty years and to meet the flow of immigration that is expected to follow the signing of the peace treaty.

Greetings from Four Continents

Jewry of World Honors Adolf Kraus at Anniversary Banquet—Unique Gift of 10,000 New Members

THE festivities accompanying the celebration of the seventieth anniversary of the birth of Adolf Kraus, President of the Order, which occurred simultaneously in hundreds of cities in the United States and abroad were nowhere more extensively entered into than in Chicago, which has the honor of claiming Brother Kraus as one of its leading citizens.

In December, members of the B'nai B'rith lodges in Chicago came to the conclusion that no token of their esteem and regard would be more welcome to our venerated President than the securing of a large class of candidates to be initiated in connection with the anniversary celebration. With this end in view, a short but intensive campaign was conducted, the lodges setting as their goal a class of one thousand candidates to be known as the Adolf Kraus Class.

As a result of the unique incentive and the usual loyal enthusiasm of the brothers, more than 900 candidates were secured for this class and on February 25 a most impressive initiation ceremony was conducted at the Hotel La Salle in Chicago at which time the largest class of candidates ever inducted at one time became members of the Order. Nearly seven hundred of those to be initiated appeared at 6 o'clock to sit down to a complimentary dinner tendered to them by the lodges. At 9 o'clock, the class ushered by the assistant monitors entered the impressively staged initiation hall. Seated on the platform were President Adolf Kraus and members of the Executive Committee from nearly all the American districts as well as high officers of District Grand Lodge No. 6 and representatives of the three Chicago lodges who were welcoming their new brethren. The Degree team, consisting of Brothers Harry Okin, Alfred Mecklenburger, Dr. A. D. Weiner and A. B. Seelenfreund, took charge of the initiation ceremony and conducted it in the most impressive manner ever seen in Chicago. The second part of the initiation ceremony conducted by Brother A. B. Seelenfreund, Secretary of the Constitution Grand Lodge, was given in a manner calculated to inspire the new members with the highest incentives to carry on the work of the Order. Following the initiation ceremony, speeches were delivered by the distinguished guests.

The following night more than five hundred members of the Order gathered in the large banquet hall of the Hotel La Salle to do honor to President Kraus. During the dinner a string orchestra entertained the diners and the Bosdyn Quartet led in community singing. After the banquet those present had the great pleasure of hearing ex-President William Howard Taft, a life-long friend of Brother Kraus, praise in unmeasured terms the man and brother whom we all delight to honor. Mr. Taft, in the course of his address, said that "He has not dedicated his life to the accumulation of money. He is not one of those able to create big foundations and to make great donations. He has been not a giver, but a doer. I am proud that one in our profession of law has done so much for others without compensation."

Brother Lucius L. Solomons, of San Francisco, member of the Executive Committee for District No. 7, acted as toast-master and by his constant flow of wit and in his sparkling introductions of the various speakers made up for the lack of that which national prohibition kept from the tables of the diners.

Brother Rabbi Edward N. Calisch, of Richmond, Va., member of the Executive Committee for District No. 5, on very short notice delivered an inspiring address in substitution for Br. Jacob Schiff, who was prevented by illness from attending. Many other distinguished members of the Order took advantage of the few minutes offered them by the toastmaster to express their love and respect for President Kraus. Resolutions from all of the District Grand Lodges, which had been engrossed on parchment and bound, were read by representatives of those districts who were present and Brother A. B. Seelenfreund read letters and telegrams from high government officials and ministers of the United States in foreign countries and presented to Brother Kraus a package containing some six hundred telegrams of congratulation which had been received from all parts of the world during the day.

Wild applause broke forth when Brother Seelenfreund announced that reports which he had thus far received indicated a total of 10,000 new members who had been secured by the lodges of the Order in honor of Brother Kraus' anniversary.

Brother Kraus, deeply moved, modestly disclaimed his right to accept the many encomiums and honors showered upon him, but accepted them as President of the Order as the symbol of the close bonds of brotherly love existing between the widely scattered units of the Order.

The festivities closed with a ball in the Red Room.

The following letters and telegrams were read by the Secretary of the Executive Committee, Brother A. B. Seelenfreund, to the assembled guests:

"It is with great pleasure that I extend to you my hearty congratulations on your many years of service to our city. Your tireless work in behalf of Jewry throughout the world has been an inspiration to thousands and a lesson to mankind. May your years be many more and replete with usefulness.

JULIUS ROSENWALD."

"I congratulate you on having reached the venerable age of seventy. Your magnificent record of services well rendered must be a glorious memory of your past life. May the future hold still in store for you many years of health and youthfulness, which means happiness.

NATHAN STRAUSS."

"May I ask you to convey to Mr. Adolf Kraus my warmest congratulations and good wishes upon his attainment of three score and ten? Mr. Kraus has renedered and is continuing to do such valiant service in the cause of Jewry throughout the world that he well deserves the acclaim and good will of his fellows on this his great jubilee. My sincere prayer is that he may be maintained in undiminished health and strength of body and mind for many years to come to the joy of his family, his friends and for the benefit of his fellow-beings. I am deeply sorry that, for reasons I have explained to you, it has not been possible for me to come to Chicago and personally join in the honors which are being paid to Mr. Kraus.

JACOB H. SCHIFF."

"All hail to the chief; sincere love to the friend; appreciation to the citizen; honor and respect for the loyal Jew. May the days yet to come bring you health, happiness and good cheer.

SIMON WOLF."

From THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY:

"I am gratified to learn that the seventieth birthday anniversary of the Honorable Adolf Kraus, President of the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith, is to be held in Chicago, Feb. 26. His long life marked, by generous deeds, in ameliorating the conditions of the Jewish people all over the world, and his genuine Americanism have won him the esteem, not only of those who have the pleasure of his personal acquaintance, but of those who know of his benefactions and noble nature. The Independent Order of B'nai B'rith stands among those of which it may be truly said they have manifested always that they love their fellowmen and given practical proof of this love.

Sincerely yours,
(Signed) JOSEPHUS DANIELS."

From THE SECRETARY OF COMMERCE:

"I note that the seventieth birthday anniversary of the Honorable Adolf Kraus, President of the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith, a national and international organization, will be celebrated at the Hotel La Salle, Chicago, Ill., on Feb. 26.

Mr. Kraus has been president of this organization for a great many years and this organization has been a great and important factor in the last eighty years in ameliorating the condition of the Jewish people all over the world. Mr. Kraus has, during a long life, enjoyed an enviable reputation for high-minded Americanism and strict integrity.

I congratulate the Order upon its long and useful career and Mr. Kraus upon having enjoyed a long life of usefulness to his country and to his people, and wish him many more years of usefulness and happiness.

Very truly yours,
(Signed) J. W. ALEXANDER."

THE SECRETARY OF WAR
Washington
February 11, 1920.

When I first came to know the Order of B'nai B'rith it was then engaged, as it has been since engaged, in widespread benevolence and good works. I am happy, therefore, to congratulate Mr. Kraus that his seventieth birthday anniversary finds his career capped by the presidency of this great society, and to congratulate him that he is permitted to contribute to its work the fine reputation which he has made in America as an upright business man and a loyal and useful citizen.

(Signed) NEWTON D. BAKER.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOR
Office of the Secretary
Washington
February 12, 1920.

I am glad to convey to the Hon. Adolf Kraus, President of the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith, my sincere felicitations on the celebration of his 70th year. The record of his good works throughout a long and useful life is, however, the best crown of so many years devoted to the benefit of his fellow-men. The connection of Mr. Kraus with the B'nai B'rith organization during the last decade and a half is in itself a testimonial to the high ideals of that association, and reciprocally his continued leadership of such an organization is a tribute to his own character.

(Signed) W. B. WILSON.

SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR
Washington
February 13, 1920.

On the coming celebration of the seventieth birthday of Hon. Adolf Kraus, President of the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith, I extend to him my hearty congratulations upon reaching his three-score years and ten. I know that he heads an organization that is one of the most liberal and useful in the country. I trust it may grow in numbers and in power for good.

(Signed) FRANKLIN K. LANE.

A Symposium from European Districts

District No. 8

WITH our brothers in America, and in other countries where the I. O. B. B. has unfurled its banner, we are united in the sentiment of love, respect and gratitude to the President of our Order, Brother Kraus, and together with them we offer him on Feb. 26, when he reaches the Psalmist's age, our sincere homage.

We had but on two occasions the privilege to see him in person and to discuss with him vital questions of the Order. Yet, during the short period of time which our master and leader spent in this district, he won the hearts of all brethren by his democratic and refined demeanor and his charming personality. Those who know the warm tone of his letters, who were impressed by his far-reaching intellect, who gave thought to his program and his aims for the future of the Order and its position in Judaism, will look up to the jubilarian with still higher respect and offer him from the depth of their hearts the sincerest gratitude for all which he has done for the Order and for the whole Jewish world during his incumbency of office.

One of Brother Kraus' fondest wishes was the ambition to make the Order universal in the fullest sense of the term, to create branches in all countries, and at the same time to strengthen the organization internally by a united and harmonious co-operation of all members of our body. For this reason Brother Kraus defended most emphatically the maintenance of the few forms and symbols which we possess and worked for unification of symbols and ritual in all districts.

He further, in order to manifest the unity of the Order before the outside world, recommended the creation of an emergency fund, to which all districts shall contribute. This proved a far-seeing, wise suggestion which at once found assent from all districts and lodges. When we deliberated on this emergency fund we were living in a state of undisturbed peace. Not suspecting the imminent catastrophe, we called the fund in honor of the Grand President, the Adolf Kraus Fund. Soon afterward a catastrophe such as the world has never seen before overwhelmed us. The fund enabled many districts to alleviate the first wants created by the war.

The aim of our Order, "to succor the victims of persecution," received under the administration of Brother Kraus a broader interpretation. Brother Kraus based his policy on the experience that Jews suffer most in countries where they are subjected to medieval disabilities, and that they are stunted materially, intellectually and morally when they are denied the rights of human beings. Starting from this conviction, Brother Kraus first took up the fight for obtaining full equality for the Jews in politically and culturally retarded countries. He went energetically to work, making use of diplomatic channels. Opinions may differ as to the advisability of political action on the part of our Order, but we all agree with Brother Kraus when he interprets the battle for human rights, not as a matter of politics, but as a moral duty, and moral duties assuredly fall within the scope of our Order.

The President of our Order was criticized in America for paying undue attention to conditions in foreign countries. He replied in his message to the Constitution Grand Lodge, in May, 1915, with the plea that affairs in foreign countries demanded greater attention. "We would be happy," he declared, "if our co-religionists in other parts of the world would require our services as little as they are required by our American fellow-citizens. I believe that our first call to duty lies where our community suffers most. From our point of view the sufferings of our co-religionists are no foreign affairs, regardless of where they may occur. The cause of Israel knows no distinction. The breath of life or our Order is service—service to others."

Loyal to these noble sentiments, we are working in District No. 8. Most of our welfare institutions, our employment bureau, Toynbee Halls, fresh air colonies, children's protectories, etc., were established by the Order mainly for the benefit of our Eastern co-religionists. We are indeed justly proud of the fact that during the terrible World War, from which we had to suffer heavily in our own country, we were enabled to assist from our very limited means our co-religionists in the east of Europe. Even now these Eastern co-religionists still are the beneficiaries of our activity.

When Brother Kraus, in 1905—four years after he had entered upon his high office—carried out his intention to visit our district, the spokesman of the Henry Jones Lodge in Hamburg expressed in his address of welcome the hope that the I. O. B. B., under the proven guidance of Brother Kraus, will bring its influence to bear upon the legislative factors of the United States "that the hospitable gates of the Union shall remain open as long as poor, persecuted Jews migrate to the land of freedom in quest of bread and work, of liberty and education."

We repeat this wish today. In view of the pogroms in the countries having a dense Jewish population, and in view of the boycott which deprives our co-religionists of the means of the most primitive livelihood, we repeat it with all the emphasis of which we are capable.

Brother Kraus has rendered invaluable service to the Order and to all Israel through his intimate relations with the leading personalities in America. Through Brother Kraus diplomats of international fame were enabled to become familiar with the aims and the activities of the Order. They expressed to him on various occasions their appreciation in a manner which conferred credit on the Order and on the Jewish community. We recall as one instance the beautiful words spoken by Mr. Bryan, then Secretary of State, at the convention of District Grand Lodge No. 5, in 1913:

"The Order endeavors to arouse sympathy with the downtrodden and suffering. Any man who believes that he can promote his own welfare by oppressing others is in error. It is our duty to conciliate mankind and to bring men nearer to one another. I fear the aristocracy of wealth, I respect the aristocracy of intellect, but with all my soul I cling to the democracy of the noble heart."

We pray on this occasion that a kind Providence may further guide the beloved jubilarian, may add to him years of strength and grant him the privilege to participate for many years to come in the prosperity of his own family, of the greater family of the Order, and of the whole household of Israel.

The symbol of the Order in America is the Menorah. The President of the Order is the high priest whose duty it is to kindle and to maintain its light. May the light of this Menorah radiate far and wide and illuminate all souls with the light of charity and human kindness, with the light of Benevolence, Brotherly Love and Harmony.

IT was in the year 1866, the year that marked the crumbling of the first of the corner-stones upon which the Austrian monarchy rested, that a sixteen-year-old stripling left his native home in Bohemia, which was at that time one of the crown lands of Austria, in order to seek his fortunes in the new world, for new world indeed it was to an Austrian subject of that time. The Jews had not as yet been granted any legal guarantees of religious equality with other citizens of the State. The path to American, therefore, was to the Jew, the path to real freedom.

There was one thing which the Bohemian Jews had at that time, and from time immemorial, and that was a strong sense of family solidarity, a high regard for rectitude and integrity of character, and considering the limited opportunities, a good education and training and above all, a true religious devotion to the ideals of Judaism. In the place where Brother Kraus was born, in the vicinity of the West-Bohemian coal mines, these same high ideals and virtues dominated the humble home of his parents.

In addition to his talent and capacity for hard work, Brother Adolf Kraus derived from the place of his origin, his firm reliance on God, his strong endurance, his uprightness of character and the inexhaustible energy which stood him in such good stead to gain a footing in that new world where it was so difficult to win in the grim struggle for existence. To attain to the status of a liberal citizen of the United States, as a lawyer, as the defender of the weak and oppressed, as a spokesman for the people of his own faith and as a leader of our beloved Organization carrying the fight for justice and humanity before the forum of states and nations is indeed no mean task.

When we heard the sad news of the demise of our never-to-be-forgotten brother, Leo N. Levi, we were all deeply concerned about the future of our Order. But it was a consolation to us to learn that Brother Kraus was elected to his place. We, of Austria particularly, were more pleased than ever that those of our brethren who had helped organize and place on a firm footing the Order in Austria and that those who had established the Order in Vienna had had a Bohemian and Moravian origin.

Brother Kraus fearlessly took up the struggle with his fellow-workers in the Order, against the injustice and terrorism of the Czar at the time that he began to agitate the abrogation of the American commercial treaty with Russia. At the beginning of the war while America was still neutral, he told all of us of his plan for bringing aid to the cause. During the war he did all in his power to arrange matters in such a manner that the results of the labors of the various Jewish Congresses with regard to Jewish interests, might be brought before the Peace Conference at the conclusion of the war. He took the matter of organizing a distribution committee for the relief of war sufferers energetically in hand. He sought to meet in a firm and yet kind manner the countless requests which came to him from Middle and Eastern Europe for aid, requests emanating from regions suffering because of national animosities and lacerated by race hatreds.

It is only now when viewed in the light of the present that we are able to appreciate fully his wisdom which at the time made possible anything like an adequate approach in handling a situation created by a world catastrophe—in his creation of a fund for the alleviation of the destitute. It was lamentable that this catastrophe later proved so colossal in its dimensions that it went beyond all human foresight or power of mitigation.

Hardly had the war's fury slightly abated, when the Secretary of the Order was sent to Europe with full power as representative, to look after the rights of the oppressed. It was here that the spirit which he breathed into the Order was so splendidly portrayed. I cannot do other than compare this spirit with the invisible forces of magnetism which as soon as a disturbance has become adjusted, attract each other with invisible power from pole to pole or part to part. In spite of the upheaval and changes in Central and Eastern Europe, our Organization held firmly together, so that it might fulfill that which to Brother Kraus first appeared as a vision.

On two occasions we had the pleasure to greet him and his wife and son and welcome them into our midst. We were charmed with his graciousness and unassuming dignity, his natural understanding and his devotion to the ideals of our Order. This we discovered in rich measure during his visit as we always do whenever an unkonwn brother visits us from a distant land. We were indeed unexpectedly surprised to find that faith in him extended far and wide—a faith that links brother to brother across seas and continents. We found that in Brother Kraus the rays of brotherly love are epitomized in his person as a bright and resplendent focus of a concave mirror.

Incidentally we were privileged to peep into his inner family life and observe the beautiful relations existing between himself and wife, the guardian angel of his career, and also the cordial relations between himself and son, Brother Dr. Harry Kraus, who is treading in the footsteps of his illustrious father in carrying on the work of the Order.

We have only our heartiest congratulations and gratitude to extend to Brother Kraus on this his seventieth birthday anniversary — gratitude for that which he has contributed to our Order and to us. We wish him many many years of useful activity. May the words of the Psalmist ring true and come to fruition for him. "The righteous blossom as the palm and bloom as the cedars of Lebanon."

DR. SOLOMON EHRMANN.

ON three continents, wherever our Order gained a foothold and where it displays its blissful activity, hundreds of lodges and thousands of brothers are preparing to celebrate on the 26th of February the seventieth birthday of the universally esteemed President of the Order.

All of us are profoundly impressed, and at this moment, more than ever before, with the application of what the Order, and, through it, the Jewish cause, possesses in Adolf Kraus. "I do not anticipate", he said in an address delivered June 6, 1909, in a special meeting of the Karlsbad Lodge, "that our organization will find a nostrum for all ills. While, however, every District must work for charity, brotherly love and fellowship feeling among its members, the Order as such has the aim not merely to assist but to lead in such questions which affect Jewry as a whole. This is my view and this is the program which I shall outline for the future activity of the Order. The covenant of our brotherhood must always be ready to stand in the first line of the battle, fighting for the oppressed among our people, to help them carry their burden, and to battle with all its might, yet within the limits of the law of the land, which also

No one can ignore the fact that there is a general problem in Poland from which the Jews are suffering along with the rest of the population, while owing to the hostility of the government it affects them more than the rest of the population. Colonel Gilchrist, head of the U. S. Medical Corps, reports an epidemic of typhus which may become a menace to all of Europe, and the Relief Committee sends out a frantic appeal for additional funds. A correspondent to ''Bloch's Wochenschrift'' who discusses the work of the committee with remarkable fairness says there are 2,000,000 Jews in Poland who need relief. It would require 100,000,000 marks to give 50 marks per capita each month. It takes 10 marks to buy a pound of bread, 30 marks to buy a pound of sugar, 1,500 marks to buy a ton of coal. It does not seem from these figures that even 50 marks per month could be a substantial relief. Yet, the representative of the Joint Distribution Committee had only 11,000,000 marks in September and 15,000,000 in November at his disposal, or at best less than one-sixth of the sum required to buy five pounds of bread for each person per month.

The Political Situation

Mr. Morgenthau in an address delivered before the Free Synagog in New York (Feb. 15) stated very impressively that emigration will be no solution of the Jewish problem in Poland and admitted that ''some of the Poles resent dealing with the Jews or having anything to do with them.'' At the same time he claimed that it is ''in some cases the fault of the Jews.'' The ghetto wisdom has a terse answer to this charge. It takes two to perfect a ''shiddnch.'' As long as the Poles do all in their power to drive the Jews into isolation, the result of their policy ought not to surprise them. A Paris dispatch informs us that during the last three years the counter-revolution has caused the arrest of 128,000 and the execution of 9,652 persons. The terrible tragedy of Pinsk (April 5, 1919) reported by Mr. Morgenthau, shows how the Jews contributed to these appalling figures. ''Dwa Grosche'', the organ of the boycott movement which Paderewski helped to finance, continues to advocate ''hanging and shooting'' as a means to cure the Jews of Bolshevism, for just now they whose political influence can be measured by the legislative activity of the sejm are declared to be responsible for the move to make peace with soviet Russia. The best reply to this charge is given by the Italian socialist Arnaldo Cipolla in ''Lavoratore''. He says while the Jews disclaim Bolshevism, no one should wonder if they would actually join a party which promises them a modicum of liberty and justice in a country which is controlled by a military aristocracy and is a helpless prey to corruption and distress of the masses, felt more keenly by the side of brutal exhibition of extravagance on the part of the rich.

Muzzling Publicity

The Yiddish daily ''Najes f'n Hajnt'' was confiscated for publishing an article by Deputy Hartglass on the corruption in public office. William Zuckerman, an American journalist, was arrested and—at this writing is still under arrest—for sending some unpleasant reports on the Jewish situation to his paper. Two Jewish members of the city council of Lodz were indicted for criticizing the partiality of the government's food commission. We may therefore believe Professor Sabolea of Edinburg University, a Belgian by birth, who told his audience in a lecture that a Polish ''statesman'' had repeated to him the doctrine of Pobedonoszew of czarist memory that there are three ways of solving the Jewish question, kill the Jews outright, starve them or force them to emigrate. The second method is already being largely practiced. From the foodstuffs sent for relief in eastern Galicia the Christians received 9 kilo white flour, the Jews at first nothing, and afterwards when stories began to leak out, one kilo of mixture of poor flour substitutes per month. Arrest and heavy fines are the lot of those who dare make public complaints. The treatment of the prisoners rivals that of the czarist times, described by George Kennan years ago, and those out of prison are terrorized by the police. Thus without cause the police surrounded the railroad depot of Wilna, arrested 60 Jews, young and old, among them a boy of 13 and a man of 75, whipped them with iron rods, struck them with the butts of their guns and abused them in many other ways. When some complained to the general, he told them to go to a warmer climate. An attempt to interest the U. S. consul failed to bring any result, and according to an interpellation by the Jewish members of the sejm, the French troops participated in the sport of their Polish comrades in arms. The sejm has added another item to its interpretation of the minority rights by passing a law which prohibits the holding of real estate by ''aliens'', which means Jews, not registered in Polish cities who by a recent enactment, although long time residents, were declared foreigners. It is difficult to understand how under such conditions the Jews can give up that separateness of which Mr. Morgenthau complains.

THE SYNAGOG OF KARLSBAD

Up to 1848 Jews were not permitted to reside in the city and could only sojourn there during the ''season'' in the summer months. In 1869 a congregation was formed. The synagog was dedicated in 1877. A Jewish sanitarium was established in 1847 and the present sanitarium was opened in 1903. During the war it was used as a military hospital and so badly ruined that its administration is compelled to ask for assistance in remodeling it

Old and New Enemies

Sazonow, once the powerful minister of finance under the czar, who when on a mission in London refused to see a Jewish committee, now promises the Jews all rights. Unfortunately he comes too late. On the other hand the antisemitic editor Shulgin, continues to threaten Jews with improved pogroms unless they repent. The ''Kievlanin'' in which Shulgin uttered this friendly advice, is very likely now in different hands, and Purishkevitch, the leading pogrom advocate, who planned a propaganda tour in the United States is dead.

the soviet government, judging by the change of policy of the allied powers who have withdrawn their troops and have announced the resumption of trade relations with the Russian people, seem to be firmly established. Kolchak is dead, and the Ukrainian leaders are in full flight. The reports are so unreliable that it is impossible to give any details. We learned to our surprise that a Jewish colonel, Paul Jagolovitch, arrived recently in Chicago on his way to Washington, as a special envoy from General Seminaoff, the commander of the ''loyal'' troops in Siberia. He acted the diplomat and refused to say anything about the Jewish question except that the Jews of Siberia are waiting for the first opportunity to emigrate. Denikin, who is evidently a dead issue, received a post mortem indorsement from the former French labor leader, Gustave Herve, who claims the brave Ukrainian general was a model of civic and military virtues. Still stranger is a similar indorsement coming from David Pasmanik, the Zionist leader, at present in London. In the same city we see Arnold Margolin, Ukrainian ambassador, engaged in the same whitewashing process of Petlura. He is said to have demanded a Jewish commission to verify his claim that he did all in his power to protect the Jews. On the other hand Paul Nathan, the well-known Berlin publicist, claims that allied help to Denikin is responsible for the terrible sufferings of the Jews. This assertion is supported by Dr. Kohan-Bernstein, for years prominent as advocate of the Jews in Kishineff who told stories of incredible barbarities perpetrated by the various Ukrainian leaders. In one case an officer of Petlura's army, being implored by the rabbi of a town near Kiew to spare the lives of the innocent children, had 70 of them lined up and ordered his soldiers to cut off their heads like so many thistle heads with their swords. The number of victims is given at various figures from 29,000 to 150,000. We can merely hope that the experience of exaggeration in all horrors will prove true in this case. It is certain that the American committee was not able to visit the country.

New States

Finland which is a highly cultured nation always had the sympathy of Europe against Russian tyranny, has never displayed any inclination to do to the Jews as they wished Russia to do to them. The celebrated Hebrew publicist, Nahum Sokolow, had an interview with the Finnish ambassador in London who declared that the Jews of Finland shall have equal rights. To Sokolow's complaint that even the native Jews of Finland were treated as aliens, the ambassador could only reply that he would inform himself. The total Jewish population of Finland does not exceed 1,000 souls. It is worth remembering that the Jewish disabilities in Finland date from the time when it was part of Sweden, and continue there, while the mother country abolished the last vestiges fifty years ago. Lithuania and Latvia, the two new republics, on the other hand, make all possible efforts to convince public opinion of their claim to recognition by not only granting their Jews full equality but going even so far, as, in the case of Lithuania, having a special ministry for Jewish affairs, and in Latvia giving the Jews inofficial representation on the central government.

The Country of Christian Re-Awakening

Hungary is completely in the hands of the white terror. The new dictator, Nicholas Horthy, is the leader of the reaction which has assumed the task of ''bringing Hungary back to Christianity'', as the official program runs, and the party slogan says. Meantime the distress in the capital is appalling. The bread ration has been reduced to three ounces a day, and even this is in most instances unobtainable. The rationing of fats has been withdrawn, not because of abundance but because the supply is so scant that rationing is impossible, and the result is that the rich are living in extravagance, while infants are dying daily by the hundreds from starvation. The government is trying to lull the masses into confidence by denouncing the "Jewish communist" administration and spreading stories of its brutal persecution of Christians. In addition its own misdeeds rival those of the czarist regime. The editor of the socialist paper, "Nepszawa", and two of his friends were kidnaped, cruelly murdered and their bodies thrown into the woods. A great demonstration of the labor party on the occasion of the funeral of the victims moved the government to a declaration that it will make all possible efforts to find the guilty parties and punish them. The victims were Jews. Similar murders were committed in Kecskemet and in Miskolcz, where 18 Jews were killed. Individual Jews are submitted to scandalous indignities. A Jewish soldier who returned from an Italian prison camp was on his way to the steamboat landing in Budapest, assaulted and robbed of what he had by Horthy's soldiers. The following case is typical of the prevailing conditions, though rather amusing. Under the Magyar regime it was customary for Jews to change their names to such of Magyar sound. Humor has seized upon this mimicry. Four Jews meet in a railroad car and introduced each other as Kaposi, Kemenyi and Karolyi, the fourth one says: "Ich heiss' auch Kohn". In former times all the formality necessary was to report to the court the changed name and pay a fee of 20 cents. Recently one Ernest Gruenhut applied for the right to change his name, and was refused on the ground that he had not shown sufficient merit to deserve such distinction. The former premier Hussàr said in a campaign speech that the new Christian government will not persecute Jews but the "enemies of Christianity must be forced out of public life", and indeed the Jewish professors were discharged from the universities, so the Jewish hospital of Budapest was enlarged to a clinic to form a nucleus of a Jewish university. The enthusiastic support given to the Magyars by the Jews since 1848 has not prevented them from becoming victims of chauvinism, which is a general rule. A fact, briefly noted from dispatches in the last issue of the News, is another evidence. Father Hackspill, member of the parliament from Metz, says in his paper, "Libre Lorraine", that Clemenceau's defeat was due to the Jews whom he selected as his advisers, the ministers Abrami (who is no Jew) and Klotz and his assistant secretaries, Mandel-Rothschild and Wormser.

Lessons from God's Judgments

Isaiah tells us that when God's judgments strike the earth, its inhabitants learn righteousness. We have not been able to see much of righteousness as the effect of God's judgment which visited the earth for the last six years, but we are learning something of ethnography and geography instead. We know that there is a nation, called Ukrainians, we have added Yugo-Slavia and Latvia to our vocabulary, we know something about the difference between Lithuanian and Lettish and between Czech and Slovak. The last named two tribes so far seem to get along, although there is a difference between their national character, the Czech apparently being of a more liberal and more educated type. They were already excommunicated by the Sant' Uffizio which is the official name for the Holy Inquisition which in years gone by used to roast Jews. This condemnation of the reform movement within the Czecho-Slovak church is none of our concern. We gladly admit the complete right of Rome to disapprove of married priests and of mass in the vernacular, and would consider it highly reprehensible for any Jew to meddle with such strictly internal questions of the church of Rome. Unfortunately, remembering the effect of the Hussite wars we fear that a movement which in our days will hardly be more successful than was that of the Old Catholic church in 1871 or the "Los von Rom" movement of more recent days is bound to result in increased fanaticism. The greatest difficulty for the Jews of Czecho-Slovakia lies in the national question. Bohemia and Moravia have 3,000,000 Germans, most of whom are living in compact territories and are as unwilling to recognize the Slavic government or to submit to its denationalizing tendencies as were the Czechs to become Germanized. The Slovaks in the former Hungarian territory are equally aggressive in their attitude towards the German, Magyar and Ruthenian nationals. From this point of view it is understood that the Jews of Czecho-Slovakia at a convention, held in Prague, Jan. 5-6, decided to organize themselves as a separate nationality which the government is said the have recognized. The Hungarian Slovaks have some just cause of ill-feeling against the Jews for having served the violent policy of national oppression by the Magyar rulers, and Srobar, the minister for Slovakia, in an address delivered in Presburg denounced the Magyars for their base ingratitude to the Jews to whom they owe so much in the development of Magyar culture. When it comes to positive deeds of the Slovaks the matter takes a different aspect. His excellency issued an order requiring special permits for the management of moving picture shows from which "Jews and people with a bad record" shall be excluded.

Old Country with New Troubles

A boy of 14 was to be tried in a Vienna court for stealing. His father appeared in his place because the boy had no shoes and the father could not afford to buy any. He earns 3,000 crowns a month but this is not sufficient to suport a family of seven. The bread ration given for the week is just enough for one breakfast, so the children go out to steal. During the war, while the father was serving in the army, they were standing in the breadline or were begging in the street, or they had no clothes and could not go to school. The consequence is that today they are not used to discipline. In Jewish affairs the economic condition is illustrated by the fact that the principal of the Talmud Torah receives 600 crowns (the present actual value is $2.50) per month, while a pair of shoes costs 1,000 and the meanest suit of clothes 6,000, and a ton of coal 1,500 crowns. The internal conditions are again illustrated by the figures of withdrawals from the Jewish congregation, selected at random from the report of one week. It amounted to 63. Before the war the average was 20. The political situation is characterized by antisemitism from both sides, the clerical and the German chauvinist parties. Robert Stricker, the only professing Jew who is a member of the national assembly, moved to recognize the Jewish nationality, but the old-fashioned Jewish bourgeoisie opposed the motion, and so the Jews do not even present a harmonious front to the outside world at this critical moment.

THE HIRSCHENSPRUNG

The rock from which, according to the legend, a deer jumped into the Sprudel, when the Emperor Charles IV, 14th Century, was hunting in the region. It is claimed that his whining when he was scalded led to the discovery of the Karlsbad Springs

An Unrepentant People

The old conservative parties can no more afford to pass under their name in the new fatherland, and so they are divided into a German National and a German People's party. The difference is expressed by the chairman of the latter, Herr Stresemann, who says: My party "declines to profess antisemitism on principle". In other words it practices antisemitism without making it part of its platform, while the "Deutsch-Nationale Volkspartei" is courageous enough to do it. Without regard to distinct party lines antisemitism is agitated by any number of veteran and student societies. In the latter respect the protest of the students of the Karlsruhe polytechnic against the appointment of the Jewish professor, Max Meyer of Berlin, is typical. Wilhelm Bruhn, an antisemitic editor with a criminal record, shows the effect of the society in which he moves. Referring to Otto Landsberg, the newly appointed minister to Belgium, Bruhn says, he can not get rid of the odor of his race. The "Gartenlaube", once the organ of the bourgeois class and for a time edited by Berthold Auerbach, but now in the hands of the antisemitic publishing house of Scherl, calls Alfred H. Fried, the pacifist, "a Jew speaking the German tongue, who, from his hiding place in Switzerland, injected poison into Germany's wounds". The most amusing stunt was performed by an anonymous author in a book, entitled "Semi-Imperator", in which Emperor William is made a Jew on his mother's side who proved his Jewish descent by his constant pose and his nomadic restlessness. This happens at the time when his majesty's correspondence with his dear cousin Nicky of Russia is published, in which he speaks of the Reichstag being driven by the Jewish socialists and the clericals, both of whom are ripe for the gallows.

The present administration is not strong enough to take effective measures against the agitation, with which a considerable number of its officials are in sympathy. The latest news is that the Polish refugees in Berlin were expelled, although Professor Einstein pleaded their cause in the press. A judge in Erfurt refused bail to a Jewish defendant on the ground that the central government which is Jewish will issue false passports to Jewish criminals in order to allow them to escape. The new free state of Danzig advertised a drug store permit—drug stores are still limited in Germany—with the condition that applicants state their religion. Bavaria which is governed by clericals passed a new school law which will result in the closing of many Jewish schools in the village congregations, hitherto subsidized by the government, while public schools, being denominational, will be closed to Jewish teachers as before.

Rumania

The higher diplomats of the lower Danube played a clever game when they kicked against the minority rights, and Clemenceau's statement that "Rumania at last trusted in us", is illustrated by the report from Kishineff that the Jews are yearning for the rule of the czar. In the formerly Austrian part of Greater Rumania things are still worse. In Bukowina a Jew applied for admission to civil service examination. He was given the reply that now since Palestine was given to the Jews he should apply to the authorities there and prepare himself for examination in the Talmud, dressed in Tallith and Tefillin. For the benefit of the allied powers one Jew from Czernowitz was elected to parliament. He was given a profitable gov-

Who Knew Not Joseph?

When, as has been our wont for centuries, we rehearse at this season of the year the story of the liberation from Egyptian bondage, we note that in the Scriptures the beginning of the tribulations of our fathers is coupled with the rise of a new king who knew not Joseph. Joseph had been Egypt's benefactor; endowed with a singular gift of prognosticating the future, he had risen to the highest office in the land next to the throne, and by wise administration of the food supply of the country during the years of plenty saved untold lives from famine in the years following both in Egypt and in the neighboring lands. But this great administrator's service was forgotten, ignored, so soon as there was another ruler, so soon as there was a change of policy towards strangers and towards the tribesmen of Joseph in particular. There is no change that comes about in the world that does not seem to affect the Jew disadvantageously. In the great war the Jews, as was their duty, flocked to the colors; they volunteered before they were drafted; they distinguished themselves on the battle front; they gave of their wealth and of their energy for the weal of the fatherland. The words of erstwhile rulers and chiefs of state still reverberate in our ears as they emphasized with satisfaction how all parties and creeds were united in the common patriotic purpose. Look around in Europe now. Everywhere there is a recrudescence of hatred of the Jew; and it is almost safe to say that of all the peoples whom the world conflagration has engulfed the Jewish people has emerged worse off than it had been before the war. No one remembers now the service rendered by Jewish citizens to the state. A new and vicious onslaught is made on the Jewish people as a body. Whoever is disgruntled, and pretty nearly everybody is, throws the blame on the Jew, the convenient scapegoat of days bygone. All sorts of calumnies are dished up. The pamphleteers are busy stiring up the populace. They advance the charge, which they know is a lie, that the Jews have banded together to wreck civilization. The real wreckers are well known; some may be reached and some may not; but the hapless Jew is labeled and libeled the enemy of European mankind. It is not an ancient story of thousands and thousands of years ago that we sit down to narrate. "In every generation they rise against us to destroy us". Our enemies are bent upon our annihilation. We had hoped for an era of pacification when nations would be blessed with external and internal peace. We had hoped that Jewish history might open a new chapter which would mean the complete liberation from all discrimination and hostility, and when the Jew might with his fellow-citizens reap the harvest that had been sown in tears. The end apparently is not yet of Jewish misery. The Pharaohs are still alive. The Josephs are forgotten. New tribulations are in store for us. But we will not lose faith. "And the Holy One, blessed be He, rescues us out of their hands". We have survived graver periods and graver perils. We must be ready again to do valiant battle on behalf of our hapless brethren. Pacification of the world has received a setback. None knows what the morrow may bring. But this we know that as the Lord was with our fathers in Egypt He will be with their children wheresoever they are harassed, enslaved, maligned. Truth will prevail. Oppression must cease some day. Men must learn that in discriminating against the Jew they kill freedom for themselves. May we in no distant future celebrate the new liberation from bondage? The Passover of Egypt is the guarante that there is a God of truth who is the Friend of the downtrodden whether they be of the people He chose for His own or among the rest of mankind.

Intellectual Advancement in the Lodges

The student of the history of our Order knows that one of the prime considerations that led to its formation, in point of fact the principal consideration, was the desire for intellectual advancement. It is needless to point to the conditions then prevailing which made imperative and timely the creation of an agency for just that purpose. Such outstanding institutes as the Maimonides Library and the like showed how in those early days the founders and fosterers of the Order went about the business of giving tangible form to their intellectual advancement program, how they conceived it and how they executed it. Other impulses in the direction of creating educational facilities proceeded from within the Order. It was not necessary at all that the Order should actually take in hand and finance such institutions of learning; it is sufficient that the projects emanated from far-sighted leaders in the Order. In the main the educational field had to be left to other bodies, some of which had to be created for the object contemplated. The Order and the Districts had their hands full with the creation and support of hospitals and orphanages, of the philanthropic institutions of which we are justly proud. The Executive Committee devoted itself energetically to the political side, to the defence of Jewry abroad, or again to measures of relief in emergencies. Nor is the activity of the Order exhausted by all these lines of work. It has called forth the department of social and personal service; it has taken in hand the care of the delinquent; and established the Anti-Defamation League. What we wish to emphasize is that the original feature of intellectual advancement somewhat receded into the background. Not that there is nothing going on in this line of work; one need only scan the reports of lecture courses in the larger centers as they come in to this office and are printed in this paper. Nevertheless it cannot be denied that there is not enough of it; that especially in outlying communities where facilities for instruction do not exist much remains to be done. The districts are alive to the need. The feeling is universal that the individual lodge meetings require to be made attractive and profitable. The members meet to be strengthened in their noble purpose to do something for a fellow-Jew. There is so much that the other Jew needs at our hands. Still there is something also that we ought to do for ourselves. In the larger communities there is no dearth of talent among the lodge members. They boast of eminent and gifted speakers possessing the faculty to guide, to inspire, to inform. It is the lodges less fortunate that need looking after. But in all lodges a fresh face and a fresh voice will command a larger gathering and thus increase the potencies for mental stimulus. We notice with pleasure that brothers of national repute find it possible to accept engagements to speak in far-away lodges. The trouble that they are put to may be great; but so is also the good which they achieve, the lasting influence their spoken word leaves behind. These men are naturally busy men. Yet they give of their time liberally. There are so many questions that agitate the Jewish mind today. There are so many angles of vision. No two men approach a subject from the same point of view. There is not a question that cannot be reopened. And there is no worse danger for any man than to become set in views which may be antiquated which had their origin in a different period, which do not meet present-day exigencies. Differences of opinion and party slogans often disappear like the mist when an eminent intellect turns on for us the light of reason. The Order has its well-defined policies and must adhere to them tenaciously. The lodges must not legislate beyond their competence as constituent parts of a world-wide organization. But all may serve as clearing houses for Jewish opinion. In our lodges different elements of the community mingle fraternally. This is our glory. Coming from different congregations and from different social strata, the old-fashioned and the reformer, the native and the naturalized citizen, all meet on a common level of doing their duty by the Jewish cause. All that tends to present this cause in all its clarity is a service of incalculable magnitude. This is the meaning of intellectual advancement to which the several lodges and district organizations are applying themselves with a renewed zeal worthy of the Order's traditions.

Freedom of the Spirit

By Dr. MAX L. MARGOLIS

In this season of our ancient festival of freedom it is well to bring home the lesson that the emancipation of the enslaved body is but half of the boon that freemen value. Of what avail is the enfranchisement from forced labor no matter in what form when the spirit is held in bondage? After all, freedom is relative. Not only are there degrees of freedom, but in a measure freedom is achieved solely by paying for it in some return. Of course it is all the difference whether the arrangement is a matter of voluntary contract. But what is voluntary? We usually think of freedom from legal force. Yes, the law leaves me free to engage myself or to disengage myself. But what about the economic conditions which inexorably force me to sell my services in accordance with a market price over which I have not the least control? If I put up with conditions not exactly to my liking, to that extent I am unfree? Whatever competency or leisure I may acquire comes in exchange for so many hours of labor during which I am under obligation. In other words, unfreedom of one form or another is the price of freedom. The laborer who goes daily to his task knows it and feels it. Many a human tragedy consists in missing one's vocation or in failing to develop one's talents or in falling short of one's measure of achievements simply because of external conditions beyond one's choosing.

We would, if we could, choose our own conditions. That of course is impossible. But we do a lot of grumbling. Yet no one seems even to realize that there is such a thing as freedom or unfreedom of the spirit. But are we not free to think as we please? Quite so. But the fewest of us think on their own account. For the majority of mankind their thoughts come to them ready made as their clothes. Facts we must all be taught. Just as I go to my shoemaker when the heel on my shoe needs straightening, so do I go for a knowledge of the movements of the planets to the astronomer. But experts do not always agree. In so far as I am able to verify their calculations I may flatter myself that I have an opinion. Otherwise I take always somebody's word for it. In other words, I am unfree to that extent. I am governed in my opinions by another spirit. Facts are valuable. We spend our young days on the school bench to acquire a knowledge of them. But far more important are opinions. The joy of life is bound up with the flights of our imagination. Science would exercise control over opinions likewise. But sometimes the data are not available, and much is left to guesswork. The average mind does not distinguish between the true knowledge and its counterfeit. Whatever is printed must be so. The conscientious scientific writer or historian may preface his guesses by some such remark as "It may be that". But these prefatory remarks are passed over lightly by the reader and by the time the scientific or historical findings filter through to the masses their restrictions are not even dreamt of.

In the realm of politics it is common experience how the fewest think for themselves. We give each man and woman a vote. They vote on political measures on which there is a difference of opinion. How many voters think for themselves? The party and the partisan press do the thinking and deciding for them. Their mind is, of course, unfree. But so it is in all matters which are not capable of strict proof. In reflecting on our school days we may, if we take the trouble and analyze some of our most cherished personal likes and dislikes, our opinions in general, discover that in reality they are not our own, that we imbibed them sometimes indirectly and imperceptibly from a teacher consciously or unconsciously influencing us. Those who really think for themselves, whose spirit is free, require often a lifetime to disengage themselves from opinions insidiously forced upon them by other minds. The vast majority continue through life with the first impulse received in their school-days. The conscientious teacher will often revise his opinions. He is a constant learner. But his newer insight is beyond the reach of those sent out. And if the truth be told, the opinions that are offered to the people by popularizers are almost always behind time. This is the age of the specialist. We cannot all follow him in his investigations. We must take conclusions for granted. But with some an opinion once acquired becomes an obsession. Nothing will dislodge it. Scientific questions especially in the province of history are never closed. They can always be reopened. They are constantly being reopened, revised. To consider them settled, and settled in accordance with a certain conclusion

Heartiest Congratulations

By EMIL G. HIRSCH

THE editor of the Reform Advocate asks the privilege to be one of the many friends who gladly eager to mark by special festivities the seventieth anniversary of the birthday of our well beloved and highly esteemed townsman and co-religionist, Adolf Kraus, even now a few weeks before the happy day, are remembering the many services which the birthday child has rendered to our Jewish community as well as to the city of Chicago and Jewry throughout the globe. The fraternity that has had the advantage during many years to count him among the chiefs directing the policy and administering the affairs of their organization naturally claim the honor of leading the celebrants. A special meeting of the Executive Committee has been called to convene on the anniversary day, February 26, in our city, and the session, it is planned, will conclude with a banquet tendered their president, at which Mr. Taft, former President of the United States, and Mr. Jacob Schiff, to whose name no descriptive qualification need be added, will interpret the feelings of love and respect and gratitude of which the reunion around the festive board is intended to be the happy expression. Temple Isaiah, too, the congregation with which Mr. Kraus has been identified from its very foundation and the history of which may without exaggeration be claimed as a chapter of his biography, will in similar manner dignify the week by gathering the constituent families at an evening festivity.

The editor in asking to be counted amoung these nearer associates of him who will be the recipient of these well deserved manifestations of respect and affectionate gratitude is sure that he is speaker for every reader of his publication. The aims and the ideals to which in an inadequate manner the editorial columns have been endeavoring to lend utterance have indeed been among the pole stars by which our dear friend has steered his noble life's course.

Mr. Kraus may be said to be in the best sense of the term a self-made man. His cradle did not rock on our side of the Atlantic. Like many another of the men of light and leading in America's Jewry he was offered in the land of his birth but scant opportunity for education and gainful occupation. A Jew he had from childhood on to carry the burden which prejudice had devised for oppressing the members of the family of Israel. Like many others, when a mere lad he heard the summons to get him out of his birthplace and out of his father's house, and he turned his steps to the land which he and many of his generation indeed could not but believe was the land pointed out by God. He carried across the wide sea but little of this world's goods. But he possessed a more precious dower in his Jewish optimism, in his faith in the God of his fathers, a faith which spelled at the same time for him faith in himself, self-reliance grounded on loyalty to the insistent law of righteousness and on the inspiriting devotion to high duty. His ambition from the first hour of his landing on the strange shores ran high to fit himself for a profession. As soon as he had mastered the language of the country that was henceforth to be his he took up the study of the law, and upon his admission to the bar of Cook county he established himself a practicing attorney. The integrity of his character, his rare tact, his ready ability to grasp quickly the underlying principles of every question, and the salient points of the differences in controversy, soon brought him success and clients whose confidence once won he was retained for all time. The firm of which he was in the beginning the sole member soon enlarged. One of the best known among the attorneys now practicing in our courts and the courts of the nation, a man of exceptional gifts of mind, a leader now of the profession, was for a time his associate and has continued the tradition of those earlier years of the beginnings of his most brilliantly successful career.

But the profession did not absorb all the sympathies of Kraus' heart. Time and talent and treasure even Adolph Kraus from the very incipiency of his active work, has given without stint to the high cause of Judaism. The fraternal order of the Sons of the Covenant more especially attracted him and appealed to him as the one great movement to which he ought to lend his stimulating cooperation. I daresay the thought that this order purposed to unite all Israel on the broad basis of Jewish Humanitarianism and Jewish Idealism was the magnet which drew him on. To this his early love Adolf Kraus has remained true throughout the happily blessed years of his enlarging professional and civic preoccupations. Many doubted, he never wavered. Many became lukewarm, he kept the fires of his enthusiasm brightly burning on the altar of his ideal conception of the function which it was for the order to fill in the labors of United Israel. The order had indeed been the great unifier and the Americanizer of immigrant Jews who had sought and found a home under the stars and stripes. Overburdened when they came with local idiosyncracies of their original home districts, partisans to a certain extent of either unyielding orthodoxy or of equally narrow and fanatical reform, unused to parliamentary proceedings and discipline and somewhat inclined to self-asserting insubordination, it was in the lodgeroom, not in the congregation's vestry-rooms, that the lessons of the essential unity of Israel were inculcated and the American type of Jewish self-reliant manliness was developed. When the tidal wave of enforced immigration from Russia's now happily lifted pale broke upon us, again the order proved a mighty agency of far-reaching service, continuing the work accomplished for the earlier pioneers from foreign lands now adapted to new necessities. But under Adolf Kraus' stewardship the order grew into a strong international organization, illustrating the unity of all-Israel in a new emphasis which even the passions of the world war could not altogether becloud. In fact, as is well known, immediately after the signing of the armistice, largely at the initiative of Mr. Kraus, the order set about re-establishing relations between the nationally divided members, and it has risen to new potency as the channel for the requickened spirit of conciliation renewing among Jews the consciousness of the common humanity of all in God's family of striving and suffering mankind. Needless to say that as the order has aimed to be above the partisan spirit of the older dispute about Orthodoxy and Reform so it has been rightly and righteously indifferent to the pro-Zionistic or anti-Zionistic Shibboleths. To no small degree this neutrality hospitable to the adherents of both camps alike came about in consequence of the tactful and just impartiality not to be held synonymous with apathy and indifference which has always animated the decisions and balanced the opinions of the president at the head of the executive committee.

Adolf Kraus, however, knew full well that after all the congregation and not the Lodge is the true and determining organ of the Jewish consciousness.

As indicated before, he is numbered among the founders of Isaiah Temple, an organization which under the able leadership of Dr. Joseph Stolz has indeed made for itself a unique place among the congregations of our city. The congregationalism of Adolf Kraus has never been of that narrow kind which looks askance at another congregation as though it was a competing establishment; that will try to win members away from the sister congregations and will therefore cry out its wares at every street corner to attract new customers and snatch the "trade" away from others. This misconstruction of the relations between congregation and congregation transfers from the field of commerce to that of religion methods which even in the former domain are reprehensible. The growth of one congregation makes for the growth of all others. If the Rabbi is regarded as a teacher and not as a commercial solicitor for a rival establishment his influence cannot but redound to the benefit of all other occupants of the pulpit. Congregations should organize on the basis of principle. Some may find religious inspiration from a ceremonial ritual that others find cold and barren of moral or religious influence and without meaning. Let them then choose their congregational affiliations accordingly. Local conditions, too, at times necessitate and excuse the establishing of separate congregations and religious schools. The element of personal prejudice and congregational jealousy is truly unethical. Though vitally concerned with the growth of his own congregation, Kraus always rose above the pettiness which only too often determines the attitude and vitiates the spirit of the Jewish congregations in the large cities. He was a most successful Parnass, but to him may rightfully be applied the sentiment expressed by the Talmudic authority (Sanhedrin 92a) Kol Parnass shemanhig eth Hatzibur bena'hath zokheh umanhigom le'athid labho. The head of the congregation who displays in his direction the spirit of good will is entitled to be considered meritorious he will lead them forward to a glorious future.

For a time Kraus filled the office of corporation counsel of Chicago. For many years he was a member of the board of education, and for several terms its president. A loyal citizen he, a devoted and enthusiastic Jew, a co-worker in all things making for the betterment of men and their condition, a sturdy pleader of the cause of the downtrodden Jews, our friend has indeed filled the three score and ten of his life with meaning and great and lasting worth. We rejoice that his cup of life now brims with "Yayin" wine of such fine quality. Yayin wine equivalents in its Hebrew lettering the number seventy. Now, in accordance with the amendment to the constitution, Yayin wine may have to be replaced with Mayim water, but Mayim spells ninety. May the bumpers filled with water in which we shall pledge his health augur that for at least another decade we shall enjoy the presence among us in health and full vigor of our beloved Parnass. Perhaps a good Providence will answer our petition that to Ken (also seventy) wekoh yosiph lo, in English may He who gave him seventy years add wekoh-31 round of happy and meaningful years to this measure of days. To this wish in behalf of the Reform Advocate I am proud to say Amen, so may it be. Ad Meah Shanim until and beyond the century milepost.—From The Reform Advocate, Feb. 14, 1920.

Acrostic

A brilliant example for all to follow,
Does this self-sacrificing leader furnish;
Of thoughts, how to allay distress and sorrow,
Lend aid and counsel, most kind and unselfish,
Full of sympathy for the weak and oppressed.

Kraus, is synonymous with "Consolation",
Relief of distress, through kindly hands,
And, above all, for true co-operation;
Under his leadership, our great Order stands,
Superior to all, here, and in foreign lands!

Anti-Defamation League

ONE of the principal reasons for the organization of the Anti-Defamation league was the recognized desirability of a central office representing American Jewry which could act authoritatively when necessity arose. For many years, the league has been emphasizing this point, but from time to time has, nevertheless, been caused considerable embarrassment through the more or less officious action of individuals who take it upon themselves to speak on behalf of American Jewry. A striking illustration of the danger of such procedure and a convincing proof of the efficiency of a centralized organization is found in the following incident:

On March 12, Brother Sidney G. Kusworm, of Dayton, Ohio, member of the Executive Committee for District Grand Lodge No. 2, forwarded to the office of the league a copy of a household organ, entitled "Home-Spun Yarns," published by the Mohawk Valley Cap Factory of Utica, N. Y. On page nine of the publication appeared a cartoon, entitled "The Evolution of a Bolshevik," showing in three drawings the evolution from a donkey to a most disgusting caricature of a Jew. This cartoon was immediately recognized in the league's office as having been reprinted from an advertisement appearing in "Cartoons" magazine. The league had been in communication with the publishers of "Cartoons" and with the company which had used the objectionable cartoon in its advertisement with entirely satisfactory results, the latter company promising that the drawing would not be used in further publicity work.

On March 15, the following letter was sent to the Mohawk Valley Cap Factory:

Gentlemen: Our attention has been directed to a drawing appearing on page nine of a recent issue of Home-Spun Yarns which we understand is published by your company. The drawing is entitled "The Evolution of a Bolshevik" and is evidently reproduced from an advertisement which recently appeared in "Cartoons" magazine.

The illustration which you publish lends weight in a most insidious manner to libelous and defamatory statements which are being circulated with reference to the Jews of Europe and America and has a decided tendency to create distrust of the great mass of Jews of this country who are law abiding and patriotic Americans.

We do not believe that you realized this situation when you reprinted the drawing in question. We would appreciate it if you would advise the persons directly responsible for the makeup of the magazine of our views in the matter so that greater care might be used in the future.

Thanking you in advance for the courtesy of a reply, I am

Very respectfully yours,
LEON L. LEWIS,
Secretary.

The reply dated March 19 clearly indicates the wisdom of the general policy of the league in matters of this sort and it is certain that the results sought was achieved. The treasurer of the company wrote as follows:

"Your letter of March 15 is received and read by us with considerable surprise. We did not appreciate the situation when this particular cartoon was re-printed and we are exceedingly sorry if any impression has gone out that we wish to make any defamatory statements regarding the Jews in this country, who are, as you say, law abiding and patriotic Americans. We value a number of this nationality among our close friends and we wish to assure you we will see to it that nothing of this kind appears in our periodicals in the future."

The injury from officious meddling by individuals in matters affecting entire Jewry is clearly demonstrated by

News from Germany

By Our Special Correspondent

PORTENTOUS events have passed since the last report from the German District appeared in this paper: war, with all its sufferings and the unparalleled changes which it has brought over Germany. It sounds like an idyl now when we report from the last days preceding the war that our late brother Moritz Manheimer donated a fund for a prize to bear his name and which shall be given annually for the best essay on a subject dealing with the fundamental principles of humanity, justice and toleration.

Soon afterwards the war broke out and affected the work of the lodges in all its phases. Many brethren answered the call of the country, and the smaller lodges, most of whose officers served in the army, could continue their activity only under the greatest difficulties. All lodges succeeded in the end to accommodating themselves to existing conditions. The families whose bread-earners were taken from their midst received special attention. The employment bureaus adapted themselves to the war activities. The lodges placed their premises at the disposal of the army medical service and contented themselves with rented quarters. Naturally, the expenditures of the Grand Lodge and of the subordinate lodges grew considerably, and we gladly acknowledged the aid which we received before America entered the war from the Executive of the Order for welfare work. Our Grand Lodge also established a branch for welfare work, for which it raised a per capita war tax of ten marks, payable in two years.

The Grand Lodge may point with pride to the equipment of a hospital train which it placed at the service of the Red Cross. This train did remarkable work, and on its tours acted as a connecting link between the various lodges.

When America entered the war we were deeply impressed by the attitude of President Brother Kraus in breaking off all correspondence and intercourse with us. We emphasize this particularly because soon afterwards occasional remarks and discussions in the B'nai B'rith News which were hostile to Germany caused irritation in the German district. Some lodges resented this attitude and insisted on taking retaliatory action. We are, however, happy to say that even during the height of the national excitement, the traditional feeling of friendship for our American brethren was not for one moment seriously affected. The German brethren were almost unanimously convinced that the Executive as well as the large majority of the American brethren stood by them in unchanged fraternal affiliation, and they were confirmed in their conviction when President Kraus, immediately upon the close of the war, sent Brother Seelenfreund, the Executive Secretary, to the European districts to prevent their threatened disruption.

We may regard it as a sign of vigorous Jewish life that it was possible, even during the war, for the District to create benevolent institutions of far-reaching importance for the Jewish life. The Grand Lodge, with its subsidiary lodges, participated prominently in these activities. A Central Welfare Office was established which serves as a clearing house for social welfare activities, thus avoiding duplication and making for economy. This central office, during the two years of its existence, has done a great deal of good and secured for itself a respected position in Jewish communal life. The Grand Lodge co-operated with the German Union of Congregations (Gemeindebund), the Jewish Woman's Society and the congregation of Berlin. The first president of the executive board is our grand president, Brother Timendorfer. Another new organization whose importance reaches far beyond the boundaries of Germany is the establishment of a Jewish Academy which shall comprise all the scientific material pertaining to Judaism and give opportunity to train specialists in Jewish research work. The Grand Lodge took a prominent part in this work and placed the interests of the "Timendorfer Stiftung" at the disposal of this organization.

Another new foundation is a Jewish Popular University which has for its object to spread knowledge of Judaism in wider circles. The first lectures were held in the Berlin Lodge Building, and among the lecturers are a number of our brothers.

We expect to submit a special report of the participation of the brothers, their sons and sons-in-law in the war. The following round numbers of Jewish soldiers deserve to be mentioned in this connection:

Killed in action or died of wounds 8,000
Decorated with the Iron Cross II. Cl. 15,000
Decorated with the Iron Cross I. Cl. 9,000

The Treaty of Versailles has struck our organization a heavy blow. The lodges of Metz and Strasburg have already disbanded. In the east we lost the lodges of Kempen, Posen, Krotoschin, Lissa and Ostrowo, which cities are annexed to Poland, while the lodge of Danzig will belong to the new free state of Danzig. The fate of the lodges in Gleiwitz, Hindenburg, Kattowitz, Koenigshuette, Oppeln and Ratibor is in the balance pending the plebiscite.

The war, which stimulated some of the noblest aspirations of humanity, also fanned the lowest passions. A tide of antisemitic agitation worse than anything we have experienced in the past is flooding Germany in spite of the establishment of the republic with a democratic constitution. We have to admit, however, that the government is no party to it. The moving factors are the old reactionary parties, which are displaying great energy and spending money lavishly in order to infect the people with the antisemetic virus. We regret to state that these efforts met with considerable success, although we have not been threatened with pogroms. We still hope that it will be found possible to check the advance of the antisemitic tidal wave.

While the order has lost a number of lodges in Germany, we are glad to state that we have gained not inconsiderably in membership in the remaining lodges, and we pledge ourselves to continue undisturbed in doing our share toward the spiritual and moral uplift of humanity.

Jews in Latvia

The Jews of Riga, who number ten thousand, have succeeded in obtaining subsidies from the town council for all their cultural institutions, including all primary and secondary schools. The administration of the schools belongs exclusively to Jewish parties, and the only demand expressed by the Lettish authorities is that the Lettish language should be taught in the schools. The actual language of instruction will be Yiddish in the lower standards, and Hebrew in the higher standards.

Afforestation in Palestine

The acquisition of Palestinian ground, as the perpetual, inalienable property of the Jewish people is the principal task of the Jewish National Fund. But the afforestation of Palestine is of no less importance for the reconstruction of the country. Whether this work, with which the JNF has been entrusted, will have to be carried out by the JNF alone, or whether government institutions will participate is not yet certain. In any case it is the JNF's duty to take advantage of the opportunities now offering themselves, and to commence the work of afforestation where this is necessary in the interests of colonization and sanitation.

Even before the war it had been decided, as is known, not to restrict the "Tree Donation" in future to the planting of fruit trees, but to employ the funds raised for the planting of useful trees of all descriptions—especially forest trees. Practical experience gained in Palestine has taught us that the planting of fruit trees, which need individual care, can best be left to private initiative. Then the necessity arose for planting swamps, sand-dunes, and other waste lands with fruit trees, especially with the rapidly growing eucalyptus. The afforestation of such districts opens vast stretches of land for colonization, forms an important preliminary condition for the sanitation of the country, and offers the possibility of providing in the land itself the urgently needed timber for building purposes, etc. It was not possible, however, while the Turkish rule lasted, to begin the work of afforestation seriously. Neither was there anyone who had experience in the choice of suitable kinds of trees and the right methods of planting. The capital of the "Tree Donation" was, therefore, largely invested in the plantations of Ben-Schemen and Huldah, which, under the existing circumstances, proved rather unsuccessful. In addition to the difficulties, accompanying the beginnings of all colonization work, a plague of locusts did serious damage to the plantations. Finally the plantations in Ben-Schemen became the seat of war, and that which the locusts had left was almost entirely destroyed by the fighting.

During the war the Laborers' Co-operative Association in Ber-Tobiah planted, as an experiment, 100 dunams of NF-land with eucalyptus trees. This experiment was entirely successful. Last year the Anglo-Palestine Company and the Real Estate Company "Palstine" had 200 dunams on the slopes of Mount Carmel planted by a laborers' co-operative association with rock pines. This plantation also promises, in the opinion of experts, to be successful. These experiments have indicated to the "Tree Donation" a new way of realizing its program of afforestation by means of laborers' co-operative associations. Experts think that this method is of great importance for the reconstruction of Palestine, the sanitation of the country, and also for the solution of the labor problem.

The JNF Board has now drawn up on this basis a scheme for the afforestation of Palestine on a large scale. According to this plan—which stretches over three years—1,700,000 eucalyptus and other kinds of forest trees are to be planted on an area of 2,125 dunams.

1. In Merchavia 20,000 eucalyptus trees are to be planted, in connection with the sanitation of the settlement, on 200 dunams.

2. In Kinereth and Daganiah 42,000 eucalyptus and other kinds of forest trees are to be planted on 175 dunams on the slopes of the mountain, the farm of Kinereth, the banks of the Jordan and the shores of Lake Kinereth.

3. In Benschemen about 700,000 trees are to be planted on 230 dunams.

4. In Hulda 425,000 trees are to be planted on 140 dunams.

5. In Ber-Tobiah (Kastinie) 27,000 tress are to be planted on 380 dunams with the exception of those already mentioned above.

6. In the surroundings of the Colony of Chederah 50,000 trees in all, mostly eucalyptus trees, are to be planted on 1,000 dunams.

To this must finally be added the work of afforestation in Rischon-le-Zion. At a general meeting of the Colony it was decided to transfer 500 dunams of the adjoining sand-dunes to the JNF as a perpetual possession. The condition was attached to the gift that the JNF must have this land planted with trees in the course of three years. This act shows what importance the inhabitants of the Jewish colonies attach to the JNF. The JNF Board has lately entrusted the afforestation of the dunes in Rischon-le-Zion to a group of 18 laborers from the Nachlath Jehuda Laborers' Association. This Association began the work at once, and about 35,000 trees have been planted. During the first two months 25 additional laborers were employed, who, together with the original 18, will do the work under the direction of the Agricultural Department of the Palestine Office.

This work of afforestation gives an added justification to the claim of the JNF that all waste lands in Palestine be transferred to it free of charge. It will also enable the JNF to fulfill all its obligations in the very near future, and to plant all the trees which have been subscribed—a total of about 400,000 up to the present time.

Murder of the Czar

The London Jewish Correspondence Bureau reports: The Secretary of the Joint Foreign Committee of the Jewish Board of Deputies and the Anglo-Jewish Association said, in a meeting of the committee, that the accounts of Jewish complicity in the murder of the Russian Imperial family issued in a White paper by the Foreign Office, have since been proved to be false. Information has now been received with regard to the trial of 28 persons arrested by the Soviet government as a result of an investigation carried out under their instructions at Perm, on the charge of having been concerned with the murder of the Czar and his family. Not one of these persons appears to be Jewish. Moreover a full report of the trial is soon to be published, when all the necessary documents have been received.

The Secretary further stated that he had been informed in Paris that an investigation carried out by the government of Admiral Koltchak had also failed to identify any Jewish participants in the murders.

In the Hands of the Bolshevists

The London Jewish Correspondence Bureau learns from Paris that M. Henri Sliosberg, one of the leaders of the Russian Jews and a prominent lawyer, has been arrested by the Bolshevist authorities in Petrograd, being suspected of being a party to a counter-revolutionary conspiracy. Only with great trouble has he been able to free himself from the Red inquisition.

M. Sliosberg is 60 years old. After the capture of the town by the Bolshevics, he was forced to become a laborer and, with his wife and children, to work on the land which had been assigned to the peasants after the division of his own domain. Everyone has a profound respect and affection for this old proprietor, an affection the more truly felt owing to his advanced years. It was owing to this fact that he was not driven from his house like most of the proprietors who have been made to work on their own land.

News from London

By Our Correspondent, DR. M. EPSTEIN

London, February 17, 1920.

THE many-sided activities of Jewish communal life certainly bear testimony to a healthy condition. But one may be excused the doubt whether mere activity alone is productive of results. Still, movement and the expenditure of energy are better than quiescence, and on the whole Anglo-Jewry is striving towards achievement. What will emerge? So far the great Communal Scheme dominates the horizon. It must be admitted that its promoters are restless in pushing its claims, and both in London and the provincial centers Jews cannot complain of not being aware of its existence. Attractive advertisements in the Jewish papers remind the community weekly that it has still to do its duty; public meetings provide opportunities for exchanging views with the leaders themselves on the issues involved, and through the post those are poked who might be inclined to do nothing. In the main the scheme in its outlines may be said to enjoy the support of the great mass of the community. But discordant voices are also heard. These are of two kinds, those of people with a personal grievance, the born grumblers whom nothing can satisfy; and those of people opposed on principle to certain aspects of the scheme. The former are of no significance and may be left out of account; the latter cannot be neglected.

It is inevitable that in the process of time the lines of cleavage in the Anglo-Jewish community should show themselves. Here is a scheme which is ostensibly orthodox in its scope. The Chief Rabbi is to be its ultimate religious authority. Traditional Judaism is written on its banner. Whatever these things may mean in actuality, it is certain that those who are convinced Liberals and Reformers will undergo searchings of heart. Can they contribute to a scheme opposed to their principles? That is their question, and the answer has been furnished by the two wings of the Liberals in London. The Liberal Synagogue, of which Mr. Claude Montefiore is regarded as the head, has definitely declined to be associated with the scheme. The Berkeley Street (or Reform) Synagogue is not yet certain of its conduct. At a recent meeting two proposals were presented to the members—one that they should support the Communal Scheme, the other that before pledging their support they should examine the details with care. The second proposal was adopted. This means in effect that while the door is still open, the Berkeley Street congregation is not yet sure of its ground, is not yet sure whether the program of the scheme can receive its adhesion. Needless to add the promoters are in a quandary. On the one hand, they had perforce to give the scheme a Conservative coloring; on the other hand, they are bound to consider the fact that the Berkeley Street congregation contains many wealthy members whose financial assistance is almost a necessity. On top of all this comes the extreme orthodox section with special requests. The program is not specific enough for their tastes. They are urging their supporters when contributing to the scheme to ear-mark the amounts for special purposes for which they themselves are making big demands.

A United Anglo-Jewry

These differences of opinion are inevitable. The problem is how to rope in all sections of Anglo-Jewry into the scheme and at the same time satisfy the needs and demands of each. It is a problem of difficult statesmanship, and some of the leaders of the scheme appear to be confident that they will find a way out. If they do they will deserve the highest praise. For if there is one thing about which all parties are agreed, it is that Anglo-Jewry must in the future present a united front. It must be united in order to strengthen internal growth; it must be united also in order the more effectively to repel attacks from without. There is no need to have uniformity; let each section, nay let each congregation, enjoy and exercise liberty of action. But let there be loyalty to a high, all-embracing body. The thing is not impossible of achievement. Many thinking men and women would like to see some such arrangement materialize.

Jews' College Ceremony

In the course of last month Jews' College held its annual Public Prize Distribution. The chairman of the afternoon was Sir Marcus Samuel, and the principal's address was even better than his best of previous years. He appealed to the students for religious conviction; he declared that anti-Semitism is one of many symptoms of intellectual decay and that blind hatred and vituperation is a sign of diseased morality. "History is a great teacher", said Dr. Buchler; "but even more so Jewish history, as it describes the unequal, but successful, struggle of a small and weak people, carried on throughout the dark centuries with only intellectual and religious weapons, against ignorance and prejudice. No other legion or system of thought", continued Dr. Buchler (perhaps here he might fittingly be styled Brother Dr. Buchler), "has yet approached the moral code of the Pentateuch and of its rabbinic interpreters". In speaking of Plato's ideals, Dr. Buchler maintained that they fall short of Jewish principles. "High as was the ethical ideal of Plato, it was surpassed by that of authoritative Judaism in religious firmness and sanctity". As a statement of the religious system of Jews Dr. Buchler's speech was admirable and timely. It deserves to be carefully pondered by Jews of all shades of opinion. Nor should his report on the present condition of the college be overlooked. He informed his audience that Jews' College had some half-dozen students all told. If this state of affairs continues the supply may dry up completely.

Our Yeshibas

In curious contrast to the paucity of theological students (which, by the way, is a complaint also heard in non-Jewish communities in this country) must be placed the ever-increasing Yeshibas in London and the provinces. What is a Yeshiba? A high school for the exclusive study of the Talmud might be as good a definition as any. Young men flock to these schools and spend the whole day in droning the sing-song of the old method of learning the Talmud which is associated with the Academies of Poland and Lithuania. The war must have destroyed many of these Rabbinic nurseries. But overwhelmed they have not become. They have been set up in England and in America, and the remarkable thing is that they stand for the old ideals, little Talmudic islands in the midst of the ocean of Modernity. What becomes of these students? Some serve congregations as readers and secretaries; a few actually develop into Rabbis; and the majority become merely sons-in-law. The last statement may appear astonishing. It is, however, perfectly true. Surprising as it may seem, there are old-fashioned Russian Jews in our midst whose ambition is to find for their daughters husbands who are men learned in the Torah. They are prepared to give the young couple a handsome dowry, and often, too, to take the young man into business. Is not this a species of romance in this age of reality? And yet this ideal for sons-in-law is as good as any other. Some people prefer it.

Jews, Turks, Infidels and Heretics

On Good Friday, if we are correctly informed, Christians pray to Almighty God to have mercy on Jews, Turks, Infidels and heretics. Such is the wording of the third "collect" appointed for the Good Friday services in the Anglican Church. This very month of February will become famous in the annals of Ecclesiastical history in that the Convocation decided that in future the "collect" shall be worded in these terms: "Have mercy upon thine ancient people, the Jews, and upon all who deny thee or know thee not". Why mention the Jews at all? The ancient form is to say the least picturesque. There one can imagine so easily the Jew, the Turk, the infidel and the heretic—whatever he may be. But the vagueness of the new form cannot compare with the precision of the old, and if Jews are to be prayed for at all, the old wording is much warmer. However, there is never any harm in prayer. And talking of praying for the Jews reminds us that a Jew has given all London a sensation. Jacob Epstein, the sculptor, is exhibiting a daring figure of Christ, which the majority of people admire intensely. Those who are by way of being art critics speak in prophetic tones, saying, "Behold, here the sculptor of the age"! Certainly the Christ is remarkable in conception. The most striking feature about it are the hands which are peculiarly large and are intended to convey strength. Seeing that Jesus was a Jew, it seems eminently fitting that a Jew should furnish the world with a conception of what he was. The mediaeval Christs are not satisfying.

Peace Celebration

The Anglo-Jewish community celebrated the Peace at a public banquet given by the Jewish Historical Society of England in honor of the twenty-fifth anniversary of its foundation. The occasion was graced by a representative gathering over which Earl Reading, the Lord Chief Justice of England, presided, and which included the Lord Chancellor, your own Ambassador, Viscount Burnham, Colonel Patterson and a host of other distinguished people. It was a magnificent spectacle to see so festive a gathering, and the Lord Chief Justice was at his best in the opening speech. He spoke of the Jewish Historical Society; he spoke, too, of what English Jews had done in the war. The Lord Chancellor's speech that evening was great. He confessed that if he were a Jew he would glory in it, and would be proud of the fact. Lord Burnham, the proprietor of the "Daily Telegraph", also spoke charmingly; and among those who represented the Jewish Historical Society were Dr. Gaster, the Chief Rabbi, Mr. Israel Zangwill and Dr. I. Abrahams. The last-named toasted the American Ambassador, who replied in a witty speech that won all hearts. He was accorded a magnificent reception. The function was voted a huge success.

Sir Stuart Samuel Honored

Nor was it the only one this month. The return from Poland of Sir Stuart Samuel was made an occasion by the Board of Deputies for honoring its president; and here, too, a successful gathering was arranged. Mr. Nathal Laski, treasurer of the board, entertained a select party at dinner before the larger reception, and altogether it may be said that Sir Stuart Samuel is one of the most popular men in Anglo-Jewry. He deserves his popularity. As chairman of the Board of Deputies he has won universal recognition for his ability, his impartiality and his honor. His brother, Herbert, is now in Palestine, whither he has proceeded at the instance of the British government to advise with General Allenby. He was the right man to send, and the Jews in Palestine look to him with great expectations.

Palestine a Thorny Problem

Whether they will all be realized remains to be seen. It is becoming increasingly clear that Palestine is likely to be a thorny problem. The land will need developing from a state of almost sheer primitiveness. That clearly will necessitate the overcoming of difficulties—physical, technical and economic. But the political position will not be exactly roses, roses all the way. The Arab problem is a reality, which will call for tact and skill and statesmanship. There will also be cultural difficulties. The Mizrachi are traditionalists in religion; the present leaders (and many, many followers) tend to what is termed "linkness". Nor is this all. Labor problems, financial problems, the organization of the Jewish university—these will all need handling and solving; these will all require skillful guidance. Yet whatever the sum total of the difficulties may be, there is a strong determination to master them, and nothing in the world can compare for effectiveness with the determination of Jews. It is good, therefore, that the people should gradually become accustomed to envisage the difficulties, and of late the leaders have lifted the curtain of romance and shown the rocks of reality. The Supreme Council is sitting in London at present, and Dr. Weizmann and Mr. Sokolow are here, too. They are utilizing their presence in our midst by addressing public meetings and taking counsel on this and that with people qualified to give advice. On the whole, the direction of the movement is being licked into shape. It is not yet quite as many would like to see it, but it is improving.

London Lodge, I. O. B. B.

The London Lodge commenced the year 1920 by electing new officers. For president they chose the present writer; to assist him as vice-president, Brother Isaac Landau was selected, a man who has won great respect everywhere for his sincerity and earnestness. We know that his heart is in the work of the lodge and the brethren can rely on him as on a firm rock. Brother Greenbaum is the treasurer. He, too, is deeply interested in the welfare of the lodge, and if Brother Landau is a firm rock, Brother Greenbaum is a tower of strength. But these three office-bearers would be of little influence if they did not possess an effective pair of secretaries. Brother Henry Samuel is our new honorary general secretary, and it is sufficient to say that the lodge will find him reliable. Brother Samuel is one of our younger members, and true to the principle of calling on the co-operation of the younger men, the lodge wisely placed its confidence in Brother Samuel, who is an Oxford man of distinction. For his colleague, in the office of honorary foreign secretary, he has Brother Dr. Jochelmann, who is known for his energy and skill in managing large movements and large meetings. The members of the Council are Brothers Dr. Israel Felman, S. de Hass, S. Rowson and Maurice Myers, and Brother Goodman, last year's president, becomes monitor. It is a strong team, and the lodge needs such a council, for now that the war is over there is a keen determination to strengthen the London Lodge and to extend its activities. A word of thanks is due to Brother Goodman for piloting the society during a year of unsettled conditions, when the influences of the war had not yet quite ceased and the influences of the peace were being only partially felt.

Current Events

ernment's contract—for which he probably has to pay a liberal commission, customary in Rumania, as is evidenced by the fact that Bratiano refuses to submit his books for examination—and he will faithfully perform his task of testifying to the happy condition of the Jews in Rumania.

The Future of Zion

At the moment of this writing the Associated Press reports that Emir Feisal was proclaimed king of Syria. Is it a new melodramatic gesture of this "prince du melodrame" or the signal of a serious rebellion of the orient against European rule? Only the future can tell. Prince Feisal has learned enough in Christian Europe to be all things to all men. To a representative of the Jewish Chronicle he says, the Jews may come to Palestine but must leave the idea of national autonomy behind. To Mr. Herbert Samuel he says again that the Arabs have no objection to the Zionist scheme, if its realization be postponed, but in Jerusalem a big mass meeting of Arabs was planned to protest against the pro-Zionist policy of the British government. The governor prohibited it, and as the best Arab rifleman can not hold out against artillery, the meeting was not held. The British and French governments are ostentatiously favorable. Mr. Winston Churchill declared in the House of Commons that he saw in Zionism a bulwark against bolshevism, a rather sinister compliment, when we recall that he defined bolshevism as the policy to put Russian Jews in the place of Britains. Nahum Sokolow was received by Premier Millerand and President Deschanel. "Palestine News", the Jerusalem weekly, and various Yiddish papers promised early in January the solution of the Turkish problem before January will be over. This has not transpired, although Nordau, formerly denouncing the acceptance of the British scheme as treason, has come around, although the congregation of Florence, Italy, has elected a majority of Zionists to its board of trustees and a Caucasian Jew has walked on foot all the way to Palestine, and soviet Russia has removed the ban on Zionism. This is not said in a spirit of derision but is given as an illustration of the optimism prevailing in Zionist ranks, not yet justified by genuine achievements.

Communal Life

The noteworthy gathering in honor of the seventieth birthday of the president of I. O. B. B. gave occasion to the beautiful tribute paid to the Jews in general and the Order in particular by ex-President Taft who said that the school of suffering had educated the Jew to the lessons of justice and charity. We can furnish a proud record of this fact in this review every month. The plan to build various additions to the Mt. Sinai hospital of New York at the cost of $3,250,000 is another brilliant example. Our country excels in this respect the Jewries of all other parts of the world. The I. O. B. B. has not limited its activity to physical benevolence but has extended its activity to moral uplift. In view of the recent charges against the immigrant Jew, we are glad to have exact figures on Jewish criminality gathered by Rabbi Meyerowitz in Leavenworth, Kansas. The federal prison had 44 Jewish among 1,833 civilian and 26 among 1,215 military prisoners, i.e. slightly more than 2 per cent, figures exactly like those obtained by the present writer in the state institutions for juvenile criminals in Mansfield, Ohio, and Jeffersonville, Ind. In other words, the Jews of the United States forming more than 3 per cent of the total population furnish a little over 2 per cent of the criminals.

This encouraging picture has unfortunately its dark side. Belated news from Germany tell us of the formation of an "Academy of Science of Judaism" formed in the darkest hours of the national crisis. At the head of the movement are the meantime deceased philosopher, Hermann Cohen, the great gynecologist Leopold Landau, the philosopher Ernest Cassirier, once called to Harvard, the universally famous Albert Einstein, August von Wassermann, another international medical celebrity, Richard Sobernheim, one of the leaders in Germany's public life and a number of others. The object of the society is to cultivate Jewish "science" in a strictly academic way. When shall we see our Jacobis, Michelsons, Jacques Loebs, etc., nomina sunt odiosa, interested in such objects? It is even reported that soviet Russia appropriated 2,000,000 roubles for a Yiddish encyclopedia. This and the report that the old czarist generals speak highly of Trotzky's ability, may, if true, bring a change into our views of bolshevist tendencies. The orthodox Jew worked for the Torah "that it shall not depart out of the mouth of our children and children's children henceforth and forever". The little town in Slovakia, Tapolcsany, received a legacy of 1,000,000 of crowns for the maintenance of a Yeshibah. It is now in a quandary how to dispose of the funds. The deceased rabbi, Feiwel Schlesinger, left a will—as an old humorist put it—that his children shall not be rabbis but Jews, and the congregation would like to elect one of his sons. Now what has the modern Jew done for strictly idealistic purposes?

We are spreading. Japan, owning to the war which brought fugitive Jews from Russia to these "isles of the sea". has now a few Jewish congregations, perhaps only temporary, as probably most of them expect to go to America. Finland, the forbidden country, has a Jewish paper, "Judiske Kroenika", published by-weekly in the Swedish language. We are taking part in all activities of humanity. Albert Einstein is acclaimed by Sir Oliver Lodge as the discoverer of a revolutionizing truth. Sidney S. Abrahams was appointed judge of the British civil administration in Mesopotamia. He had previously served in Zanzibar. Arthur Schnitzler, the Vienna poet whose drama "Professor Bernhardi" and whose novel "Der Weg ins Freie" show profound Jewish feelings, appealed to some friends in New York to collect for him the royalties, due for his plays. He has been struck hard by the war conditions. Friends of Mendel Beilis who is living in Palestine send out an appeal for him. He is in great distress. Count Arco-Valley, tried for the murder of Kurt Eisner, the president of the Bavarian republic, exclaims in the court: I am a good Catholic and I hate the Jews. His maternal grandfather was Baron Eduard von Oppenheim, the son of Simon Oppenheim of Cologne, 1803-1880, with whom his loquacious majesty, Frederick William IV of Prussia, took lunch when he attended the dedication of the Cologne cathedral in 1842 for which he was duly lampooned by the editor of the "Kreuzzeitung", Ludwig von Gerlach. Simon and his brother, Abraham, both raised to the baronetcy in 1868, appealed to the king in the interest of Jewish emancipation. The great-grandson hates the Jews. We are a wonderful people. A brilliant genius like Arthur Schnitzler becomes a celebrity in spite of being a Jew, a poor timekeeper in an Ukranian brickyard becomes an international—we feel like saying—notoriety because he is a Jew, and through the medium of a titled fortune hunter a Jewish financier becomes the ancestor of an antisemitic braggard.

Obituary

Julius Fenchel, the founder of the I. O. B. B. in Germany and the first president of District No. VIII died in Berlin (Dec. 25, 1919) at the age of 83. He saw the Order grow from the first lodge of 26 members to a district, comprising now 80 lodges with 9,000 members. The death of Moritz Baerwald, member of the German National Assembly, previously referred to, might be chronicled again in this connection, as an ex-president of Edward Lasker Lodge, and as a proof of the high standing of the members of District No. VIII. Vittorio Rava, the pioneer of the kindergarten system in Italy, and an official in the department of education, at the same time an active worker in the Jewish community of Rome, died recently. His death as that of Henriette Goldschmidt in her 95th year (Feb. 16) who was also active in all educational movements and particularly in woman's rights, give us just occasion to point to what Jews have contributed to the betterment of mankind in educational work. Finally a different idealism is recalled in the death of Jehiel Michel Heilprin, a pioneer of Palestinian colonization, who abandoned a rich estate in Kiew to help in the upbuilding of Palestine, was an intrepid guard who held the rapacious Bedouins in check with his gun, and once entered a lion's cage just to demonstrate to the Arabs that a Jew was not a coward. He was the grandson of the celebrated rabbi M. L. Malbim, a peculiar type of modern orthodoxy who died in 1879 just when a movement was started to call him to the United States as chief rabbi of all orthodox congregations of the country. We are indeed a "peculiar people".

Anti Defamation League

the following report from the Champaign, Ill., representative of the league, who happened to be in the office of the Mohawk Valley Cap Factory Company at the time our letter was received, and needs no further comment:

"While in the office of Mr. McLoughlin of the Mohawk Valley Cap Factory Company on March 18 I had occasion to find out how the work of the Anti-Defamation League is received by the party whom we are trying to interest in our cause. Mr. McLoughlin is a man of high standing in the business world and a man whose friendship I value very highly, also I have great respect for his fairness in all matters dealing with any class or race of people as to their political or religious beliefs.

The matter that I wish to take up with you is the letter which he received from a man by the name of Stein of Utica, N. Y., taking exception to a cartoon printed in the house organ of the company. His letter was one lacking in tact and good judgment, while your letter to these people on the same subject, received at the same time, was in good form and conducive of bringing about the co-operation and result sought after. Mr. McLoughlin who has always demonstrated to me his absolute unbiased and unprejudiced feeling toward our people, was visibly pained to have received a letter such as this. He has immediately taken steps to prevent a recurrence of anything in the future that might be of an offensive nature to any class of people.

But at the same time, I would ask you that you write Mr. McLoughlin or have Mr. Goldstine write Mr. McLoughlin an apology for the tone of the letter which he sent him, as in all fairness to these people I think such an apology is necessary.

I also believe that these matters should be left to the league headquarters and that individuals who feel themselves aggrieved should be restrained by united Jewish public opinion from taking the individual responsibility of being a spokesman for the great mass of people.

I am writing this with the deepest feeling for the cause in which I am as much interested as anyone can be, having been a representative of the league for several years, and I feel that to get the best results that a matter of this kind should not be handled by narrow-minded individuals who do not represent the best example of the people who we are trying to protect.

I would appreciate very much if you could see your way clear to accept my suggestion as outlined above and thanking you in advance for your co-operation, and trusting that I am serving the cause by bringing this to your attention, I am

Yours very truly,
CHARLES STRAUSS."

Freedom of the Spirit

advanced in the past, marks the unfree spirit.

The war and all that it meant may open the eyes of mankind to what extent German opinion and historical constructions "made in Germany" have held our minds in bondage. Germany lost the war because of its inability to understand the psychology of the nations across its frontiers. It miscalculated the English and American minds. We are quite sure now that they never understood us in Berlin and Vienna. Yet when German professors write bulky volumes on the history of peoples far away and distant in time, we accept their opinions as truth. Why should a Heidelberg professor who says that the prophets of Israel were the enemies of their people be less fallible in his wild estimate than his chancellor was in his calculations as to what England or America would tolerate? Germany manufactured the history of Bible literature and the construction of the biblical religion and of Judaism which are now taught in English and American universities. Perhaps a spiritual reconstruction will now come about. It is high time that we pass out from under the hypnotic spell of German interpretation of the Bible. To the extent that we repeat it, our minds are unfree, are German. Let us set about and do our own thinking. And the same applies to some constructions of Judaism which were imported from Germany. They are unsuitable to the spirit of America as they are to the spirit of the Jew. On this American soil let the Jew do his own thinking on the things that concern him. Let him empty out his mind of all foreign prepossessions. The mental cathartic cannot be prescribed too soon and too seriously. Let us be freemen in spirit. Let us endeavor to understand the Bible and Judaism from Jewish premises. And let us apply the American openness of mind. Any other position is unthinkable for the American Jew.

Cleveland, Ohio

On March 17th the B'nai B'rith Speakers Club was addressed by Mr. Peter Witt. Mr. Witt is one of the leading exponents in Cleveland of the single tax and his address and the discussion which followed aroused much interest among the members.

The Purim affair on March 4th at the B'nai B'rith Building surpassed the hopes of those who planned it. King Ahasuerus was there in all his splendor. The music comprised many of the ancient traditional melodies.

The Committee in charge of making arrangements for the Quinquennial Convention of the Constitution Grand Lodge of the Order has been most active in providing for the accommodation and entertainment of the many delegates who are expected from all parts of the country.

Persecution of the Jews in Finland

The following communication has been received from the Committee of Jewish Delegations at the Peace Conference, Paris, dated February 9, with reference to the situation of the Jews in Finland:

Last week Mr. Sokolow, president of the Committee of Jewish Delegations, held an interview with M. Enckel, president of the Finnish Delegation at Paris, concerning the condition of the Jews in Finland. Their number does not exceed 2,000. Almost all of them were born in Finland, the Jews of Russia having for many years been denied the right to immigrate into that country. Under the old regime the Jews in Finland were bound by numerous restrictions, some of which recalled the middle ages (thus they did not have the right to marry without a special authorization). But on January 12, 1918, the Finnish Parliament adopted a law concerning the naturalization of the Jews.

Nevertheless, instead of granting the right of citizenship to all Jews as a whole, the law of January 12, based upon the Roumanian precedent, stipulates that the civic rights will be granted individually to those Jews who shall have demanded them. Notwithstanding the repeated promises of the government of Finland to grant naturalization to all the Jews of Finland within a short time, scarcely one-fifth of the latter obtained this favor during the two years which passed since the passing of the law on January 12, 1918. The largest majority of the Finnish Jews continue as in the past, to be deprived of their most elementary rights. Various absurd reasons are often advanced for the failure to apply the law with regard to the naturalization of the Jews. Lately the Finnish authorities went so far as to class the Finnish Jews as foreigners. They refuse them passports and thus deny them the opportunities of traveling abroad on business and they cannot now leave the country without receiving a special permit to return.

All these measures have the obvious aim of forcing the Jews to leave the country for good. M. Enckel formally promised Mr. Sokolow to inform himself fully concerning these facts. He declared that Independent Finland was ready to realize the complete and entire emancipation of the Jews.

Polish Outrages Against Jews

The London Jewish Correspondence Bureau learns from Wilna: A delegation of Jews from the suburbs of Polczk has arrived in Wilna, where it has submitted to the Jewish community a complaint about the treatment of the Jewish population under the Polish Commander Murowski. This commander has issued an order that all Jews between the ages of 15 and 35 should evacuate the district, and retire behind the fighting area. The Jewish Committee of Wilna has submitted a memorandum to General Oslowski, who is in command of the district, dealing with this matter. The memorandum reminds the General that at the beginning of the Great War the Jews and the Poles fought together against the outrages .of the Czaristic government and the practice of evacuating the Jews. The memorandum also lays stress on the fact that although the military situation occasionally demands the necessity of evacuating the civic population from towns situated close to the war zone, no difference should be made, in such a case, between nationalities or religions. The Jews now are experiencing, from the Poles who once fought with them against these cruel practices, exactly the same treatment as that meted out to them under the old regime. The Jewish representatives—Doctors Schabad and Smilm—called on General Schoptizk, the commander in chief of the troops on the eastern front. The general stated that the order had been necessary on account of the typhoid epidemic which is now raging in the district of Podolsk in order to save the soldiers. The deputation replied that only Jews of a certain age are being evacuated. The general therefore promised to investigate the matter.

Jews in Poland

The Polish paper "Liborumvoto" publishes the following figures about the number of Jews living in Poland. In the territory of Historical Poland there are 5,000,000 Jews; in Ethnographical Poland, 4,000,000 Jews, and in Congress Poland, 1,770,000 Jews, which is about 14 per cent of the whole population. Warsaw had on Jan. 1, 297,977 Jews out of a population of 900,000, that is about 33 per cent. Other towns have a larger percentage of Jews, i.e., Plotsk, 51 per cent; Suvalk, 55 per cent; Siodloc, 56 per cent, and some smaller towns have as much as from 70 to 80 per cent.

In Lithuania—White Russia—the number of Jews is 1,770,000. Wilna, the capital of Lithuania, had, in 1919, 73,000 Jews out of a population of 182,795.

In the Galicia and Teschon district of Silesia, there are altogether 883,000 Jews, which is about 10½ per cent. Lemborg, the capital of Galicia, has 23 per cent, Krakow 21 per cent, Przomysl 30 per cent. In Posen, West and East Prussia and Upper Silesia there are 20,000. The average is 12 per cent of Jews living among the Poles.

Graduation Exercises at Farm School

The graduation exercises of the National Farm School, in Bucks County (near Philadelphia), Pennsylvania, held on Washington's Birthday, Sunday, Februrary 22, were most inspiring and interesting. Notwithstanding a very discouraging wet morning, that promised to continue throughout the day, the sun shone forth in all its brilliancy, when the board and guests stepped forth from the train, which arrived at the school about 3:00 p. m. The party gathered in Segal Hall, where the board, the graduates, guests, faculty and students listened to addresses by the distinguished speakers of the occasion: Dr. Jay F. Schamberg, noted medical expert and professor at the University of Pennsylvania; Mr. Clarence Sears Kates, associated with the work of the late David Lubin, and Mr. J. H. Hoffman, Superintendent of Public Schools of Bucks County, Pennsylvania. Adolph Eichholz, Esq., of Philadelphia, acted as presiding officer of the occasion. Dr. Jos. Krauskopf, the president of the school, having delivered the Baccalaureate Sermon to the graduates on the Thursday evening before, spoke only a few words of farewell to the graduates, as did also Prof. Bernhard Ostrolenk, director of the school. Following the exercises, which concluded with the presentation of the diplomas to the nineteen graduates, and post-graduate certificates to the three post-graduates, the party repaired to Lasker Hall for supper, as the guests of the faculty of the school.

All present expressed themselves in the highest terms concerning the splendid young men whom the school sends forth after three years of training, in all of the departments of agriculture. One of the graduates goes as far West as Colorado to begin his career in his chosen profession, another to Wisconsin, and all the others to places of employment awaiting them, where they are urgently needed to help in increasing the food production of the country.

In the evening the graduates held a play and dance in Segal Hall, marking the close of a week's festivities in honor of their graduation. They constituted a model class, and leave behind them a record of faithful devotion and attention to work, and with them goes the good-will of the entire board and faculty of the school.

The Freshman Class, to be composed of about forty lads, is being admitted to the school now, application for admission to which may be made by addressing Mr. Morris A. Kaufmann, chairman of the Applications Committee, 407 Mutual Life Building, Philadelphia, Pa. The requirements for admission are ages between 16 and 21; a grammar school education, or its equivalent; physical, mental and moral health; and a sincere desire to make agriculture a life's calling. The school gives to lads who qualify, irrespective of creed, and entirely free of all cost to them for tuition, board, lodging, etc., a three-years' course in practical and scientific agriculture. It has farms of nearly 500 acres, equipped with dairies, poultry plants, greenhouses, class rooms, laboratories, etc., while all of the work is done under the supervision of an able corps of instructors. The household and dormitories are in charge of a matron. Young men desiring to register for the new class should lose no time in putting in their applications.

Bridgeport, Conn.

"Our Flag—Yesterday, Today and Tomorrow," was the subject of the address delivered by Mrs. Orville Rector, Chairman of the D. A. R. Committee on the Prevention of the Desecration of the Flag, at an open meeting of Harmony Lodge No. 711 on March 9th.

Convention District Grand Lodge No. 4

National Jewish Hospital

The annual meeting of the Executive Board of the National Jewish Hospital for Consumptives was held in New York City at the Biltmore Hotel, Sunday morning, March 7.

The meeting was of unusual interest, as the hospital has installed a new department, which is one of the most important undertakings of the institution, namely, the Research Department. This department is under the direction of Dr. Harry J. Corper, one of the greatest research experts in the country.

There is under construction a Children's Building, which will have a capacity of forty. This building is the gift of Mr. and Mrs. Nathan Hofheimer, of New York, which will add another most important department to the Institution. The work for the children is largely preventive. All of this adds tremendously to the efficiency of the National Jewish Hospital, which has grown to wonderful proportion in the 21 years of its existence.

In connection with the meeting, a dinner was given at the Harmonie Club on the evening of March 6, in celebration of the seventieth birthday of Mr. Ben Altheimer, the treasurer of the hospital.

Mr. Altheimer has been treasurer of the Institution for twenty years and has been most faithful and efficient in the discharge of his duties. The hospital has been very fortunate to have the interest and help of Mr. Altheimer, who is a philanthropist and a man of splendid intellectual attainment. He has been actively engaged in all religious and philanthropic effort, and has been a generous contributor to charities.

We voice the sentiment of all who are interested in philanthropic work when we express our hearty congratulations to Mr. Altheimer and the hope that he will be spared to continue his good work for many years, in health and happiness.

Constantinople

For the first time in five years news has been received of the activities of Constantinople Lodge No. 678. In a circular dated February 17, 1920, addressed to the members of that Lodge by its President, Joseph Niego, a copy of which has just been received at the office of the B'nai B'rith News, the members are invited to attend a special meeting of the Lodge on February 26th, in honor of the 70th anniversary of the President of the Order, the meeting to be followed by a social gathering. The circular states: "We hope that these two celebrations will surpass by their brilliancy all those which your Lodge has participated in since its foundation. In commemoration of the Seventieth Anniversary of our Grand President, we shall initiate a number of new brothers who will constitute a part of the Adolf Kraus Class. We shall also celebrate the ninth anniversary of the foundation of the Lodge, which today enters upon its tenth year of existence and will dedicate the building which we have acquired through the generosity of our brothers and which has become the exclusive property of the Lodge. We hope that all the members, conscious of their duty to make the affair a success will be present. A detailed report of the two ceremonies will be sent to Chicago. The initiation of Adolf Kraus Class, which is open to members only, will take place in the Lodge rooms at 6 p.m. The entertainment, to which all the brothers and members of their families are invited, will take place at 9:30 p.m., in the rooms of the 'Societa Operaia Italiana.' The best artists of our city will take part in a concert which will be followed by a dance. A free buffet will be placed at the disposition of those present. A subscription list will be presented to the brothers, the receipts from which will be used in some charitable work which will bear the name of 'Adolf Kraus.' Dear Brothers: Let us do honor to the great association of which we are members."

Los Angeles Convention Adopts Uniform Admission Fee—Recommends Radical Changes in Constitution of Order

DISTRICT Grand Lodge No. 4 convened in Fifty-seventh Annual Session at Los Angeles, and during its sojourn there enjoyed the open and whole-hearted hospitality of the brethren of that city.

A Sabbath Eve service at Temple B'nai B'rith, at which Rabbi Jonah B. Wise of Portland, Ore., delivered the sermon, was the opening feature on Feb. 13th of the annual convocation.

On Sunday afternoon, a solemn memorial dedicated to the memory of Brothers Frank Sperling, P. G. P., and Victor Abraham, Presiding Judge of the Court of Appeals and member of the Executive Committee, was held in the beautiful little synagogue of the Jewish Orphans' Home at Huntington Park. The eulogies there were delivered by Brothers Solomons and Ascheim.

A reception at the B'nai B'rith Building was tendered on Sunday evening by the Women's Auxiliary to the delegates and their ladies.

Monday evening was the time set aside for a mass initiation at the Temple. One hundred and fifty candidates were initiated by the Degree Team of Los Angeles Lodge. Brother M. J. Finkenstein presided and Rabbi Edgar F. Magnin acted as Monitor.

A dinner dance, combined with the formalities of a banquet, concluded the festivities on Tuesday evening, at the Hotel Alexandria. The toast of the evening was delivered in a most eloquent manner by Brother Samuel Platt of Reno, Nevada, and the presentation speech by the retiring president, Milton Meyer, was made by Brother Lucius L. Solomons. The following delegates were elected to the Grand Lodge Convention of the Order to be held in Cleveland in May: I. J. Ascheim, Harry Blumkin, D. Solis Cohen, Richard E. Gutstadt, Abraham Jonas, Barnett E. Marks, L. M. Mendelsohn, Milton Meyer, David N. Mosessohn, Henry Newburgh, Lucius L. Solomons, George Samuels, Edmund Tauszky, Jonah B. Wise, Harry K. Wolff.

Several important amendments were adopted at the convention, one of them providing for a uniform admission fee of $10 to be established throughout the District, effective April 1st, 1920, no Lodge being permitted to evade the requirement or to circumvent it in any way.

The Grand Lodge also placed itself on record as being unalterably opposed to the introduction of the Bible into the public schools and the President was authorized to appoint a committee to call on the Governor and Superintendent of Schools of the state of California, to lodge protest in person against any attempt in that direction.

The Convention also approved the following recommendations to be made to the Convention of the Constitution Grand Lodge in Cleveland: That the apportionment of representation in the Constitution Grand Lodge should be reduced to a basis of 400, on account of the expectant increase in membership; that Triennial Conventions should take the place of Quinquennial Conventions; that the age of eligibility for membership should be reduced to eighteen years; that ritualism in the Order should be retained, although the Order should no longer be known as a secret Fraternity; that the Order should, at least for the present, continue on what is known as the Lodge system, with the right of each District Grand Lodge to establish executive sessions for its Lodges.

The Daughters of the B'nai B'rith, New York City

It was with great expectation that the Daughters of the B'nai B'rith anticipated the coming of Feb. 1, 1920, that being the date set for their annual affair, which took place at the Hotel Commodore.

February 1 has come and gone, and the general verdict is that it did not fall below the expectations of the members.

First of all, their 20-page Journal showed good representation, and, judging from the number of people present, one could see that a goodly number of tickets had been disposed of.

The Daughters of the B'nai B'rith are known for their liberality in the channels of benevolence, and in this instance the money realized from their successful venture will be expended in a most worthy manner, part going toward the redecorating of one of the rooms in the I. O. B. B. Home for the Aged, in Yonkers, and the remainder to be expended in their usual custom of supplying needy families with foodstuffs for the Passover Holiday, which relief they have afforded each year since their inception, over five years ago.

However, the scope they intend to cover this year is so large that arrangements are being made to raise more money with which to make good their plans.

is our own law, for the rights of man, until the rusty chains of prejudice are finally broken and until the Jew of every land shall be recognized by law as the equal of his fellow citizens of other faiths".

The history of the Order during the last fifteen years, during which Brother Kraus has guided its destinies, proves in numerous instances that he never for a moment lost sight of the aim which he set for himself and towards which he steadily was, and still is, striving.

We all know his successful action in the fight against the injustice of which our co-religionists in Rusia and Rumania were the victims; against the cruelties from which they had to suffer and the civic and political disabilities to which they were subjected. We know the energetic steps which he took with the highest administrative authorities of the United States on the occasion of the peace deliberations between Russia and Japan. We know the energetic and efficient relief activity whenever and wherever Jews were persecuted and oppressed. In all these cases he and the organization at whose helm he stands were the first to help. It was due to his wisdom and moderation, to his tact and consistent policy that the large American relief organization united in one powerful body which, during the war and after its conclusion, were able to render in such efficient manner, assistance to the unfortunate Jews of Russia, Galicia, Turkey, the Balkans and Palestine.

In this way Brother Kraus won for the Order constantly larger authority and greater influence. New members joined by the thousands every year, new lodges were created in Switzerland, England and Denmark, and a new district comprised the lodges in the Levant.

Our District No. 10 had the privilege and the joy of greeting Brother Kraus for the first time in 1909. He won every heart by his charming personality, by his democratic and at the same time dignified demeanor; and his addresses, free from all pose and yet full of meaning and profoundly impressive, awakened genuine enthusiasm for the Order and its aims.

Brother Kraus was the embodiment of the universalistic mission of our covenant, and with all the self-restraint caused by the reactionary laws of our country we could say clearly enough that our association with the I. O. B. B. meant an expression of our potential forces.

For years, weary and long years, we were cut off from every intercourse with America. No sooner, however, was the war over than the beloved President of the Order proved his indefatigable activity by the mission of the Secretary of the Executive Committee, Brother A. B. Seelenfreund. Our district, owing to the disintegration of Austria, is now limited to the area of the Republic of Czecho-Slovakia and deeply misses the close contact with the lodges of Vienna and Galicia. We feel confident the district will awaken out of all these political and domestic difficulties to a new life, and the Vienna lodges will form a new district which, as we hope and wish, shall prosper. When these rearrangements shall have been completed, the credit will be due to the plan which Brother Seelenfreund carried out with a fine understanding of the situation under the guidance of Brother Adolf Kraus. Brother Kraus further gave us evidence of his brotherly love and sympathy in a touching manner, when he initiated the collection of a loan fund for European brothers who suffered through the war and by the protest against the confiscation of our Prague lodge home which he cabled to the president of the republic.

For these reasons the 26th of February, 1920, will be a genuine holy day for our district. On the basis of our principles, which demand great care in the election of members, it is impossible for us to celebrate the day by initiation of a large number of candidates. We shall, however, hold special festive meetings in all our lodges and start the collection of funds for an Adolf Kraus Fund for brothers in distress. Our hearts are filled with the sincere hope that Brother Adolf Kraus may be preserved to the Order for many years to come in full vigor of mind and body as guide and leader. With heartiest good wishes of happiness and prosperity to the celebrant and his family.

DR. MORIZ HAMMERSCHLAG,
President District No. 10.
Prague, Jan. 26, 1920.

Khedive Honors B'nai B'rith Leader

The Khedive of Egypt has conferred the title of Bey upon Mr. Joseph de Picciotto, of Alexandria, in recognition of his many services. Joseph de Picciotto stands among the first in commerce and finance in Alexandria, and is president of the Jewish Communal Schools and the B'nai B'rith and a member of the Council of the Community. During the war he devoted his energies to the service of the empire, and the Zion Mule Corps owed its existence in part to him.

What Our Lodges Are Doing

Stockton, Calif.

Hope Lodge No. 126 of Stockton, Cal., secured in a few minutes $1,000 at a meeting held on Feb. 12th to fit out its new club rooms. All the members of the Lodge are enthusiastically in favor of this movement to secure a Jewish communal center for Stockton, and it is expected that in the near future, the Lodge will have excellent club facilities. A class initiation was held on March 18th, at which several new members were inducted.

St. Joseph, Mo.

Joseph Lodge No. 73 secured forty candidates for the Adolf Kraus Class. A communication from the Secretary states that the Lodge intends to continue the campaign until April and hopes to get at least twenty more candidates. An impressive program has been arranged for the initiation ceremony which will be held on April 11th at Temple Adath Joseph. On March 14th the Lodge celebrated Past President Night. A musical program and refreshments followed the addresses.

Grand Rapids, Mich.

Julius Houseman Lodge No. 238 held a banquet on March 15th in honor of the seventieth anniversary of Brother President Adolf Kraus. Several interesting talks were delivered, among them ‘‘Radical Dangers’’, by Edwin M. Treusch, ‘‘Reactionary Dangers’’, by Brother Julius H. Amberg, ‘‘The Defense of American Music’’, by A. G. Gorney, and last but not least, ‘‘Hat Talks’’, by the genial chairman of the Committee, Brother Eugene B. Houseman.

Denver, Colo.

An address on ‘‘The Constitution—What and Why’’ was delivered by Brother E. J. Wittelshoffer at the meeting of Denver Lodge No. 17 on March 14th.

The class initiation and musicale given on Feb. 29th, was a great success. The turnout was fine, there being about 300 members in attendance, and everyone present thoroughly enjoyed the affair. Sixty-four of the seventy-eight candidates elected presented themselves for initiation.

The Degree Team, composed of Past Presidents Simon J. Heller, Arthur F. Friedman, Samuel R. Zwetow and J. Olcovich, and Vice-President Percy S. Morris, conducted the ceremonies in a most inspiring manner, and gave an exhibition of a real initiation.

An excellent musical program was presented and following the program, light refreshments were served.

Buffalo, N. Y.

At the February meeting of Montefiore Lodge No. 70 fifty-two new members were initiated and thirteen new applications for membership were received.

The project that was started by the President of the Lodge to form a club among the members and to raise $75,000 to purchase their own club house is meeting with great success. The club house will be one of the finest in the country, fully equipped with all the features of a social and athletic club. It is expected that membership dues will be fixed at $25 a year and that all members of the Order will ipso facto be admitted to membership until the limit of 400 has been reached.

The Degree Team of the Lodge is doing excellent work and will put up strong competition for the cup offered to the best Degree Team in District No. 1.

Springfield, Ill.

Emes Lodge No. 67 is coming close to the 100 mark. The new officers installed in January have stimulated activities in such a way that twenty-five new members have been initiated since they took office in January. At the meeting on Feb. 18th, following the initiation, the members were agreeably entertained by a play entitled ‘‘As Others See You.’’ A buffet luncheon was served at the close of the program.

Shreveport, La.

Louisiana Lodge celebrated B’nai B’rith Day in an elaborate manner on Feb. 22nd. Dr. A. E. Freyer, second vice-president of District 7, gave a most eloquent address which was enthusiastically received by the nearly 500 members of the Order and their friends who were present. Dr. Freyer also installed the newly elected officers. Mrs. Amelia Eiseman gave an address on the ‘‘Aims of the Council of Jewish Women.’’ The B’nai B’rith orchestra gave an excellent program after which refreshments were served.

Wheeling, W. Va.

Seven new members were initiated in a meeting of Wheeling Lodge No. 615 on Feb. 22nd. The remainder of the class which was to be initiated on that day was prevented from coming on account of influenza and the inclement weather which prevailed. Though only a small number of members were present, $570 was raised for the Loan Fund within fifteen minutes. Every member present contributed his quota. A committee was appointed to increase the contribution from the Lodge to $1,000. which was the quota that the Lodge had previously set itself as its goal.

Omaha, Neb.

Omaha Lodge No. 354 celebrated Adolf Kraus day on Feb. 22nd by initiating a class of 109 candidates. Over 400 members of the Lodge witnessed the impressive ritual work as exemplified by the local Degree Team. Brothers Dr. Harry Kraus, President District Grand Lodge No. 6, and A. B. Seelenfreund, Secretary of the Order, were the guests of the Lodge. During the course of the meeting resolutions were adopted and sent to Brother Adolf Kraus in honor of his seventieth anniversary.

At the close of the meeting, a sumptuous feast awaited the brethren. Rabbi F. Cohn gave the convocation and Brother Harry Lapidus acted as toastmaster. The address of welcome to the distinguished guests was delivered by Dr. Harry Monsky. Dr. Harry Kraus in his remarks described the institutions fostered by the Order and narrated some of the achievements of the Anti-Defamation League. Brother Seelenfreund commanded close attention during the course of his remarks on his experiences in Europe. A check for a substantial amount was tendered as a subscription of the Lodge to the Loan Fund for our brethren in Europe.

Portland, Ore.

A Purim celebration was held by Portland Lodge on March 2nd at its meeting hall. All of the old and honored observances were observed. It was an old-fashioned party and was thoroughly enjoyed by the large number that attended. It is expected that Professor Ralph Boas of Reed College will address the next meeting of the Lodge. The Committee of Portland Lodge has set 1,000 members as the goal in its campaign to secure candidates for the Adolf Kraus Class.

Detroit, Mich

On Feb. 26th, at the celebration in commemoration of the seventieth birthday anniversary of Adolf Kraus, President of the Order, an intensive membership campaign to continue until June 1st, for 1,500 additional members was launched by Pisgah Lodge No. 34. If the total which the Lodge has set for itself is achieved, Pisgah will be the largest Lodge in the Order.

More than 100 Pisgah candidates were initiated at the celebration. Following the ceremony, a banquet was served. President Leon Goldman, the principal speaker of the evening, was accorded a great ovation when he touched upon the subject dear to the heart of every Pisgah member, the erection of a community building in Detroit for the housing of B’nai B’rith as well as other Jewish activities. Brother Goldman outlined the plan which will be put in effect to make possible the venture. It is hoped the Lodge will be enabled to raise from $250,000 to $300,000 and to establish a community house that will prove the pride of Mid-west Jewry and will fill a long felt want in Detroit.

Houston, Texas

Rabbi Emil Leipziger of New Orleans was the principal speaker at the B’nai B’rith Day celebration held at Tempel Beth Israel in Houston on Feb. 22nd. An attractive musical program consisting of organ, violin and vocal solos was also greatly enjoyed by the many members and their friends who attended. Herzl Lodge initiated a class of nine and favorably passed upon twenty-two new applications at its meeting on March 2nd. Dr. S. J. Westheimer reported that a fund of about $4,000 had been collected from among the Lodge members for the Loan Fund.

Oakland, Calif.

Before the largest and most enthusiastic membership that Oakland Lodge has ever had in its lodge rooms, over one hundred newly initiated candidates were made members of the B’nai B’rith on Tuesday evening, March 9th, constituting the first Kraus Honor Class on the Pacific Coast.

The success of this Membership Drive was largely due to the splendid efforts of Joseph Meltzer, under whose leadership the drive was conducted and the splendid co-operation of the various committees appointed by him.

The initiatory ceremonies were conducted by the Degree Team of Oakland Lodge of which Matt Wahrhaftig acted as the president.

Judge Isadore M. Golden, Past Grand President of the District Grand Lodge, was the speaker of the evening and addressed the Lodge on ‘‘What the B’nai B’rith is Doing in the United States and in Europe.’’ Judge Golden was applauded for fully five minutes after the delivery of his speech.

First Grand President Lucius L. Solomons was present as a guest of the evening and numerous other Grand Lodge Officers and Past Presidents were seated at the Altar.

President Lionel Wachs officiated as the introductory speaker of the evening.

A banquet was served after the ceremony and the Committee in charge had many surprise ‘‘stunts’’ at the banquet table.

Oakland Lodge will have a continuation of the Kraus Honor Class on April 13th, at which First Grand President Lucius Solomons will be the principal speaker of the evening and over fifty more candidates will be ushered into the fold of B’nai B’rith under the leadership of Sidney S. Kahn, who will be the chairman of the evening.

Monessen, Pa.

Monongahela Valley Lodge No. 776 has taken up the slogan, ‘‘One hundred new members for 1920’’ in honor of the seventieth birthday anniversary of Brother President Adolf Kraus. The communication from the secretary of the Lodge states: ‘‘We feel no greater honor could be conferred upon our worthy Grand President than to use all efforts to increase our membership. We have already started the ball rolling. On Feb. 8th, at an open meeting, we initiated sixteen new candidates and have sixteen more to follow for the next regular meeting. We feel that Monongahela Valley Lodge is going to be on the map.’’

Kansas City, Mo.

Two hundred new members were initiated at the meeting of Kansas City Lodge No. 84 on Feb. 22nd in the vestry rooms of the B’nai Jehudah Temple. The initiation was the largest in the history of Kansas City Lodge, culminating a big membership drive in honor of the seventieth birthday anniversary of Brother Adolf Kraus, President of the Order. The principal address was delivered by Brother Arthur Friedman of Denver, Colo.

Financial Aviation

Lincoln Beachey, but a few years ago, was one of the foremost American aviators and undoubtedly was the most daring flyer of his time. He used to declare that he ‘‘could fly a kitchen table if he could put a good engine in it.’’ He tried another hair raising stunt a few days later, his machine gave way under the strain and he was killed. He had been told thousands of times that he was foolish to take chances, but did not heed the warnings.

There are thousands of financial aviators in the United States today who are emulating Beachey’s most thrilling stunts. They are trying to make altitude records in a kitchen table with only a hot air engine in it. Millions of Americans learned to fly financially to get their heads above those of their fellows in the old reliable safe Liberty Bond machines. There were no accidents and no casualties, but now, having experienced the delights of rising through those means, many are being tempted to abandon them for the experimental high speed planes of wild cat stocks.

Even Beachey when he suggested flying a kitchen table specified that he must have a good engine in it, but these stocks have nothing to propel them except the hot air of the promotors. No one can stay up in the financial air on unbacked promises. That is the reason Liberty Bonds proved safe and stable mediums for holding up the family fortunes. They are backed by the whole strength of the nation.

The history of aviation is full of the names of men who died in order to show others what not to do. If you value your financial life, you will stay out of the experimental planes designed for speculative investment and stick to the reliable Liberty Bonds. They will get you where you want to go and do it speedily and safely. And you will not be numbered among those who forfeited their financial future in order to show somebody else what not to do.

The heads of the great fraternal organizations of America have always sought and demanded safety when the investment and safeguarding of organization funds were concerned. For that reason, nearly every order of prominence has a large portion of its surplus funds invested in Liberty Bonds and government securities. The members of those orders cannot do better than to follow individually the example of their organizations.

What Our Lodges Are Doing

Minneapolis, Minn.

Brother A. B. Seelenfreund, secretary of District Grand Lodge No. 6 and the Constitution Grand Lodge, paid a visit to Minneapolis Lodge No. 271 on Wednesday, March 3.

He came from St. Paul, escorted by some Saintly City brethren, during the afternoon, and conferred with leaders of Minneapolis Lodge at the Hotel Radisson.

At 6 p. m., together with Past President Frankel, of District Grand Lodge No. 6, and Max Rabinowitz, district deputy for North Dakota, Brother Seelenfreund was tendered a dinner by the Gimel Dolath Club in its new quarters.

In the evening the beautiful gold room of the Radisson was filled to overflowing by lodge members and members from St. Paul, who came to hear Brother Seelenfreund and to witness a class initiation of 130 new members. Inclement weather prevented the presence of about half of those who had been elected for the class, but the howling blizzard, which tied up traffic and stopped trains, did not dampen the ardor of the Minneapolis brethren. A beautiful initiatory ceremony was conducted by the degree team and President Joseph Schanfeld made a splendid talk in introducing Brother Seelenfreund. The latter spoke eloquently on the situation in Europe as he found it. With characteristic vehemence he told of the horrors of living in the stricken zones and pleaded for a vigorous campaign to raise funds for the rehabilitation of stricken brothers over there. He was received with an ovation that has seldom been given a speaker in the Mill City, and, at its conclusion, the vast audience rose and cheered for several minutes.

Past President Frankel delivered a short talk to the candidates, and a tribute to the head of the order, in whose honor the class was gathered.

Among other grand lodge men present were Dr. Maurice Lefkowitz, of Duluth, state deputy for Minnesota; Brother Max Rabinowitz, deputy for North Dakota; Gustavus Leovinger, chairman of Social Service of the district; and Isadore Goldberg, president of Minnesota Lodge.

Minneapolis Lodge is going to hold another big initiation soon and is planning a summer camp for boys. Under the active presidency of Brother Schanfeld the lodge has taken on a renewed set of activities.

Toronto, Canada

At the first bi-weekly luncheon of the B'nai B'rith Lodge, held at the Prince George Hotel, Tuesday, Mr. John A. Tory, of the Sun Life Insurance Company, gave a most inspiring talk on Canadian citizenship. He showed the great diversity in religion, race, and nationality of the Canadians, and urged the necessity of the elimination of all class distinction for the greater good of a greater Canada. Canada, with an area of 100,000 square miles more than that of the United States and Alaska combined—comparatively sparsely settled, with less than 9,000,000 people, and with natural resources scarcely touched, has before her an era of tremendous development, which requires the unified action of all peoples cemented by Canadian citizenship into one solid unit. By that method alone can Canada develop as it should and achieve the place among nations that it justly deserves.

The attendance was large and enthusiastic, and the affair was acclaimed a big success.

Toledo, Ohio

Toledo Lodge had two out-of-the-ordinary meetings in February. The first, on the evening of Feb. 10, was Victor Abraham night, in memory of the man who was for so many years secretary of District Grand Lodge No. 2. Replacing Rabbi Kornfeldt, of Columbus, who was to give the address, L. M. Frank, of Toledo Lodge, a close friend of Victor Abraham, spoke eloquently about our departed brother and co-worker.

The meeting of Feb. 24 was past president night and Adolf Kraus night. A class of thirty was initiated and each past president spoke three minutes on some special subject assigned him. A Dutch lunch was served.

This meeting was one of the best attended of the season, about 200 being present.

Omaha, Nebraska

All members of Omaha Lodge No. 354, Independent Order of B'nai B'rith, joined in a celebration of Adolf Kraus day on Feb. 22. Dr. Harry A. Kraus, son of Adolf Kraus, president of the Order, and who is himself president of District Grand Lodge No. 6, was the guest of the Omaha lodge all day Sunday. He was accompanied by A. B. Seelenfreund, Secretary of the Executive Committee and of District Grand Lodge No. 6. An informal luncheon was given at the Athletic Club for the guests.

An initiation of 200 new members was held at Crounse hall, Sixteenth and Capitol streets. The afternoon meeting was for members only, of which there are 600 in Omaha.

In the evening a banquet for the members and their friends was given at the Hotel Rome and was followed by a program. Addresses were made by Dr. Harry A. Kraus, A. B. Seelenfreund, and Henry Monsky, Second Vice-President of District Grand Lodge No. 6. Moving pictures of B'nai B'rith boys' camp and of the Jewish Orphans' Home of Cleveland were shown. Harry Lapidus served as toastmaster.

Bridgeport, Conn.

On Monday, Feb. 23, at 2:30 p. m., Harmony Lodge No. 711, I. O. B. B., held its annual Washington's birthday party for the children of its members. Owing to lack of space and accommodations, the committee in charge decided to limit the attendance to the children of the members only.

This affair was longingly and eagerly awaited by the young folks. Plenty of entertainment, music, novelties of all kinds, and many goods things were provided for the youngsters, and they had a wonderful time.

A surprising amount of talent is usually found among the young guests themselves, something that seems to please them more than all outside entertainment ever provided.

Oakland, Calif.

The first B'nai B'rith dance of the year, given by the Oakland Lodge, on Jan. 27, at Covenant Hall, at Temple Sinai, proved to be a splendid success and the hall was crowded to overflowing with a merry crowd of dancers.

The committee which arranged the dance was more than satisfied with the result and plans a series of similar affairs during the present season.

The dance was an informal affair and real "jazz" music was provided. For the guests who preferred cards, the dance committee had arranged a prize whist tournament, which was held upstairs in the reading room.

Mobile, Ala.

The regular monthly meeting of Beth Zur Lodge was held on February 8. The newly elected officers were installed, several candidates were initiated, a large number of applications for membership and reinstatement were received and delegates to the District Grand Lodge were elected. The prospects for the future are very bright, as the Lodge is well officered by energetic and active young men who have planned a revival along all B'nai B'rith lines.

Arkansas B'nai B'rith

The B'nai B'rith lodges in Arkansas are putting forth extra efforts to increase their membership in order to win the Silver Trophy Cup which is to be given by Louis Cohen, of Fort Smith, Ark., a member of the General Committee, to the Lodge in Arkansas showing the largest per cent increase.

Pine Bluff already has shown much interest and through a campaign recently, added forty new members.

Fort Smith, Ark.

Fort Smith Lodge No. 306, Fort Smith, Ark., celebrated B'nai B'rith Day on Sunday, January 11th, 1920. Talks by local members were made at the afternoon session and a social program was given at night at the Progress Club.

Bartlesville, Okla.

On January 18, 1920, Bartlesville Lodge No. 849 was organized with every Jewish citizen enrolled as a charter member. The Lodge roster consists of 27 members and already the baby lodge of District No. 7 has given a Purim Dance and increased its membership by taking in members from nearby towns.

Louis Cohen, of Fort Smith, Ark., member of the General Committee of the District, organized the new lodge. He was ably assisted by Rabbi Chas. B. Latz, a member of Tulsa, Okla., Lodge.

The Lodge holds regular monthly meetings and also regular social affairs are given by the Lodge.

St. Paul, Minn.

Minnesota Lodge No. 157 had as its guest last Wednesday Brother A. B. Seelenfreund, secretary of the Executive Committee of the Order, and of District Grand Lodge No. 6.

The worthy brother was met at the depot by brethren of the lodge and escorted to the Athletic Club, where he met the workers of the lodge.

At noon he was tendered a luncheon by the workers, and the guest spoke on his trip to Europe and its lessons. He succeeded in having the members present subscribe over $600 toward the fund for rehabilitating stricken brothers in Europe.

He also conferred with the local workers on the preparation of a class of candidates, to number at least 150, to complete the work of propaganda for this spring in Minnesota Lodge. A competition was inaugurated for teams to enlist a class to be initiated within a few weeks.

In honor of his visit the lodge invited Brother Seelenfreund to return Feb. 21, 1921, to rededicate the lodge on its golden anniversary.

The visit was highly beneficial to the lodge and was only too short, as Brother Seelenfreund had to leave for Minneapolis to address a meeting there in the evening.

Minnesota Lodge, in addition to its general activities, is preparing a summer camp for boys.

Milwaukee, Wis.

The climax to a three-day celebration of the seventieth birthday of Adolf Kraus, at Milwaukee, came on Saturday evening when over 500 banqueters sat down to a dinner in the fern room of the Pfister Hotel.

Beautifully decorated, the room presented a wonderful picture when the service began and the musicians played favorite airs.

Just as the guests were seated and the first service began the reception committee entered the room with Brother Dr. Harry Kraus, president of District Grand Lodge No. 6, and Past President Hiram D. Frankel, who had arrived but a few minutes before from Chicago.

The greeting to the grand lodge officers was most cordial.

After a bountiful repast Dr. Kraus was introduced and eloquently spoke of the work of the order. He took his audience on a trip throughout the nation, stopping here and there to visit the various institutions maintained by the order. He traced the growth and the usefulness of the Anti-Defamation League and spoke of the local work done by the lodge in all branches of B'nai B'rith activity.

He was listened to with rapt attention and the audience rose to its feet and cheered as he concluded.

The second speaker was Hiram D. Frankel, Past President of the district, who represented Adolf Kraus, who was unable to be present. Brother Frankel paid tribute to the venerated leader of the Order and then made a fervent appeal for funds to carry on the rehabilitation work for stricken brethren in Europe. At the conclusion of the address men and women insisted upon paying into this fund, and, though no arrangements had been made for a canvass that evening, voluntary contributions amounted to nearly $3,500, and a committee was appointed to solicit funds generally to complete the Milwaukee quota.

The banquet was the culmination of a campaign for 250 new members, more than half being initiated the evening before.

The final festivity of the celebration came in the dancing which followed the banquet and lasted until one o'clock with unabated enthusiasm. The success of the three day program was due to the untiring efforts of the committee under the leadership of Brother Harry Abrams, which had charge of the membership drive and the three days' celebration.

The initiation was conducted by the Gilead Lodge Degree Team and it was the most impressive initiation ever held by a B'nai B'rith Lodge in Milwaukee. The members present besides the candidates were thrilled by the solemn and inspiring ceremonies so ably conducted by the Dregree Team. The candidates proudly displayed the insignia, "Adolf Kraus Day Initiation, February 26th, 1920, Gilead Lodge No. 41, Milwaukee," on their lapels. Rabbi Samuel Hirshberg addressed the members of the largest class initiated by Gilead Lodge, and in a stirring address explained to the newly initiated members the duties of a Ben Brith. The happy throng of old and new members enjoyed a buffet luncheon at the conclusion of the ceremonies.

On Friday evening, February 27th, B'nai B'rith Services were held at Temple B'ne Jeshurun, which was filled to capacity by the members of the Order and their friends. The services were conducted by Rabbi Charles S. Levi, of Temple B'ne Jeshurun, and Rabbi Samuel Hirshberg, of Temple Emanu-El.

The ''Secured'' Homeland

Modern Zionism, as expounded by Leon Pinsker in his ''Auto-Emancipation'', 1882, and by Theodore Herzl in his ''Judenstaat'', 1896, was based on the idea that the Jew, regardless of how long his ancestors may have lived in a country, is considered an alien and will forever be considered so in states built upon the national basis. He must, therefore, have a homeland, where a substantial section of his people have an undisputed right to dwell. Such a homeland, called in the platform of the first congress of Basle, 1897, ''a home for the Jewish people in Palestine, secured by international law'', would protect not only those who have selected it as their home but also their brethren, dwelling in other lands. Without entering into any criticism of the underlying principle, we have to admit sorrowfully that the latest events have not justified the belief in the undisputed right of the Jews on Palestine as their home.

The ''Hazakah'' of the Arabs

The Talmudic law of Hazakah, corresponding to the Roman law of Usucapio, stipulates undisturbed possession for three years as a legal title to real estate. The Arabs seem to claim it for their benefit. After various disquieting rumors about growing unrest in Syria a cable informed us that on March 15, the independence of Syria was proclaimed in Damascus, and Emir Feisal was declared king. His majesty bases his title on the principle of self-determination proclaimed at Versailles, and his action on the vacillating policy of the Allies in proof of which he cites the British promise of a homeland in Palestine. Arab sheikhs, received by Mr. Herbert Samuel in Beyrut, made similar statements, and the population indorsed their views by mass meetings and attacks on the Jews, showing how the Bedouin has become modernized. They proceeded also in traditional fashion by an attack on the colony of Metullah, situated at the foot of Mount Hermon and founded by Baron de Rothschild in 1896, April 1. The latest reports at hand speak of four dead and five wounded. The condition of the Jews in the colony being beyond the line of British occupation is critical and the British consul refuses them permits to enter Palestine proper. Meantime we were shocked by a report of a regular pogrom right under the eyes of the British military authorities in Jerusalem on the second day of Passover, April 4, which resulted in a large number of casualties given variously from 188 to 233. It is stated that British soldiers instead of protecting the Jews aided the Arabs, but as to details it will be better to await the official report demanded by the British government from the military governor, General Allenby. The latest report, dated from London, April 14, assures us that normal conditions have been restored. The Zionist bureau communicates to the press a statement of Hadar Pasha, Feisal's representative in London who speaks of a misunderstanding between Arabs and Jews which is now fortunately settled. The dead and wounded will hardly benefit by it.

Zionist Achievements

From Copenhagen comes the somewhat surprising news that the Russian soviet government appropriated 2,000,000 roubles for Zionist activities. We always were under the impression that the soviet, and foremost among them, Trotzky, denied all national ideas. Premier Millerand assured Nahum Sokolow of the interest which the French government always took in the Zionist movement and that it will do all it can for it, ''with due consideration of the rights of the various races and religions in western Asia''. This promise is so pliable that its practical value is not worth more than M. Millerand's assurance of his admiration for the Jewish ''race d'une si grande vitalite et intellectualite''. More ambiguous is the endorsement of Zionism by the British secretary of war, Mr. Winston Churchhill, in an article published in ''Sunday Herald'', Feb. 8. Mr. Churchill thinks Zionism is necessary as an antidote against Bolshevism and similar radical tendencies towards which he says, the Jews are particularly inclined. A large donation to the Restoration Fund by Lord Reading and an open declaration for Zionism by the illustrious inventor, Mr. Emil Berliner of Washington, may be mentioned in this connection because both men had heretofore kept aloof from Judaism. The reviewer abstains from any comment. He records the facts, favorable to the movement, as the last mentioned and the ill-foreboding ones like the Arab disorders, the significance of either side must be left to the judgment of history.

JERUSALEM UNDER A BLANKET OF SNOW

The ancient city of Jerusalem was this winter for the first time in many years covered under a soft blanket of snow. This picture, the first to arrive in this country, shows an old street with the Mosque of Omar in the distance. Note the snow-covered palm tree

The Land of the ''Liberum Veto''

The selfishness of the privileged classes, the landed nobles backed by the Jesuits, ruined the old kingdom of Poland. Whatever the fate of the new republic may ultimately be, it is at present in the hands of the same patriots. Count Prozor who months ago suggested in a French magazine to use the Jews of Western Europe as a serum on those of Poland to make them as innocuous as the virus is to the average body, if properly applied, is now out with a belated defence of his theory in ''L'Univers Israelite''. He repeats the charge that the Jews in Poland served as spies to the Germans. Under such charges to which that of Bolshevism is added, atrocities are daily committed by the authorities, houses are raided, reputable citizens arrested, convicted on any trumped up charge, the judge, as in the case of Emil Heiblum in Warsaw who was convicted of having attempted the life of Paderewski, declaring that the testimony of Jews does not count against that of one single Christian. ''Unfortunate but pardonable errors'' such as led to the wholesale murder of the members of a charitable society in Pinsk, April 5, 1919, occur continually. So a funeral was stopped by the heroic militia in Minsk, and all the participants routed. The explanation, afterwards given, was that the sons of Kosciuszko believed the funeral to be a Bolshevist demonstration. Similar mistakes lead occasionally a car load of food or of garments, sent by American Jews to their starving relatives, to a wrong address, usually to a Catholic institution.

Internal Problems

The relief of the war sufferers is still a matter of heated controversy. Feeling that the insufficiency of every aid action in view of the masses affected, is bound to leave irritation behind, the reviewer merely chronicles the fact that there exists strong friction between the local leaders of the Warsaw Jewish community and the representatives of the American relief organization. S. Jatzkan, editor of the Yiddish daily, ''Hajnt'' of Warsaw, arrived in New York (April 10) for the purpose of presenting to American audiences his ideas which are that the methods employed by the Joint Distribution Committee are rather apt to pauperize the masses than to bring relief. The hostility of the government will probably affect the cultured and well-to-do classes more than the proletariat. The last Jewish professor of Warsaw appointed during the time of the German administration was discharged, and this is part of the program of the ''Konfederacja Polska'' which demands the complete exclusion of the Jews from public offices, from commissions in the army, from schools and from all organizations of a public character. A branch of this society held a meeting in Posen, and a Jewish reporter of a German paper being present in his professional capacity, was given some minority rights in his ribs, after the meeting had protested against the treaty of Versailles and had passed a resolution, demanding that in the peace treaty with soviet Russia, the Jews must expressly be excluded from all rights granted to the citizens of the respective countries. No one will wonder that Berlin is full of Jews from the towns of the former Prussian Polish provinces.

The Kindergarten Nations of Old Russia

The daily reports of the atrocities committed in Ukraine have ceased to come to us. Dr. Kohan-Bernstein of Kishineff declared in London that pogroms have occurred in 600 cities and towns, and that even the local administration estimate the number of victims as 100,000, while Jewish organizations increase the figure to 250,000. Pastor Naymark of Lausanne, who recently returned from Ukraine, described the atrocities committed by both, Petlura's and Denikin's, bands as terrible and gave evidence of the corruption of the press of which the Jews are the victims. The Swiss paper, ''Bund'' had published a dispatch, alleged to have been sent by Naymark and declaring that the reports of pogroms were pure inventions. It took a long time before he learned of it, but as soon as he learned of it, he telegraphed that he never said so and that the reports of the atrocities committed against the Jews were only too true. This telegram was never published. Another nation of the Kindergarten class is the republic of Latvia whose financial interests in this country are represented by a Jew from Libau. The Yiddish press informs us that the old czarist laws are being inforced, that even organized labor is antisemitic, and that in a pogrom near Riga two Jews were killed and twenty-five wounded.

The ''Christian Revival'' in Hungary

From all appearances, Hungary is only waiting for the peace treaty to be signed in order to proclaim a monarchy on the basis of a clerical constitution. Premier Huszar at the opening of the new parliament (Feb. 16) spoke of the ''few brave men, Magyars and Christians who opposed the scum of a degenerate race that had usurped the power''. The audience supplied the word Jews. The same commentary was given when Bishop Prohaska, vociferously acclaimed, proposed an ''honest Christian and national policy'' (Feb. 26). Few have the courage to state the actual facts. Marquis Pallavicini came out in an article in which he pointed to some politicians, now clamoring for the ''Christian'' government, who had been among the wildest agitators of soviet radicalism, while numerous Jews were executed by the Bolsheviks, among them Lieutenant Zuker, whom the then premier, Count Tisza, had praised as a model officer. Justice requires to state that Premier Huszar, addressing a meeting for the relief of the needy population and interrupted by a cry: take it from the Jews, replied: ''I do not know how much the gentleman who interrupted me contributed to the relief work, but I do know that Jews did their full duty''. Nevertheless, acts of brutality by the ''Christian and national'' army are being perpetrated daily against Jews, the most typical case being that of a Galician Jew, Baruch Reich, who was taken from a train under the pretext that his passport would have to be examined, robbed of his money and murdered. Jewish students were cowhided out of the university, and two professors, Bernhard Alexander, holding the chair of philosophy, and Henry Marczali that of history at the unversity of Budapest, both for 25 years ornaments of their institution, were dismissed.

Hillel's Lesson

The ''Saying of the Fathers'' contain the impressive story of Hillel who saw a scull floating in the river, and addressed it with the words: ''You have drowned one, and one has drowned you, and some one will drown him who has drowned you''. Rumania has her turn at this moment, and utilizes it with her traditional brutality. Dr. W. H. Drummond, an English Unitarian Divine, addressing a liberal ministers' association in New York (March 29), gave a report of the persecution to which the new masters of Transylvania subject the Unitarian Magyars in their newly acquired territory. The history of these martyrs of liberal religion is highly inspiring and of particular interest to the Jews, as one section of them in the seventeenth century converted to Judaism and suffered for it for centuries until the legislation of 1869 allowed them to profess Judaism openly. One can imagine that the Jews in the newly acquired territory fare no better. The congregation of Czernowitz was placed under a board appointed by the governor. A few ''court-Jews'' accepted the appointment, while the majority, consisting of socialists and liberals refused it. Zionists were not considered.

Austria and Her Receivers

Vienna has for more than a year a Jewish daily, the first to be published in German, the ''Wiener Morgenzeitung'', to which we are indebted for valuable information. We are glad to notice that it speaks highly of the work of the Joint Distribution Committee, although it adds that much more than has been achieved will have to be done. The new republic seems to be the heir of the old monarchy, called the land of improbabilities. It certainly earned this title, when in its parliament a Jew was defended by the clerical and racial antisemites who were called by their socialist opponents ''Judenschutztruppe''. Friedrich Mendl who has made a phenomenal success with a new bakery had a strike on hand which in view of the always scanty bread supply of the capital, threatened the population with starvation. The strike was called by the socialists because Mendl refused to discharge one of his employes who had failed to join the socialist party. The socialists, yielding to the public clamor according to cable advices, the details of which are yet unknown, expelled the Galician Jews.

Conditions in Czecho-Slovakia, ruled by a truly liberal statesman, are still to some extent critical. The latest census gives to the new republic 13,311,655 inhabitants of whom in round numbers, 8,000,000 are Slavs, 4,000,000 Germans, 1,000,000 Magyars, and the rest Poles and Ruthenians. The new republic therefore represents the troubles of old Austria in miniature which means grave complications for the Jews, especially in territories where the ruling class, undeterred by Austria's failure, is trying to convert the minority to its own nationality. The Jews therefore indorsed section VI of the new constitution which gives them the right to declare themselves nationally as Jews in all cases when for school and similar purposes a census of the nationality is taken. This will include the right to special Jewish schools, a somewhat knotty problem when the question of the numerous small communities and the situation of Jews who refuse to class themselves as Jews by nationality is considered. Some of the difficulties are already manifest. In Przibram, Bohemia, 128 persons were indicted for participating in a pogrom during which Jewish stores were looted. In Pohrlitz, Moravia, a German city, right on the border of the Slavic territory, demonstrations were held during which the ''Wacht am Rhein'' was sung. Two were killed and eight wounded but it is not stated whether the Jews in this old ''Kehillah'' were affected. In Olmuetz, a German city, in an almost entirely Slavic environment, which up to 1848 was forbidden to the Jews, attacks on the Jews were made, while in Bruenn which has the same conditions as Olmuetz and was the stronghold of the old bourgeois ''Verfassungspartei'', enthusiastically supported by the Jews, two Jews were elected to the city council on a Jewish nationalistic ticket. If one had predicted such a ticket 25 years ago, it would have been equal to predicting a Jewish presidential ticket in U. S.

MAIN BUILDING OF HEBREW UNIVERSITY

Copyright, Underwood & Underwood

The main building of the Hebrew University is now being constructed on the Mount of Olives, Jerusalem, under the direction of Prof. Patrick Geddes of the University of Edinburgh. Prof. Geddes is designing the University of Palestine as well as planning the modernizing of Jerusalem, Haiffa, Jaffa and other principal cities of Palestine under commission from the Zionist organization. The first building will be completed by the end of this year. Many noted professors of Europe have agreed to join the university, including Dr. Albert Einstein, author of the recent theories on relativity and Dr. August Wasserman, discoverer of the blood test which bears his name. The San Remo Conference has awarded a mandate over Palestine to Great Britain

tration and almost completely out of commissions in the army. Jews as individuals were certainly not responsible for the fiasco of the army administration and the foreign office. Judaism as a church had no official recognition and could not be responsible for anything. Nevertheless, we hear the charges of the ‘‘Vorherrschaft’’ of Judaism repeated in the ‘‘Kunstwart’’, and Herr von Zobeltitz, sending his reports to the German-American press, complains that every criticism of the present affairs is answered by the counter-charge of antisemitism. He might have said with a little more precision that the only criticism of which the Junker-party in her ‘‘Katzenjammer’’ is capable is the monosyllable: ‘‘Jud’’. This is also true of the branch of German-American antisemitism. The Sankt Josephs-Blatt, edited by the Benedictine monks of St. Benedict, Oregon (March 12), tells its readers of whose mental caliber we may form a sufficient opinion from this one fact, that the secretary of the treasury Erzberger, who had to retire under a cloud was hounded out of office by the Jew Helfferich because he is a conforming Catholic. The sons of St. Benedict do not have to fear that their flock will ever know that Helfferich is an out and out antisemite. The latest sequel to this story is the charge made in the National Assembly that Wolfgang Kapp, the leader in the attempt to overthrow the present government, is the son of a Jewish mother. Nobody heard of this story before but it is certain and proven from the press during the short period of Kapp's ascendency that Kapp, von Luettwitz, Pastor Traub and the whole gang of reactionaries were declared antisemites and appealed for support on the ground of the necessity to liberate the country from ‘‘Judenherrschaft’’. One of their followers, named Kunze, a member of the town council of Schoeneberg, a suburb or Berlin, advertised openly the sale of sluggers for the salvation of the fatherland.

Official Antisemitism

A genius of the type of Albert Einstein commands recognition even when it is grudgingly given, and the students of Berlin university who tried to start a demonstration were promptly quieted when Einstein threatened to stop his course. Poor Jews who can merely work for a living are delivered to the hostility of burocrats, and so the Polish Jews who came to Berlin as refugees are hounded constantly as a menace to the city. A Jew who applied for a change of his name was told in an official decision that he might call himself, Morgenthau, Hirsch (tho name of the premier of Prussia) but could not adopt a ‘‘Christian name’’. The decision which breathes the spirit of the ‘‘hoechstselige’’ Frederick William III who issued a similar order in 1836 is characteristic of Junker burocracy, and is on one level with the charge of the Kreuzzeitung that the Jews were slackers. It must be gratefully acknowledged that Pastor Bleyer of Charlottenburg in an address delivered at Hildesheim stated that out of a Jewish population of 662 souls, 93 were in the army, 60 of whom served at the front and 20 of whom were killed in action. It is absolutely impossible that Hildesheim presents an aspect different from the rest of Germany, and therefore the figure of 15 per cent in service and ten at the front may be safely taken as true of all German Jews. Demonstrations in Munich assumed threatening proportions. It was claimed that the government favored the Jews in the distribution of Mazzot, although the Mazzot assigned to the Jews are taken off their bread card, and similarly it was charged that the government favored the Polish refugees. Strict precautionary measures prevented serious trouble. In the granduchy of Baden, formerly a stronghold of liberalism, a prominent Christian minister declared that the Jews make the pogrom agitation. A Jewish attorney in Karlsruhe, Marx, called him in the public press a liar and challenged him to take the matter into the courts. The Berlin chemist, Professor Max Meyer, declined the call to the polytechnic of Karlsruhe because of the protest of the student against his appointment. It is especially disheartening to think that as early as the seventeenth century Spinoza was offered a chair in the university of Heidelberg, that the same university had a Jewish lecturer as early as 1814, the first case in Germany, and probably the first regular Jewish professor of any German university in Gustav Weil. The most tragic illustration of the change of conditions in this section of Germany is the atrocious, entirely unprovoked murder of the student Hans Kahn in Baden-Baden by another student who upon leaving an antisemitic mass meeting, resolved to shoot down the first Jew whom he would meet. Brutality is always matched by stupidity, and we may obtain a certain consolation from reading the statement made in all seriousness by a German author that Goethe was a Jew. He was sensuous, had short legs and was devoid of patriotism. There is nemesis in history. The author of ‘‘Wilhelm Meister’’ who could not tolerate Jews in his model school is now consigned to the ghetto.

Varieties of Antisemitism

The antisemite Goethe makes Ahsaverus say in reply to Haman's charges that Jews are profiteers: ‘‘Das tun andere auch, die unbeschnitten sind’’. Nevertheless, the charge will always recur. Alderman Frederick Smith of New York claimed that the Jews are responsible for rent profiteering, and remarkably enough, he was seconded by the Jewish socialist, Judge Pankin. While in New York the Jews are indeed very prominent in real estate, the same outcry against gouging landlords is heard elsewhere where Jews are numerically insignificant, and food profiteering where, as in the case of the meat trust, the Jews are only a minority and in the sugar corner where Jews are entirely absent, is hardly any less a violation of the Jewish principle that curses him who withholdeth corn (Prov. 11:26) than rent profiteering. It may be worth while to note that in medieval times when the Jews were driven into usury by profiteering kings and nobles, the Spanish rabbi, Yom Tob ben Abraham of Seville, declared that a debt contracted by excessive charges for goods sold to one who needed them, was not collectible (Ritba, Kiddushin, p. 12b, Berlin, 1715). It is a convenient thing all around to denounce the Jew in every trouble, as did the ‘‘Pathfinder’’ of Washington (Jan. 31) in an article, entitled: ‘‘Are the Jews to rule the World’’?

International Antisemitism

The claim of an international Jewish organization which rules the world is a stock-in-trade article of the truly international antisemitic organization of which New York World (April 3) gave us a most striking specimen. Its issue of April 3, published a Warsaw dispatch which alleged that in the pockets of a killed Bolshevik soldier a document issued by the International Union of the Jews was found which declared the triumph of universal Jewish dominion was approaching and would be accomplished by sowing the seeds of civil war. The story is somewhat old. It can be traced back to a yellow novel writer, named Hermann Goedsche, who under the pseudonym of Sir John Ratcliffe wrote a novel, entitled ‘‘Gaeta, etc.,’’ in which the story of a meeting of leading Jews held at midnight in the old cemetery of Prague was described as deliberating on the means of obtaining control of the world for the Jews. How successful these various attempts were, is best proven from the fact that the ‘‘World’’, founded by the Jew Pulitzer who always kept aloof from everything Jewish, is sending out such truck. Just as a specimen the London ‘‘Morning Post’’ shall be quoted which warned against Lord Reading's appointment as ambassador to Washington because of the danger that the Semitic clique which is in control of the White House would receive additional enforcement. A small item in free Switzerland is not without significance. In the canton council of Zurich a motion was introduced to repeal a law of 1914 which exempts Jewish pupils from writing on Sabbath because "conditions have changed" which can only mean that Zurich has too many Jews. Numerous are the attacks on the Jews of France by some authors of prominence, but only one shall be quoted because of its connection with America. G. de la Fourchardiere speaks of negro lynching which he considers less defensible than the pogroms in Eastern Europe to which America takes exception, for the negro is persecuted as an inferior race, while the Jew, if he had not been "beaucoup" persecuted and "un peu" massacred would have obtained control of the whole world. Fortunately, Jews like negroes lack "le genie guerrier". Civilization is marching eastward. Some Jews of Bagdad were charged with profiteering in the brokerage business. The Turkish governor, Faik Bey, had them arrested, and a few days later their mutilated bodies were found in the Tigris. The man deserves promotion to Budapest.

Personal Notes

Luigi Luzzatti is for the seventh time minister of the treasury and Ludovico Mortara is again minister of justice. The king of Italy is quoted as having boasted of the fact that Italy has no Jewish question. Gladys Marks was appointed lecturer in modern languages in the university of Sidney. She is the first woman on the teaching staff of the university. Isidore Levy was appointed lecturer in history of religions in Lille. The appointment suggests a reminiscence. In 1849 Isidore Cahen was apopinted lecturer in philosophy in some "lycee", and the bishop of that diocese compelled Napoleon III, then still president of the republic, to repeal the appointment. New France shows, however, not always progress over the old. The congregation of Troyes, the home of Rashi, was about to disband. Grand Rabbi Israel Levi succeeded by great efforts to postpone the crisis. On the other hand, Harbin in Manchuria has even a Jewish paper, while Dr. Bloch's (formerly Oesterreichische) Wochenschrift, the valiant champion against antisemitism, had to suspend publication after 37 years of glorious fighting. Here something should be done to revive this organ.

Obituary

Max Berlin, the first Jew ever appointed judge in Bavaria, died recently. He was a lineal descendent of Loow Mayer Berlin, 1755-1814, president of the consistory of the short lived kingdom of Westfalia, and was appointed judge in 1874. He reached the high rank of Oberlandesgerichtsrat and retired a few years ago. Samuel Marks, a pioneer of South Africa, prominent as diamond miner and a leader in public as well as in Jewish affairs, died in Johannesburg. Moritz Benedikt, editor of the Neue Freie Presse of Vienna, one of the foremost German papers, and member of the (now defunct) Austrian House of Lords, died not long after the demise of Bernhard (Berish) Stern, for many years burgomaster of Buczacz, Galicia, and representative of his district in the Austrian Reichsrat. These days have passed. The chance for Jews as mayors of Polish towns in Galicia and as presidents of city councils in Posen is very poor right now. The rabbinate of the world lost one of its most scholarly representatives in the death of Samuel Kohn, retired chief rabbi of Budapest, and the first Hungarian preacher of the capital whose works on the Sabbatharians will remain a lasting contribution to Jewish History besides other very important works.

The wicked are dead even while they are living, says the Talmud. Ignatius Timothy Tribich Lincoln, the international crook who developed from a Hungarian Bahur into an Episcopalian rector, a British M.P., a spy in the service of Germany and a common criminal, was—if this is not an invention for a purpose—employed as censor for the Kapp government. It is rather probable. Jews of that type are the only kind worthy of association with junkerdom. There was rarely a junker government without them.

Eastern Jewish Refugees in Berlin

The Berlin correspondent of the London Jewish Correspondence Bureau wires:

The 2,000 Eastern Jews, who, as formerly reported, were arrested by the authorities in Berlin, have now been, for the larger part, released. Mr. Julius Goldman, the representative of the Joint Distribution Committee in Europe, is negotiating with the Jewish organizations and the Zionist Organization in Berlin with regard to the solution of the refugee problem.

Mr. Samuel J. Beeber Honored

Mr. Samuel J. Beeber, President of Worcester Lodge No. 600, of Worcester, Mass., has recently been honored with the office of assistant principal at the South High School.

For eight years past he was instructor in physics. He is a native of Worcester and a graduate of Brown University, where he made a notable scholarship record.

The action by the school committee in electing Mr. Beeber met with the entire approval of the members of various educational associations of the city.

The Jew in Far Off Lands

By GEO. W. O. OAKES

It is a curious phenomenon as yet unexplained, in the dispersion of the Jews after the destruction of the temple, that their migration was almost exclusively westward. The entire drift from present statistics of this Oriental people, was toward the Occident, to a civilization, widely differing in religion, customs and language hence producing the conflicts which are inevitable between neighbors so dissimilar. It was the logic of events, however, that the dispersing Jews should settle for centuries, and their language and culture become somewhat akin. But the contrary was the case, for, after the lapse of twenty centuries we find the Jewish ratio in Asia to be practically nil, while in western countries it is increasing at a rapid rate.

In the world today there are upwards of 15,250,000 Jews. Of this total the continent of Asia contains less than 500,000, and of this number 85,000 are in Palestine, and all the rest, save 90,000 are in Asiatic Turkey and Russia. Among the uncountable millions in Japan, China, India, Persia, Afghanistan, Java estimating the total population at 800,000,000, there are put 90,000 Jews, one in 9,000. At this rate New York City would have one Jew in 650 residents, whereas there is one to every four, or to reverse the comparison, if the New York basis existed in Asia, there would dwell there the prodigious total of 200,000,000 of our people, instead of an insignificant 90,000.

At the commencement of this era, life and culture along the Mediterranean did not differ widely from the manners in Palestine; it would be assumed when the Jews proceeded westward they would seek habitations among those most sympathetic, and, in the lapse of centuries, would there be found in greatest number, yet once again the Jewish currents defied the ethnic laws. Among the 25,000,000 Levantines we find today only 425,000 Jews, divided as follows: In Algeria, among 5,583,000 people there are 70,271, ½ per cent; in Egypt, among 11,287,319, there are 38,635, ⅓ of 1 per cent; in Morocco they number 103,712 among 5,000,000, 2.11 per cent; in Tripoli there are 18,860 among 523,000, 3.6 per cent; in Tunis, 54,404 among 1,876,000, 2.9 per cent.

Contrast these figures with the situation here. We have over 3,300,000 Jews, representing 3.2 per cent of the total population, eleven times the number residing in all the nations bordering the Mediterranean. In the states that formerly constituted Austria, the percentage is 4.42; in European Russia (chiefly Poland), 4.75 per cent; in Rumania, 3.19 per cent. The number in Asia and Africa is 820,000, representing about 5 per cent of the total number in the world; the remaining 95 per cent are in Europe and America.

In relating the foregoing facts it is clear that the part in this discussion assigned to me—Japan, South Africa and China—is of small importance, and may be covered in a few words.

As respects China, there are in Hong Kong and the Straits Settlements but 585 Jews, of which number approximately 150 are in Hong Kong. The Jews in China are under no political disabilities; they enjoy the same equality of rights as other aliens, and there are no restrictions. They are chiefly of English nationality. There are traces of ancient Jewish settlements in different parts of the country. A small settlement at Cochin claims to have come to the Malabar coast from Jerusalem after the destruction of the temple in 70. There are yet traces of a once prosperous colony at Kai-Fing-Foo, which has the tradition that it was established under the Han dynasty, during the reign of Han Ming-to in 70. Marco Polo refers to Jewish colonies in China in 1286, and there is mention of Jews in Chinese annals as early as 1329, but they were classed along with Moslems. There was no further light on Jewish settlements in that country until the seventeenth century when Catholic missionaries learned of the Jewish colony at Kai-Fing-Foo. It then numbered some 500 to 600 souls; there was a temple, and the traditional faith was observed. Another Jewish colony was known to exist at Hanehau-Foo. There are, besides, a few other small settlements. The colony at Kai Fing-Foo was the chief Jewish center in that vast domain, but at no time was it numerous. Inscriptions on tablets found amid the ruins of the temple referred to events in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, but there was no evidence that the colony at any time was of significance. The community gradually diminished and lost its identity; in the middle of the last century all that remained was a handful of poverty-stricken people, in a state of pitiable want. Some European philanthropists, who learned of their state, endeavored to go to their relief, but without much success. The remnant was at length absorbed. All that remains today are the ruins of the temple, which have well-nigh disappeared beneath the dust of centuries.

On Dec. 14, 1918, the Chinese Republic endorsed the British declaration agreeing to the establishment in Palestine of a national home for the Jewish people.

Japan, notwithstanding its extraordinary development in the past half century, a growth unparalleled in the history of civilization, did not attract Jewish settlers, although there were no restrictive laws, the Jew having the same civil privileges and immunities as other aliens, with unrestricted freedom of worship. A few Russian and Austrian Jewish merchants, up to 1913, were residing at Nagasaki, in the extreme southern end of Japan, and established a synagogue there, but the war closed it. There were no further efforts at communal life by the few Jews residing in Japan until Jan. 17, 1918, when the scrolls of the law were unpacked by Samuel Mason at Yokohama, who was sent there by the Hebrew Sheltering and Immigrant Aid Society of New York to aid indigent refugees from Russia, who were seeking an outlet through Japan to America, to escape the horrors of the world conflagration. Within the last two years a number of American and English importers have established branches in commercial centers of Japan with Jewish representatives and small communities of Jews are being formed. On Sept. 27, 1919, a synagogue was built at Kobe, with seventy members, and a Zionist society formed. There are a few families in Yokohama, Nagasaki and Tokio, but the numbers are too few to be regarded as an appreciable factor anywhere in Japan.

South Africa proved an attraction to the Jews as soon as the country was opened to settlers in the early part of the nineteenth century. The first important migration began in the early thirties, consisting chiefly of English colonists. They were progressive, vigorous, enterprising, and at the outset occupied a position of primacy in the development of the country, which they have maintained to the present day. It was due to their initiative that some of the chief resources of that country were exploited, contributing in large measure to its prosperity. A Jewish colonist named Mosenthal inaugurated the wool, hide and mohair industries there, now one of its most profitable exports; the whale and fishing industry was established by the

Judaism and Modern Civilization

Address of Rabbi Samuel Schulman, of Temple Beth-El, New York, at Convention of District Grand Lodge No. 1

Mr. Toastmaster, Ladies and Gentlemen:

Although it is rather late, I am very glad to be with you. As a man who has spent practically his whole life in the ministry and as a member of the Order, as one who, in the very town of Helena, Montana, was instrumental in founding a lodge of the B'nai B'rith, planting the Order there, as one who has gone through all the chairs in the Kansas City Lodge before I came to New York, as one who has always felt honored with the Independent Order B'nai B'rith, I am delighted to be with you and be your guest and see the speedy manifestation of the spirit of youth, to see the young men enter the spirit of the Order, to see them bring the geniality and joviality of their spirits of young men to make a good evening of it, and then to see the great enthusiasm with which the new President of the District was greeted by one representative after another rising on behalf of his lodge and promising success in the great drive for membership—all this has done my heart good. You asked me to say something to you.

I tell you that the world ''B'rith,'' the Covenant—''B'nai B'rith'', Sons of the Covenant—suggests a wealth of inspiration. It is a potent word. It was a fine insight of the founders of our Order when they gave this name to our great fraternal organization, for we stand, as all Israel stands, for that covenant which, until its promises shall have been fulfilled in the earth, the mission of the Jew cannot be fulfilled. The word covenant is a fine summary of the history of the Jew, of the purpose of his existence, of the meaning of his persistence in spite of a world in arms against him. And if ever there was a time in the world when the meaning of the word should be understood and taken to heart, it is certainly our time. The first time we met with that world covenant was in connection with the covenant which God made with the human race. That beautiful story is told us in early Scripture after the universal flood which destroyed everything on Earth. God said that ''Never again will come a universal destruction'', but let the skies be ever so darkened with clouds, that men should look up to that beautiful spread of colors which spans the heaven and let him take part and let him hope and have faith in the covenant, and let him have vision of the eventual union of a humanity in generous emulation and in peaceful co-operation.

And today, after five years of slaughter and devastation, after a war which has come to an end, the skies are still over-clouded. They are not sufficiently clear to gladden our hearts. They are the clouds of doubts, of lingering hatreds, of class conflicts, of destruction, revolution, of the ominous spirit of anarchy, and man is asked to let his imagination envisage the cloud, the eventual triumph of the divine laws of right and love. With respect to that first covenant, we are told that it was made on the basis of nature, and on the basis of the fundamental laws of human nature. We are told that as long as the earth remains, seed time and harvest, summer and winter, heat and cold, night and day shall not cease. There shall be an indestructible law—a fundamental fact in human nature which cannot be divided with impunity, and a spirit may define the fundamental facts upon which our civilization is based, but it cannot do it with impunity. Retribution is safe and inevitable. We live in troublous times. There is much confusion of thought today. There is much misinterpretation of democracy, but no word can conjure away and render impotent the fundamental laws of life.

We Americans believe in a democratic form of government. We believe in it because we think it is the best form resulting from the experience in history. But what is modern democracy? Modern democracy is based on two assumptions. In the first place, it assumes that the masses of men in the long run will have respect for what is right. They are seeking justice, they want to establish truth; they will recognize the divine obligation of righteousness; they will refuse to worship might, even if it be the might of principles, and will be ready to sacrifice every interest of the individual and of a class for the larger interest of the national welfare. And again, modern democracy rests on the assumption that in the long run the masses of men will show sufficient sense and intelligence to recognize the right when it is presented to them. Modern democracy is a two-fold attribute to the intelligence and consciousness of the masses of men. That is the assumption. It is an optimistic vote of confidence in human nature. We Americans say that no man—not the best of men—is good enough to govern men with unlimited and unrestrained absolute power. We would not give the privilege of governing to any artistocracy, be it of birth, of intellect, or be it even of labor. We hope that the best political expression for a national life is the self-governing of the people as a whole. That is the meaning of democracy. In that sense the voice of the people is the voice of God, but if democracy means a hunger for power, a ruthless assertion of the will to power, irrespective of reverence for what is right, then modern democracy inevitably destroys itself, and out of its ruin will rise a power that will rule men.

Let us examine some of the fundamental things which are at the basis of our civilization—a root in human nature. They hold good for all generations. In the first place we want to protect the inalienable right of every individual to life and liberty. It has taken humanity a long time to learn about this inalienable right, but today we are clear about it. How much liberty should be given to an individual by the government so that he does not interfere with the liberty of another? What should be the relation between the freedom of the government and the power, the sway, the influence of the government, is a matter upon which no one can dogmatize. You cannot give an absolute answer to that question. Men learn by experience. Man learns as he goes along. If there is too little government, the masses of men suffer from the cunning, from the power, from the egotism of a few powerful individuals. The state must control them. If there is too much government, individuals again begin to feel the pressure of a state upon them. They feel the pain. They do not get sufficient scope for the fulfillment of their powers, of their genius; the joy in life may be harmful. There immediately takes place a reaction. There is constant swinging of the pendulum from the one extreme to the other. No man can say at any moment just how much government we should have. If we have too little government, we have anarchy. If we have too much government, we have slavery. And therefore, today, what men must set their minds to thinking about is, that liberty is to a great extent in danger, because if the government interferes too much with the personal life of the individual, it sets out on a path which is very dangerous, because if it continues to proceed along that path, it may end by the destruction of liberty. For what is liberty? Liberty is not merely the privilege of putting a piece of paper in the box once a year. And if you belong to a group of ninety-nine and there are one hundred against you as a majority, they do with you what they like. We have laws to take care of minorities even against majorities. We have to protect them by what we call constitutional safeguards, and if the overwhelming majority disregards those constitutional safeguards, it is destroying liberty, for the tyranny of a timely majority and the domination of any class that would seize the power, is just as large a manifestation of autocracy as is that of any monarch upon a throne. And, though loyal to the forms of government, we may still go on step by step and destroy liberty. And again, there can be no liberty in the world unless there is property.

Property is the expression of free personality. A man is not free at all if he does not own anything in this world. If a man owns nothing, he is owned by those powers that control the source of his life, comfort and his happiness. Therefore, civilization has made the constant detaching step by step of the government from the mass in which he was originally merged.

When I hear the Communist talk of Communism as a social ideal, I say to them that they are really reverting to the origins of barbarism. Humanity began as a herd, as a community which owned the individual body and soul. Originally the individual had no property at all. Then he got a few ornaments to wear, and the sense of possession made him feel his freedom and independence. Then he got a few weapons because he could use them better than someone else. Property, step by step, developed freedom because property is the expression of a man's influence and a man's power. A man is not free at all if his possessions are determined by the community, if his labor is compelled, and if his status is, once for all, determined so that it cannot change and it cannot grow. Freedom means that you give to man an opportunity to unfold his powers and that you reward his enterprise by property, which is the expression of his influence and power.

Another fundamental law of life is justice. Justice is the foundation of society and love; is its crown and capstone. What does justice mean? It means rendering to each what is due, according to his services. That is the definition. And what are services? Services are not merely those of labor—labor of the hand. Services are also of the mind, of the thought, of the reason, with the organized power of science, of art, of every possible manifestation of the human spirit. Our civilization has not been created by what is called the proletariat alone. But our civilization is rich, is brilliant, is many-sided, and it is the result of three factors—the hand, the brain that guides it, and the soul. The hand that does the labor, the mind that thinks and plans and organizes, and the soul that has control over the passions, so that it has saved something and has lifted life above the primitive level of living from hand to mouth, has created a surplus article which we call capital. It is not so easy to define what justice is. Perfect justice would come to the world if we had a society perfect in culture and perfect in consciousness—that is to say, though men were so perfect in intelligence that they knew exactly how much was coming to somebody else and if they wanted to give what was necessary to someone else. That is the ideal, the goal which we are aiming at towards which the law of life is pointing. But this we know, that it is an injustice that we hear preached today. If we are told that one class is rich because of its power, of its liberties to seize what it can lay its hands on because it believes that it created civilization, that is an untruth.

Another fundamental law of life is the recognition of ability. Ability must lead. Much as I respect democratic forms of government, I believe that this is a fundamental law, irrespective of any form of government, and holds good for any time. The world's work is done and done effectively and protectively by the men of ability, and this ability of men is manifested in various generations. There is the ability in government. As a matter of fact, comparatively few men determine the thought of government in any country. We talk of democracy. This is the best form of government. But if we ask ourselves—we the masses—honestly and conscientiously, how much do we contribute to government, you find for one man who can think originally, there are a million who adopt his thought. You cannot change that. The scentists lead. Why? Because they and the inventors discovered the laws of nature. They present them to us and we prepare to assimilate them as far as we can. The artists lead because they take their visions of beauty and fix them within the frame of their creation and make them a permanent thing for us. And therefore, also, in industry and business, those must lead who have the ability. All that man has as an inherent right is to claim equal opportunity, brought about by freedom and the opportunities of education. Democracy means, in the words of Napoleon, ''career open to talent, and the only justification for leadership is the ability and the talent and character''. If you artificially attempt to suppress ability, you take the road to ruin and to destruction. No man can cheat nature in attempting to cheat another man of the right that is due to him on account of his ability. Just as water rises to its source, so ability will rise to its source of influence. It may not rise any higher, but you cannot prevent it in the long run from rising to its level. Even a soviet government learned that in order to carry on the modern process of industry, you must have men of ability, and in order to get them to work, you must pay them the largest reward for their services. So the system was compelled, at least partially and in a limited way, to correct itself.

The last fundamental law of life which I consider inherent in human nature is the law of love—the law of brotherhood—the law presented by the beautiful gospel presented by the Order B'nai B'rith. I am a busy man and therefore do not attend the meetings of the lodges, but I am in touch with the teachings, its benevolence, brotherly love and harmony. You have not the right to commit the injustice of taking away from the man of ability what is due to him. But, on the other hand, the men of ability should get, because of their ability, brilliant prizes of life—and must not be content with hugging the rewards of their ability. They must recognize their positions and supplement the law of justice with the law of love and brotherhood, so that they bend down tenderly and lift up the weaker brother and give him an opportunity to improve himself. Love may also be said to be the cement which holds together the foundation stones of social structure—the whole foundation of which is justice. The driving force of life is love. I work for those I love. I am interested in creating opportunities for those I love.

We bled for justice for the masses, not because we want to divide the product with as much exactness as possible, but because we pity the unfortunate. We sympathize with the sufferers and we, therefore, want to procure for them justice. And these five fundamental facts—liberty, justice, property, respect for the authority of leadership, and love —these are the fundamental laws which are at the basis of our civilization, which are the foundations of modern democracy, and you cannot deny them. You can cause trouble, you can agitate combinations and breed revolution, you can bring about bloodshed to the thinking men that will strike terror, but you cannot defy them. Out of a world of riot will rise a new world.

For us Americans two things are necessary today. We must be firm and free. On the one hand we must be firm and strong. We must not be timid when confronted with radicalism in this country which that force has threatened to destroy. On the other hand we must be careful lest, as I said about two months ago and little did I think my statements would be confirmed, lest by the very force of the momentum, an attempt may be made to destroy our liberties.

I congratulate the people of Massachusetts upon the matchless example of fearlessness which their great governor gave in a critical hour in this nation's life. It is not too much to say that his actions set the thought and energized the will of the American people. And, while I congratulate Massachusetts, I feel like apologizing for the spirit of reaction which I know, I trust and I believe within the depths of my heart, has only temporarily sullied the good name of my own state, because I consider the most despised thing that has been done in American history is the arbitrary act of the Assembly in the State of New York in suspending its five Socialist members and thus depriving constituencies of their representatives and wounding the liberty of representative government. And it is no wonder that a great protest and indignation broke out from all states against this action on the part of people who, like myself, have absolutely not the least sympathy with socialism—nay, I believe that socialism is a destruction of American liberty because it makes people altogether too dependent on the government. A general theory of socialism means the observance of the state which will prescribe for every individual a position in that state and will employ him. It is not that we care for socialism, but it will be a sad day for the American people if the socialists, to the imagination of the masses, come to be looked upon as representatives of our liberties and the liberty of American representative government. It was not only a crime, it was stupidity on the part of the Assembly of the State of New York. And if they do not change their tactics, as I told the Governor, they will be making thousands of votes for the socialists.

There is no fear of the American people becoming socialistic, but we can hurt our institutions by attempting, in a spirit of panic, of reaction, to crush parties with which we do not agree. We cannot compromise with anarchism that traitor to authority—that acts to overthrow our government. The tradition of America has been to judge men by acts and not by thoughts. On the other hand, we must be free to preserve the class traditions with enthusiasm. It is the malice of anti-semitism to make Israel responsible for what is called ‘‘The Bolshevist’’, for there never were two more contradictory influences than Bolshevism and Judaism. And the leaders of Bolshevism have publicly renounced their allegiance to Judaism. What have we in common with Trotsky? Nothing except his Jewish name. We hope to make the world safe for democracy and bring about freedom for the Jew. Men of Jewish blood shared in the fighting on land and sea, and they gave up their lives and earned glorious distinctions, and we had a right to expect that the anti-Semites would not pretend to persecute the Jew because of Bolshevism.

I said that tho world ‘‘covenant’’ is a many-sided inspiration. It refers to the covenant that God made with Israel—a covenant not merely for Israel, but for humanity. Israel did not only dream of a future for itself, but it dreamed of the time when this land of God, which is a blessing of human freedom, shall come to be written in the human hearts of all the people. And, if the covenant calls Israel a governed people, I should love Israel and also love America. It is my land and I will call America a governed people. For what is America? If there is any hope for humanity, it is in the ideals which underlie American democracy. And if the democracies in the Eastern land would really take the model, America, which helped them to win their freedom, they would hear the cries of the mourners for the salvation of their people. And what are these ideals? They can be summed up—that America is the first nation in the history of the world which has organized itself, not on the basis of race, but on the basis of the fundamental rights of man. Not on the basis of the blood in a man's veins, but on the basis of the world of the individual man. I say the first nation in the history of the world. I know there are other free nations. I know there are other free democracies. There is no nation which, like ours—a young nation, born and organized in the delight of the emancipated and humanitarian nineteenth century—has so preserved its natural conception as the American republic has done. If that is so, then America is only hospitable to men and women of any blood who come to seek liberty, provided they consent to accept law as the indispensable component of liberty.

What, therefore, are we to do? We are to take the spirit of our covenant and bring it into American life, so that the American people can say, ‘‘Israel, in whom we glorify ourselves, we are proud of you’’. We have won the world's praise with our intelligence, with our brain, with our successful business men and financiers, and scientists and artists, and statesmen. We shall impress the world as a moral and spiritual power in American lives. But if we wish the synagogue to be respected, if we wish other men not to look upon the covenant made with us as something old, something decrepit, we must respect it ourselves.

I stand upon the soil of Massachusetts and my heart goes out in sympathy to my brothers in Boston who protested with indignation against what was done to the spirit of the synagogue in America. A distinguished artist whom we have learned to love because of his masterpiece, ‘‘The Hebrew Prophet’’, permitted himself to be betrayed into a great error to paint two pictures for the Boston Art Museum. One picture was of the Christian Church, but we have nothing to do with that. We sincerely respect every sincere manifestation of the religious sentiment of our fellow-man. What has this artist done? He has represented the synagogue as an old hag. The crown is toppling from her head. She clutches the two tablets of stone upon which are the ten commandments and desperately looks as a stricken one about her. Such a conception was merely a trifling of the petrifying prejudice of Europe, but it does not belong on the soil of America. It was right for the Jew to protest against it. But, my dear friends, after all no artist can make or mar the synagogue for us. No artist can increase the value or diminish the majesty of our faith. It is good to protest, but it is much better so to live us to make Christendom rise and say, ‘‘Tear down this picture; it is not a decrepit synagogue’’.

It is the profoundest conviction with me that never in the history of the world was such an opportunity given for the resolution of the ideal of our covenant than this republic for the seed of these ideals were sown in other lands. The perfect humanitarian harvest will, I believe, be reaped in this glorious, beloved land—the free republic of the west.

A Summer Training School in Jewish Social Service

Jewish communial work is facing a crisis. The problems of the Jewish communities in America and the problems of Jewry throughout the world are growing apace, but the number of competent workers is growing proportionately less and less. Largely under the influence of war conditions, although there are other subsidiary causes, there has been an alarming exodus from the ranks of professional workers into other fields. Unless some drastic measures are taken soon to arouse a strong interest among competent Jewish young men and women in communial work, many necessary communal enterprises will have to be curtailed in their scope, and new fields of work left to lie untouched.

To hope that the well-established non-Jewish training schools of the country would supply the requisite number of Jewish workers may sound like a plausible argument, but turns out to be a will-o'-the-wisp when the figures for the number of Jewish graduates are examined. During the three-year period, 1916-1919, the three leading schools of social service, the New York School of Social Work, the Chicago School of Civics and Philanthropy, and the Pennsylvania School for Social Service graduated 369 students, of whom only 32 were Jewish, and not all of these entered practical Jewish work. Where, then, are our trained communal workers to come from?

To relieve this serious situation and to point the way towards organizing a permanent training school for Jewish communal work, the Federated Jewish Charities of Boston, under the able and energetic leadership of its executive director, has decided to offer this summer a series of seven intensive training courses of three weeks' duration. The Federation is to be highly commended for its foresight and its splendid initiative in offering to professional and prospective communal workers this opportunity to cover in a brief period the basic principles and methods of the most important fields in Jewish social service. It is to be hoped that this experiment will serve to stimulate a strong and abiding interest in the question of training in Jewish social service and will ultimately lead to the establishment of a comprehensive and well-supported training school of the highest academic standing.

The plans of instruction for these institutes clearly tend in this direction. There are to be institutes in each of the following fields of work: Child Welfare, Delinquency, Family Case Work, Recreation, Health and Medical Social Service, Social Research and Statistics, and Jewish Education. Each institute will consist of a carefully correlated set of 45 lectures, with visits to a selected group of social service agencies in Boston, and concentrated field work.

How varied and comprehensive the subjects to be treated are may be seen from the following list:

Principles of Child Welfare; Technique of Playground and Club Work; Child Psychology; Vocational Guidance; Causes of Delinquency and Methods of Treatment; Psychiatry; Principles of Family Case Works; Public Health, with particular reference to Tuberculosis; Convalescent and Preventorium Care; Social Statistics and Research; Industrial Problems; Community Organization; Principles and Methods of Survey Work; Community Program for Jewish Education.

Lecturers of the highest professional standing, among them a group of college professors of education, psychology and sociology, have been secured. Special accommodations are being prepared for out-of-town students.

From all indications this summer course bids fair to become a most significant experiment in the training of Jewish communal workers in this country.

De Pass Brothers, and ostrich farming, an important industry, was inaugurated by Joel Meyers. The development of the diamond and gold fields, ranked among the richest in the world, was promoted by the Barnatos and Ecksteins. There are today in the South African confederation some 90,000 Jews, and they occupy an important position in industrial, commercial and civic life. The chief influx of immigration followed the recrudescence of Jewish persecution in Russia, and refugees flocked by thousands to Cape Colony and the Transvaal. Where they enjoyed full equality in the British colonies, the same as any other British or aliens, they were under restrictive laws in the Transvaal when that country was under the Boers. The reaction in the Transvaal set in after the influx of Russian refugees. Laws were passed excluding Jews and Catholics from the public schools; the franchise was ultimately granted the Jews by the Boers, but Russian and Rumanian Jews were excluded. These statutes meet with strong protests from the older Jewish residents, and under the leadership of Dr. Jos. H. Hertz, a mass meeting of protest was organized at Johannesburg, at which place he was then the rabbi. On account of his activity in this movement, Dr. Hertz was expelled from the colony by the Boer Republic in December, 1899, and the stubborn Boers remained deaf to all protests. The victory of Great Britain over the Boers ended in the establishment of the confederation, under British sovereignty, and this wiped from the statute books all restrictive laws, both with respect to Catholics and Jews. Dr. Hertz subsequently came to London, and is today the chief rabbi there. In the Boer war the Jews fought on both sides; 2,800 fought with the British.

The Jews are distributed throughout the South African confederation; the largest community is at Johannesburg, which numbers 10,000. There are 6,800 at Capetown. There are numerous communities also in Cape Province, Orange Free State and Rhodesia. The communal life is represented in all centers by synagogues, philanthropic societies and institutional organizations. There is a Hebrew high school at Johannesburg, and a Hebrew public school at Capetown. In 1912 there was organized at Johannesburg the South African Jewish Board of Deputies, to ‘‘watch over and take action on all matters affecting the welfare of the Jews in South Africa and to observe legislative enactments’’. A branch was also organized at Capetown. There was some irritation among the Jews over the immigration laws, which made it compulsory for an immigrant to be able ‘‘to read and write in the characters of a European language’’. This clause was so construed that immigrants from the Near East who were familiar only with Yiddish, could be excluded by a strict interpretation of the act. In consequence of pressure by Jewish influence, this recently was cured by a provision that Yiddish be specifically mentioned as a language within the meaning of that act. This wiped out the last remaining civil disability.

The Spirit of the Occident and the Orient

Address by Pres. Dr. I. Ziegler, at the Twenty-Fifth Anniversary Celebration of "Karlsbad" Lodge

The 4th of June of this year completes the twenty-fifth year since the founding of ''Karlsbad'' as the fifth lodge of the Tenth District of the I. O. B. B. As is the custom in our times, we celebrate in fitting manner the closing of the first quarter of a century of our existence and usefulness. However, we B'nai B'rith, I dare say, should neither do anything or refrain from doing it simply because it is customary. The celebration of our anniversary were idle pastime and valueless if it did not, above all, at this hour, answer those two questions, which every institution, at the close of such a period of time, must put to itself: The purpose in founding our lodge, and how we have fulfilled that purpose. Both questions can be answered satisfactorily and easily when the purpose of our organization is clear to us.

After all, what did the B'nai B'rith organization expect when it was founded seventy-seven years ago in America, when it was transplanted on German soil nearly two score years ago, and thence by German Jews to Austria?

My dear brothers, every historical happening has an inner meaning besides its outward one. It consists not only of the facts that are apparent on the surface, but is caused at the same time by motives lying deep in its subconscious self. Our order is an historical incident in the development of the Jewish cultural life of America and western Europe. Allow me to explain the inner motives of the existence of the I. O. B. B., allow me to raise them from the subconsciousness of the Jewish spirit, the conscience of our people.

For quite a long time a distinction has been made between the spirit of the Orient and that of the Occident. Let us rather call the Occident the Ancient World, by which we understand the Greek and Roman spirit. The culture of the rest of the Occident is a mixture of Oriental and Ancient spirit.

The ancient world has for the purpose of its ideals and thoughts, Man, his welfare, his happiness, his comfort, joy and beauty of life, art, material progress, and power; that is, everything under the sun connected with man, the ''Here.'' The Oriental spirit does not concern itself with all this. It indulges in dreams about God, the supernatural world is its comfort, hope, joy and the aspiration of its soul; the ''Beyond.''

From these so different incentives we draw an important conclusion. The Ancient places the Individual first, as the purpose of all effort and work, it is the creator of Individualism. The Orient places the Supernatural ahead of the Individual, the supernatural which embraces the entire world, the Creator of Universalism. Individualism again has to do with the Idealism of the Individual, the duties of man which promote his welfare and individual materialism, the right of man to that which is useful and pleasant to him. The Oriental idea, on the contrary, leads to the service of others, to Altruism.

This difference between Oriental and Ancient spirit, as I have explained it to you, is nevertheless in no way conceivable as a wall, over which a communication had not been possible. The communication between Greece and the Orient has been a constant one; we find the Greek, curious and searching for wisdom, in Egypt, in Persia, in Babylonia, and in India, at the feet of the wise and learned men of these lands. Greek philosophy, this priceless gift of Greece to mankind, is in its classical representatives, to a great extent, of Oriental origin. We can even go farther. We can trace amongst all the Oriental peoples a strong disposition toward the ''Here'' incentive, just as there are no Occidental peoples among whom a perceptible ''Beyond'' incentive does not exist. But when the line between the spiritual life of the Ancient and the Orient is clearly cut this difference is undoubtedly noticeable. The Ancient represents the ''Here'' incentive with its sequels, individualism, with its subdivision of individual idealism and individual materialism. The Orient represents the ''Beyond'' incentive with the ''all'' idea and altruism.

And now, my dear brothers, you can view from this corner the history of European mankind. Is it at all different from the war between Ancient and Orient, between the ''Here'' and ''Beyond'' motives? Take, for instance, the origin of Christianity. The Individualism of the Ancient had reached a dead point, it had worked itself out in materialism. Corruption and extravagance ruined Rome and Greece. Then came the Orient. Jews, Egyptians, Persians and Hindus became the teachers of the ''Beyond'' incentive of monotheism, of Altruism of the ''all'' idea. The decadent Ancient world threw itself charmed into the arms of the new idea. Christianity originated, and the ''Beyond'' incentive had won.

Take the Renaissance. The buried antiquity came to life and with it Individualism again raised its head. The ''Here'' incentive grows in the life of the people, and countries, until finally it conquers the sciences and practically drives the ''Beyond'' incentive from the field.

What stand did Judaism take during these contests? It remained a people, strongly inspired with the ''Beyond'' incentive, which at the time showed a strong disposition toward the ''Here'' incentive. Whoever reads the Bible attentively will clearly see in it the huge contest between these two great principles of life. The spirit of the Orient won because, as the stronger, it had to win. When Israel departed from its land to become a witness for the God idea in the world, it lived a true life only in God, in the ''Beyond'' motive, in the Messianic ideal; the ''Here'' became only the school of trial for another and better world. So Judaism led its Godliness through many centuries, the surrounding world was its outer motive, the inner motive was the motive of its soul. And since also in Christianity the ''Beyond'' incentive was the ruling one, Judaism could not be destroyed. The individual-idealism of Aristotle penetrated deeply the intellectuals, but the great masses remained true to the ''Beyond'' incentive and found complete satisfaction in Kabbala and Chasidism and in its altruistic ''all'' idea. The individualism of the Renaissance, as a result of the political situation, found only here and there, if at all, noteworthy response among the Jews.

Everything was changed at one stroke, when equal rights in a new, undreamt-of world, were offered to Jews. It was the world of ''Here,'' with its science and art, with commerce and industry, with ease and comfort and huge possibilities for development. The Jew, who had for centuries lived only under the ''Beyond'' incentive, and had just touched upon the ''Here,'' entranced by the beauty and glamor of this new melody of life, which brought the chords of his life into play, soon became the more apt student of the ''Here'' motive, its passionate propagator, its master and keeper. So we see today that in Judaism, as well as in Christianity, the ''Beyond'' incentive has been beaten back against the wall, but is still kept and watched by a small group of faithful guardians. The masses of people have practically all given themselves over to the ''Here'' incentive. Does this end the strife? I do not believe so. I see coming, just as in the Ancient world, a restlessness grasping mankind, individualism degenerating into the wildest materialism, until, finally, just as two thousand years ago, the ''Here'' incentive will reach its climax and end, and in some manner will make room again for the ''Beyond'' incentive. The conqueror of the world will again be the Orient, so that the Ancient world and its spirit will be buried for a long, long time, if not forever.

However, is this necessary? Must mankind, as a pendulum, swing between these two principles throughout the ages? Can there really be nothing else except the gruesome alternative? Would not that man who could harmoniously unite both ideas within himself be the ideal type of cultured man, whom we should strive to imitate? Would not the combination of the ''Here'' and the ''Beyond'' incentives, of the ideas of the Individual and of the All be the salvation of mankind from this endless strife? As a matter of fact, all the great philosophers of the Occident, from Plato to our Cohen, all great thinkers, have propounded this theory and have found in it the all-healing substance for the nations. However, these great men were not able to win over the masses, they were left alone with their doctrines. Institutions must exist, organizations must be created in Christianity, as in Judaism, which must make it their purpose through a peaceful harmony between the ''Here'' and the ''Beyond'' philosophies, to become a blessing of mankind. In Judaism, I believe, this priestly office lies within our Order. I have already told you, my dear brothers, that I wanted to bring forth from the Jewish conscience the inner motive for the existence of our order. This conscience of Judaism is the inner motive of our order. It is the old Oriental spirit and the altruistic All-idea which battles against the materialistic individualism which threatens to ruin us. It is this ineradicable presentiment of the imminent downfall of the ''Here'' incentive, of the Ancients into whose arms modern Judaism has thrown itself, and of the final victory of the harmonization of these two principles for the salvation of Judaism and humanity. It was not an accident that our order was created just in that country in which Judaism was in great danger of degeneration by the ''Here'' incentive, and by individual materialism. Out of this a purpose, great, lofty, and ideal, grew for our order. The purpose is this: To work out in Judaism the ideal type of cultured man, to bring about a harmonization of the ''Here'' and the ''Beyond'' incentives. Has our order fulfilled our purpose up to the present? Has ''Karlsbad'' Lodge, in the past quarter century, lived this purpose; has it worked for it? Let us speak frankly: Consciously only to a small extent—unconsciously to a greater extent. We have really worked in the service of others and in the service of All through the service of the community and have not worked in vain. Now, however, let us get to our purpose, with a clear understanding and a consciousness of our goal. Harmony between Ancient and Oriental spirit; harmony between the ''Here'' and the ''Beyond'' incentives; harmony between individualism and the service of all; let this be the justification of our existence, though to a greater extent, firmer and stauncher than heretofore.

So let us take the vow before the representatives of our order with sacred earnestness in this spirit. In our vow we call upon our beloved dead as witnesses, the dead of whom we now think in sacred devotion. ''Let us watch and work; may God's blessing guide us and grant us strength for the fulfillment of our duties.''

Hungarian White Terror

An article in the Manchester ''Guardian'' of March 9, written ''by one of the People's Commissaries in the Bela Kun government,'' describes the atrocities committed under the present counter-revolutionary regime. In the time of the Soviets, the peasants had seized the large estates in Transdanubia and worked them by means of agricultural co-operative societies. ''The army of Horthy set itself the task to destroy these village Soviets and restore the old system of property and authority. Incidentally they also used the opportunity to annihilate the Jewish population. Their way of procedure was to send into the villages a patrol who arrested all the suspected individuals, and informed the inhabitants that a unit of the National Army would enter the village on the following day. Should it find a Communist or a Jew alive, then the whole village was doomed to destruction. In that way came about in certain villages the so-called 'people's judgments,' as a result of which, in addition to the Jews, several thousand peasants, teachers, etc., who had been members of the local Soviets, were massacred in Transdanubia''.

The writer goes on to describe the fate of forty-seven persons who were brought to Siofok from Veszprem and Balatensured on the first of August. On the night of their arrival certain officers, followed by a number of gendarmes and several cabs, entered the prison and had the prisoners brought into the yard. The first to come out was a barrister from Veszprem, Dr. Edward Saghy, who had lost a leg in the war. The officers pounced upon the crippled man, shouting, ''Here you are, you dirty Jew!'' and hit him with lashes provided with little lead balls till the man fell dead on the ground. Following this example, the gendarmes set upon the other prisoners.

Palestinian Merchant Marine

To establish a Jewish merchant marine for Palestine on a large scale, a Jewish shipping company has been organized at Jaffa with a capital of 250,000 pounds. The company will maintain passenger service between Jaffa and Constantinople, Trieste, Odessa and other Black Sea ports, as a means of transporting the large number of immigrants, crowding into these ports, on their way to the Holy Land.

Freight service to stimulate export and import trade will be established, while a direct service will be maintained with Liverpool for the transportation of oranges from the rich groves near Jaffa to England, according to the announcement of the company's plans. Other plans include the buying and selling of ships, workshops for ship repairing, docks and lighters for all the ports of Palestine.

As soon as 100,000 pounds worth of shares have been sold, the company will begin operations, it announced. The official language to be used in the management of the company will be Hebrew.

UNDERGROUND CZARISM

The Czar is presumably dead. As a human being he merited our sympathy. He may have been a weak tool in the hands of his advisers. He may have brought on the tragic end by the misdeeds at which he connived and the mismanagement of public affairs which he failed to see through. But Czarism, the system of which he was the unfortunate representative, is by no means dead. Just now it is lying low. Worsted by the powers de facto now tyrannizing over Russia it is plotting by underground channels. Let no one be mistaken. The present dictatorship of the proletariat cannot last long. The terror will pass away as did the French of more than a century ago. We hope that out of the chaos a sane and stable democracy will evolve. We wish it for Russia's sake, we wish it for the sake of the world's peace. Yet much battling will have to be done by the sober elements against the right front no less than against the left. Czarism still hopes to reconstitute itself as the arbiter of that mighty nation. The Black Hundreds have not abdicated. Jew-hatred is still their pastime. So an old document prepared in the days when these pogrom makers basked in the sunshine of the throne is produced. It is sent to England. There it is translated into English and printed by reputable publishers who should have kept their hands clean from the anonymous, libellous pamphlet. Passages not quite complimentary to Great Britain have been omitted. But all the deadly virus by which it is sought to poison the minds of a nation hitherto friendly to the Jew is sedulously retained. The whole is so silly that one might almost laugh over it. The Jews plotting against the nations of the world! We Jews are satisfied if we are permitted to live in peace. We have no quarrel with the world. We stand out for human rights which are denied us in some quarters. We dislike to be butchered and despoiled. We cherish our faith and defend it against its detractors. But slander is slander. Some part of it sticks like the mire of the streets that one cannot altogether shake off. Just now certain sections of England present a fertile soil for the seed of calumny. But we are inured to all of that. Those are all old and rusty weapons. For a little while we may have to ward off these uncalled-for attacks. But the peril for the Jew is in evidence. We will meet it courageously and with dignity. We must not descend to the level of our enemies. We have always sought the welfare of the community of which we are a part and we will continue to do so. We cannot conceive of a more serious blow to the stability and security of any commonwealth than to array one part of the population against the other. Our record in any part of the world is clear and clean. We have nothing to hide. Bigotry in all shapes and guises may surround us. But we rise above it. We respect the convictions of others and we want ours respected likewise. Beyond that we have no programme and no desire. And we will conquer—not the world which is our world also, but the world's malice wheresoever it raises its ugly head. And that in the interest of a world eager as at no other period to reconstruct itself in righteousness and in peace.

THE JEWISH TRUTH

Whenever a minority is lodged among a majority with which it has much in common and yet from which it substantially differs, it must of necessity be on the defensive. It has a double combat, with its detractors abroad and its ready deserters within. Jew and non-Jew elbow each other on the streets, in the marts of life, and to some extent even in social intercourse. Our synagogues are open to visitors. Our books of devotion and our literature are not sealed. With the requisite amount of study their content even if couched in the abstrusest form and in the most outlandish dialect may be penetrated. And yet we are not understood by our neighbor. Of course when we are openly slandered and defamed we protect our fair name. But that is only part of the work. It were proper to extend our lines of defense by forestalling misapprehension, by disarming prejudice, by dissipating all sorts of misconception. It is not only the truth about the Jew that the world needs instruction in. That can be accomplished by telling our story, the history of our existence for thousands of years, in a simple and straightforward way, without frills and embellishments, without preaching or sermonizing. But there is also the Jewish truth, that is that sum of opinions which we as Jews conceive to be the truth. We are not after converts. We can respect other presentations of truth. We can understand how we may be lacking in a side which the other man may have grasped to advantage. We need not claim the possession of the whole truth. Only we must show forth our way of approach to truth. It appeals to us. We wish to keep our own attached to it. Religion must in every generation justify itself in the opinion of mankind. We live in an age which is none too friendly to it. Moreover, each generation has its way of looking upon things divine. Arguments that were forcible in the bygone days may be ineffective in the present. Judaism had many competitive systems to contend with. It set itself aright when paganism held the minds of the civilized world. In the Middle Ages it was forced into polemics with its daughter faiths. We cannot argue as our fathers did. We cannot hold our own by the antiquated methods that prevailed in the past. We are confronting Jews and Jewesses of modern type, living in the great world, reading its literary output, bad, good and indifferent, persons of culture and refinement. To them we must tell the things that weigh most with us in a manner which will carry conviction, which will reconcile them to their isolation in religious matters, which will endow them with strength to withstand the many allurements that come from without. A tract here and a tract there; here a treatise and there a treatise, that will not accomplish the result. It is the whole Jewish truth that needs exposition. Not for the scholar who knows it already; but for the large intelligent reading, thinking, public. Here is a field for our rabbis and Jewish scholars. It is worthy of a man's whole lifework. It cannot be produced in haste. It is not that the scholars do not know the things to be set forth. But it is all in the manner, in the style, in the unobtrusive persuasiveness. Let the world know us as we are. Let every lie be nipped in the bud. Above all, let the distracted and perplexed among ourselves find their anchorage in the Jewish truth, the old truth, brought home to men and women of today by a new method and by a new sanction.

The Soul of the Stranger

By DR. MAX L. MARGOLIS

The humane legislation of our Torah commands us repeatedly to take care of the stranger in our gates. He must not be subjected to discrimination in law. his rights and duties are the same as those of the native. One day in the week he is to rest as we do. We are to admit him to full fellowship. He is our fellow-man, like any other neighbor; we are enjoined to extend to him our affection. We must see to it that his bodily wants are supplied, that he have bread to eat and clothes to wear and a shelter for himself and his household. But that is not all. The legislator appeals to the Israelite to remember that he was himself a stranger in a strange land. He ought to know how it feels to be a foreigner, an immigrant, an alien. He should know the soul of the stranger. The stranger has a soul which requires attention as much, if not more, than the body.

These thoughts will come to one if he picks up an autobiography recently published entitled ''Sixty Years of My Life''. It is written in the stranger's language, the Yiddish. That is a great drawback. Yiddish is essentially a folk-language and Yiddish literature a folk-literature. It will not be denied that some very fine masterpieces of literature have been written in that language, but the master-mind would have written as well in any other tongue. Still, as a rule, Yiddish is a spoken language, not a written one. It is dialect, not language. It meets the needs of a small, confined life and of small everyday concerns. The proof is, when those. are transcended, borrowings are made from the High German. It follows as a result that normally the standard of taste is not a high one. This autobiography will serve as an example. Intimate matters of domestic life are discussed with freedom and quite indelicately. An English pen, for example, would immediately refuse to lend itself to such descriptions. It is not prudishness; it is simply taste. Then again it is taken for granted that conditions understood or condoned at home will also be understood and condoned abroad. That is a grievous error. But for all that the publication merits attention. Autobiographies or memoirs are always interesting. Their importance for posterity is enormous. They afford an insight into a mode of life that has passed away in a manner which the text-books on history cannot achieve. It is somewhat different with us contemporaries. The interest we take in the story of a Life depends upon two points. Either the subject is a well-known personality, a minister of state, a public personage, an eminent man of letters, or the story is typical; that is to say, what this particular individual has gone through has been experienced by a great many situated like him. The present sexagenarian is, comparatively speaking, an obscure person. No one knew of him before this publication. We learn that he is eking out a livelihood as associate editor of ''The Jewish Farmer.'' That would not lend sufficient interest to the publication. But the life depicted there is so characteristic of the many who, like him, were transplanted to these shores, is so replete with incidents which are familiar to many other exiles like him, and so artlessly described as to afford an insight into the inner feelings of the stranger that the story merits attention on the part of the present generation so eager to ''Americanize'' the alien. Before we Americanize the stranger, we should understand him know his soul.

Perhaps few of us realized that he had a soul. This story will then be a revelation. It is pathetic enough. It shows a child of ten sent out to shift for himself in the Yeshibah, the Talmud school. He is sent away because there will be one mouth less to feed. It is not a boarding school he is placed in. He sleeps on a hard bench in the school room with a sack stuffed with hay for a pillow and his overcoat for a blanket. He takes his meals every day in a different house. It is a gift of charity. But two days in the week he fails to obtain—and they are consecutive days—during which this mere child goes hungry. So, undernourished, underclad, a prey to the biting winds and frosts, he studies hard, in competition with hundreds who must not outdo him. Of recreation there is none. It is a wonder that so many survive the ordeal, or perhaps the majority go by the wayside and the few that are fittest survive. Grown to adolescence, the boy finds himself ignorant of the world, but he is grounded in one subject. He goes away from home again, this time into the heart of what is now called Ukraine. At the home of an uncle he finds shelter and a wife. Here the people are more Russified. They speak Russian. Now begins a series of years during which the erstwhile starveling is well taken care of. He is taken into the business of his father-in-law. He shows capacity. But he is always drawn to books. He completes his Jewish and secular education. He is surrounded by like-minded men, men who have been through the same mill. who understand him and whom he understands. Some are freer in their attitude to observance. But all alike are imbued with the Jewish spirit. The flavor of their Jewish education remains with them. Sabbath and holidays are true days of spiritual rest. The coterie is drawn into the larger movements of the day and come into contact with celebrities by whom they are respected. We follow the author through the pogroms and their depressing consequences, through the early movements for emigration to America to found agricultural colonies, through all the stages of the Jewish revival. from the lovers of Zion to the political and cultural Zionists. We see the petty trader take up teaching for a profession; we witness his efforts at improving the schools hygienically and pedagogically. He changes rapidly from one mode of livelihood to another. At last he obtains a competence; he is manager of iron works for a wealthy coreligionist; millions pass through his hands; he is attentive to the interests of his employer; he lives in tolerable comfort; his house is roomy and airy; his children are free to study; he is honored by Jew and Christian; he is sent on deputations to mighty personages like governors and generals. Then the pogroms come. Old and young, they emigrate in a body, to turn to agriculture in a new world. In transit through Germany they are welcomed by rabbis and laymen and conveyed in carriages, for are they not fleeing from death and are they not on their way to work a transformation in their people's mode of life? But at Castle Gar-

Anti-Defamation League

Although a large part of the work of the League is still confined to matters of the same general nature which have been reported in the columns of this paper during the past several years, more and more attention has necessarily had to be given to a new kind of defamation which has arisen since the armistice. Whereas in the past the League had in almost every case been able to operate on the theory that defamation was in the great majority of cases the result of ignorance or thoughtlessness, it has been necessary during the past year to combat what seemed to be a concerted anti-Jewish propaganda. The increased defamation of the Jew in this country could be traceable in part to the unprecedented wave of anti-Semitism that has been sweeping Europe for the past year. The Ukranian pogroms, the reactionary White Terror in Hungary, and intensified oppression in Roumania, the economic boycott of Jews in Poland, the systematic solicitation of funds by reactionaries in Germany to drive the Jews from that country—all these were accompanied by organized propaganda work in Europe designed to justify the offenders in their course. All the ridiculous libels which have ever been invented against our people were revived and resuscitated and spread broadcast in accordance with modern publicity methods. The press of hitherto liberal countries, such as England and the Scandinavian states, was infected. One of the leading English newspapers has in recent months become violently anti-Jewish in its editorial policy. Even the London “Times” abandoned its hitherto liberal policy in this regard. Some American papers and magazines have become particularly assiduous in reprinting as much of the defamatory material from these and other European sources as they dared. Foreign correspondents of American papers located in Europeon hotbeds of anti-Semitism were infected and filled their dispatches with the libelous stories with which the propagandists scarefully fed them. Most of these stories had to do with Bolshevism and the majority of them charged the Jews with being responsible for terroristic conditions in Russia.

They stated that ninety per cent or more of the Jews in that country were Bolsheviks and that the Jews constituted the warp and woof of communism, filling all the high official positions in the Bolshevik government as well as constituting the most powerful element among its supporters. Public lecturers who had spent a few months in Europe came back filled with the same misinformation and passed on to their American audiences the stories prepared for them by anti-Semitic propagandists of Europe. The panic stricken efforts of our national, state and municipal governments to prevent the spreading of radicalism in this country and the consequent terror aroused in a large section of our people seemed to deprive a section of our press of its traditional fairness and saneness. The piling up of insidious falsehoods anent Jewish participation in Russian Bolshevism had prepared the ground for fear of American Jews as spreaders of radicalism in this country. The identity of a few individuals of Jewish birth among the deportees unfortunately gave some basis for this belief and was taken full advantage of.

This condition still prevails. The League is straining every effort to counteract the injurious effects which have been produced. It was convinced that when the true facts were presented to the American public that our national fairness and common sense would re-assert itself. A campaign of education has been started. Public lecturers are being challenged to show proof for the assertions which they were making. The total lack of any real evidence to support the charges made is being called to the attention of newspaper and magazine editors. In this work, the League was most fortunate in enlisting the aid of a man who had spent a year in Soviet Russia as a correspondent for the Chicago “Daily News”, Mr. Isaac Don Levine. Mr. Levine is one of the most prominent of our newspaper correspondents. He was primed with first hand information as to conditions in Russia and was one of only three or four foreign correspondents who had succeeded in penetrating that country. He knew the facts and had the proof which the League needed so badly to counteract in a convincing manner the libels which had gone so long unanswered. His article in last month's issue of the “News” entitled “Russian Jews Against Bolshevik Rule”, has opened the eyes of Jews and non-Jews to the truth of the situation in unhappy Russia. Mr. Levine has volunteered his services to address audiences which have heard the other side of the story and in this way the League is in a position to counteract some of the pernicious influences at large. Transcripts of his speeches have been made and sent to all the leading newspapers of the country with a plea that they be published. The editor of every American newspaper having a circulation of ten thousand or over has been communicated with and proof submitted of the falsity of the charges which are being made against our people. The Administrative Committee believes that the crisis has passed and that the steps now being taken and which are already showing some effect, will gradually cause conditions to return to normal. Constant vigilance is being maintained, however, and the League's clipping service daily presents cases requiring attention.

The Value of Legislation

A striking illustration of the value of the measures taken by the League to prevent the circulation of discriminatory circulars is found in the following case now pending in a New England state where an anti-discrimination act is in force. The Chamber of Commerce of a town in that state issued the following circular:

“BEAUTY AND PROSPERITY OF
——— ARE ENDANGERED!
Will You Help to Save It?

“Jews of foreign birth and of the lowest class are already established in the outlying country. They are making persistent efforts to secure property in the village.

“Jew boarding houses in ——— filled with Hebrews from the lowest slums in New York would drive our present summer residents away. ——— would share the fate of the Catskills, the watering places on the Jersey coast and many other popular summer resorts now given over wholly to Jews and avoided by other people.

“All property would deteriorate in value. It would be possible to sell only to Jews.

“Our summer residents have always given generously to everything that would beautify or improve the town. Jews only take from a place! They do not give to it. People come to ——— because it is one of the most beautiful New England villages. Will you keep it so or will you let it become a Yiddish colony?

“Everyone can help by refusing to sell or rent to Jews and all must stand together.

“The Chamber of Commerce has appointed a committee who are authorized to submit to the people of ——— the enclosed questionnaire. The Committee respectfully requests everyone to reply to each of the five questions, returning the same in the accompanying envelope. All such answers will be considered strictly confidential by the committee, only general results will be reported. Suggestions are especially desired.

“Per Order of Committee.”

The name of the town is omitted to avoid advertising this Mecca for Jew-haters. The questionnaire which was addressed to all property owners, reads as follows:

“QUESTIONNAIRE”

“1. Looking at the situation in ———, do you think it advisable to take any action regarding the Jews as renters or purchasers of property in the community?

Answer........................

“2. Provided there is found to be a strong public opinion opposed to Jews as dwellers in our community, would you advise that any property owner should sell or rent to Jews?

Answer........................

“3. Would you be willing to use your influence to keep the Jews out of our community?

Answer........................

“4. Would you be willing to use your influence to attract Gentiles instead of Jews to this community?

Answer........................

“5. Would you be willing to say you will not sell or rent to Jews without first consulting with the real estate advisory board of the Chamber of Commerce?

Answer........................

“Suggestions may be written on other side.”

The League's legal representatives in the state where this situation arose have a powerful weapon in the anti-Discrimination Act, and are putting it to effective use in the above matter.

Jewish Colonists Attacked by Arabs

The complete story of the heroic defense of the Jewish colony at Tel-Hai, and which resulted in the death of six colonists, including Capt. Joseph Trumpledore, who won rank and fame in the Jewish Battalion which distinguished itself at Gallipoli, has been obtained by the American Zionist Publicity Department. Two women are included in the roster of Tel-Hai martyrs, Deborah Drachler and Sarah Chizik, and also two demobilized Jewish Legionaires from America, Munter and Sharf.

The territory around Metullah, including Tel-Hai, Hamra and Kfar Giladi, has been the seat of hostilities between the local Arabs and the French. In the early part of January Hamra was burnt down and most of the colonists were obliged to evacuate Metullah when some French troops, after a fight with the Arab forces, withdrew from the district.

According to the Press Bureau of the Zionist Commission, “the Arab chieftans repeatedly stated that they had no quarrel with the Jews, while the Jews made it equally clear that they were entirely neutral and were taking no part in this Arab-French conflict. All that they desired as Jews was to continue peacefully cultivating their lands.

“Owing to the absence of regular troops and the unsettled state of the district, it was necessary for the Jews to be armed, in order to protect themselves against marauders and robbers who were taking advantage of the disturbed situation. The Zionist Commission, regarding these colonies as an integral part of Palestine, and, with a view to safeguarding these possessions, took steps for the protection of Metullah, Tel-Hai and Kfar Giladi against robbery, it being understood that the Jewish colonists would have nothing to do with attacks and that the Jewish workers would have to be temporarily withdrawn in case of an attack. Capt. Trumpledore offered his services to the Zionist Commission and went to Metullah to investigate the situation”.

From this point the story is best told by the Palestine Weekly, “Haarez”: “On Adar 7 (Feb. 26) Trumpledore went up to Metullah and drove out the company of robbers who had found a footing there. Two days passed in peace and tranquility. Relations with the neighboring Metullaim and their leader, Habak Hamil, were most friendly, and the latter gave our young men opportunity to secure provisions.

“On March 1, it seemed safe to take the cattle out for pasture. Trumpledore was in Kfar Giladi, together with Dr. Gary, of the American Zionist Medical Unit. Suddenly a few strangers were seen approaching Tel-Hai. The cattle were brought back to the yard. Trumpledore, with eight men, left Giladi for Tel-Hai. At the same time the Sheik of Halsa, with four Arabic officers, and a crowd on foot, appeared. They asked Trumpledore to permit them to enter the yard, which he allowed, as relations with the chiefs were always good. On several occasions they had come with the excuse that they were searching for French soldiers, while at times they would help the colonists against robbers. Kamel Effendi, the leader, demanded the French. Trumpledore suggested that he should look for them. The five ‘visitors’, with Trumpledore, ascended to the upper story. Here were the two girls, Sarah Chizik and Deborah Drachter; Munter and Sharf, of the demobilized American Judaeans, and Kunevsky, of the ‘Hehaluz’. Something downstairs drew Trumpledore's attention, and he descended quickly, saying to another person: ‘Moshele, go upstairs to the visitors’. Before the latter had time to ascend, Deborah cried out from above and called to Trumpledore: ‘They have taken the revolver from me’. At the same moment Trumpledore saw that some of the crowd had also broken through into the yard and were trying to disarm the colonists, who were guarding the gate. Trumpledore gave the order to fire. A sharp exchange of bullets proceeded and Trumpledore was seriously wounded. Leaning against the wall, he continued to issue orders.

“There was a tumult in the yard—the ‘visitors’ had fired from above, their bullets causing Trumpledore's wounds, while below one of the attackers hid under a table and fired from there. In the stable two openings had been made through which to fire opposite the gate, if this should be forced open by attackers. Those who stood here on guard, seeing the gate open, fired through the holes on hearing the order, and prevented any one entering. Firing continued for more than an hour. Kamel Effendi then proposed to Trumpledore that he and his friends should be allowed to go out and quiet the attackers, as a misunderstanding had occurred. Trumpledore consented, and gave the order to cease fire. One of the men guarding the gate who had but one bullet left, said to Kamel Effendi: ‘This bullet was reserved for you, but as our officer orders that you be left alive—go’. The ‘visitors’, excepting one who was killed below, went out, but after fifteen minutes the attack of the Arabs began again with greater force. Trumpledore ordered: ‘Fire until the last bullet’. The attack continued for two hours, and finally compelled the attackers to flee, leaving behind four dead, a French machine gun and about fifteen wounded. It was then discovered that, besides Trumpledore, there were three more wounded, Zolti, Golubob and Goldberg. One of the demobilized American Judaeans, Tuker, lay dead. On ascending, they were confronted with a terrifying spectacle: Sarah Chizik, Munter, and one of the demobilized Americans, Sharf, were cut in pieces by a bomb; Deborah Drachler lay dead, killed by three wounds in her heart; and Kunyevsky mortally wounded. He managed to say that Sarah, Munter and Sharf were killed by one of the officers among the ‘visitors’, who threw a bomb at them from the door; Kunyevsky was also wounded by the bomb. Deborah Drachler was killed by Kamel Effendi.

“Dr. Gary, who came up from Giladi, found Trumpledore in a desperate con-

Jewish Economic Conditions in Lithuania

A MEMORANDUM on the present economic conditions of the Jews in Lithuania has been issued by the Ministry for Jewish Affairs. After pointing out that Lithuania Jewry is commencing a new era of its existence on the basis of personal-national autonomy in the newly created State it proceeds:

At the outbreak of the war the economic position of the Lithuanian Jews was fairly satisfactory. The terrible poverty depicted by the Jewish writers of the 'sixties and 'eighties, and even in the reports of the I. C. A. at the end of the nineteenth century, had become, to a certain extent, a thing of the past. The factors to which this improvement was chiefly to be ascribed were, on the one hand, the vicinity of the country to the frontier, and on the other the increase in the purchasing power of the peasant population. This favorable change in the economic position of the Lithuanian Jews became specially marked from 1905 onwards. Signs of it are to be found in the improvement in dress, food and housing, and in the higher cultural standard; and over and above these in an extraordinary rapid investment of the savings of the masses in all kinds of credit companies. The number of such institutions grew with the Jewish Credit Co-operative Society, in spite of the obstacles placed in its way by the Russian authorities.

The German Occupation

This was the situation of the Lithuanian Jews when the outbreak of the war in August, 1914, suddenly brought upon them the whole series of extortions and curtailments of liberty which culminated in the total expulsion of the Jewish population from the Kovno government, followed a few months later by the German occupation of Lithuania, White Russia and Poland. A considerable number of the Jewish fugitives found their way to the governments of Central Russia, but the larger part of those expelled from the Kovno government during the months of terror remained in the governments of Vilna and Minsk, and after the German occupation of these provinces, returned to the cities which they had abandoned. Very sad was the position of the Jewish population at that period. Many towns and villages lay in ruins. The repatriation of the fugitives took place very slowly and gradually.

Effect of Commandeering

The system of requisitioning and commandeering had a devastating effect on all branches of economic activity. The more well-to-do and educated sections of the population remained outside the borders of occupied Lithuania, and this had an adverse effect on the situation by weakening the capacity of the rest for resistance and for self-assertion in the political, economic and cultural fields. For a time almost the whole of Lithuanian Jewry took to keeping all kinds of tea and wine houses. In 1917, however, the situation began gradually to improve. The compulsory works introduced by the Germans became transformed, as the occupation regime grew milder, into public works. War contracts for the German Army led to a certain concentration of capital in the hands of the Jews, especially of those who supplied provisions and wood.

The presence of the army and the material prosperity of the native population led to a great demand for the products of Jewish handicraft. Certain sections of the Jewish population gained a footing in the lower divisions of the municipal and state service and on the railways. Large groups of Jews engaged in agriculture, leasing estates which had been abandoned by the owners in their flight. Thus at the end of 191[illegible], at the close of the German occupation and the birth of the Lithuanian state, Lithuanian Jewry was materially in a fairly sound condition, having won a number of new economic positions in a hard struggle for existence. This was due to a large extent to the liberal assistance which had been furnished to the Lithuanian Jews by their brethren in Western Europe and America.

The rise of the Lithuanian state and the gradual restoration of the whole economic life to the pre-war footing presents Lithuanian Jewry with a number of tasks of great importance which it cannot carry out without support from the Jews of Western Europe and America.

The New Conditions

The adaptation of the Jewish population to the new conditions of the Lithuanian state is not only a political and cultural problem, but first and foremost an economic one. The majority of Lithuanian Jews—from 60 to 80 per cent, according to locality—are occupied in trade. Owing, however, to the narrow limits of the state, to the system of controls and monopolies, to the rapid development of the consumers' co-operative movement among the peasants, the Jewish trading population are compelled to strain their efforts to the utmost in order to procure the most varied kinds of goods from the fountain-head and at the cheapest price possible. They have to develop an organization to overcome the difficulties caused by government control of trade. The result of this has been that everywhere in Lithuania, chiefly on the impulse of the Jewish trading class, steps have been taken to found Jewish popular banks which shall make it their function, among other things, to satisfy the requirements of Jewish trade for cheap goods and a representative body.

Since the Lithuanian state has become more firmly established, the poverty has become greater, thousands of refugees having returned. No fewer than 100,000 are expected to return in the spring of this year from the Ukraine and other portions of the former Russian Empire. Thousands of Jewish workers who, during the German occupation were employed in various government institutions and factories and on the railways, have been dismissed mostly on the ground of their ignorance of the Lithuanian language.

Jewish Poverty

The stagnation of trade and industry, due to a certain extent to the still unregulated finance system of the Lithuanian state, has contributed much to increase Jewish unemployment. The same effect is caused by the almost total lack of credit in the country. All this has led to the present situation in which not less than one-third of the Jewish population is in receipt of public support. At the same time the facts of everyday life made it quite clear that large sections of Lithuanian Jewry can be set on their feet by small advances which will enable them to open their shops again or to take up some sort of peddling.

Jewish handicraft, which enjoyed fairly good times during the German occupation, lost most of its customers when that occupation came to an end. During the war the village population began to produce itself all household requisites. If Jewish handicraft is to extend its market it must be in a position to sell on credit, and to procure its raw materials more cheaply. The lack of tools is also very acutely felt.

Need of Assistance

Only in the field of agriculture has the Jewish population succeeded in retaining the foothold it had won. For the further extension of this calling also assistance in the form of loans and of technical instruction is necessary. The people's banks which are being founded are not able to perform this function owing to the lack of deposits. The depreciation of money has led to a diminution of the capital in circulation. To this is to be added a lack of confidence on the part of the depositors, which, after the long years of suffering, is easily intelligible. The credit basis required by the Jewish people's banks could be created by a guarantee for deposits given by a powerful Jewish financial organization. Failing this the Jewish people's banks will have to call in the assistance of the large Jewish organizations by asking them to become depositors.

If on the material side Lithuanian Jewry is in a state of collapse, on the other hand the social disorganization into which it fell under the German occupation has already been remedied. The educated Jews have returned from Russia, and to this circumstance is due the fact that Lithuanian Jewry is today well organized. The whole of Lithuania has been covered with a network of democratically-elected communities. From January the 5th to the 11th was held the first conference of communities, which has drawn up an extensive program of work, and elected the first Jewish National Council. Political and cultural life has again been set going.

Jewish Taxes

Two Jewish papers appear daily. This communal movement also is hampered through lack of means. Although the Jewish communities have been granted the right of taxing the Jewish population, yet the money that can be raised in this way will be far from adequate for the work to be done. Private charity and government grants are, owing to the present conditions, quite insignificant.

Lithuanian Jewry, therefore, requires a twofold assistance. Funds must be provided for the Jewish communities in order to mitigate the acute distress at present prevailing, through the institution of cheap kitchens, hospitals, homes for the aged and children, supplies of wood and provisions, emergency works, etc. To this must be added a constructive relief work with the object of putting the economic condition of the Lithuanian Jews on a sound footing. This help must be given through loans and the furnishing of cheap raw materials, machinery, means of production, etc.

The Jewish Ministry considers it only right to enlighten those circles of West European and American Jewry which have hitherto given their support to the Jews who have suffered from the war, and are also willing to give it in the future, on the present economic position of the Lithuanian Jews. Help coming from the West can only be completely beneficial if it is given through the agency of the national administrative bodies created by Lithuanian Jewry itself. This will also contribute to heighten the self-respect of the Jewish population and to increase its political estimation abroad.

Maxim Gorki and His Son

The current issue of "La Tribune Juive", published in Paris, contains the following interesting communication:

The famous Russian author, "Maxim Gorki", whose real name is Pyoshkoff, has an adopted son, Zinovius Pyoshkoff.

While the father is a genuine son of the Russian people, his adopted son is of Jewish race.

Up to the outbreak of the war their mutual relations were most tender, but the war and the subsequent revolution caused a division in the formerly happy family and created a deep gulf between them.

The father took up at the very outset the position of an unbending pacifist internationalist. The son, however, whom the war found in France, immediately joined the French army as a volunteer and fought with boundless courage on the Marne. He lost his right arm in this battle. He did not, however, consider by any means that he had fulfilled his whole duty in the Great War, for as soon as he was discharged from hospital he started for America with the purpose of carrying on a propaganda in favor of the cause of the Allies among his countrymen there. When the revolution took place, he went back to Russia for the same purpose, as well as to combat there the Internationalist and Bolshevist tendencies.

It is well known that after the Bolshevist upheaval Maxim Gorki passed over to the camp of the Bolsheviks. With some considerable reservations, this report was true. The son, however, joined the patriotic camp, and enrolled himself in the army of the late Admiral Koltchak.

After the defeat and break up of Koltchak's army, he arrived again in France in order to make his way to the Caucasus for the purpose of joining the army of General Denikin.

Jewish Colonists Attacked by Arabs

dition. He continued to speak in a whisper, and to the question of the Doctor as to how he felt, he answered: 'I am all right; it is well to die for our country'.

"It was to leave Tel-Hai and go to Giladi, which was in a better strategic position, Trumpledore died while being carried by his comrades. Before he breathed his last, he whispered in reply to Shneerson's inquiry, 'how are you'? 'it is well to die for our country'.

"The last wagon on which the dead were carried was fired at from a distance by Arabs. The fire was returned by those guarding the wagon and also from Giladi, and the Arabs ceased.

"During the day the Arabs tried several times to enter Giladi also, with the excuse that they were seeking French. They were answered by bullets and fled.

"When the men of Tel-Hai came to Giladi they took counsel on the situation, and decided that 27 men would leave the place, for the attack had assumed the form of ordered warfare. Twenty-six decided to remain on the spot till the last moment. During the same night two graves were dug. In one, the bodies of the four men were buried, and in the other, those of the girls.

"The next day there were several attempts by the Arabs to approach Giladi, but they were dispersed by a strong fire, leaving two dead behind them.

"Towards evening the Bek of the Metullaim sent word to Giladi that a strong attack was being planned and offered the colonists shelter. They thanked the Bek, but only sent the animals to him for protection.

"The following dawn a big movement was observed in the valley and among the mountains by Bedouins and on the Hill of Hamra a gun had been placed. By general consent it was decided to retreat if attacked by gun fire. The right of command was given to Shneerson and also the right to order a retreat.

"In the district the signs, always associated with an attack on the French, were visible and the sound of gun fire was heard from Banyas. Shots were fired from among the Gulan Mountains, and from various places there were heard repeated rifle shots. At 8 in the morning the first gun shot was fired and passed over Giladi. Shneerson gave the order to retreat. They took nothing with them except rifles and bullets. The Bek of Metullaim and his relatives met them with warm affection.

"Kunzlevsky and two foremen of the Bek went down to Metullah and informed the men there that they should leave the spot. All of them, together with some of the Bek's men, passed over the mountains of the Metullaim and the next morning they reached 'Ayelet Hashahar' in peace."

News from London

By Our Correspondent,

DR. M. EPSTEIN

London, March 18, 1920.

The life of the community centers around the great scheme of reconstruction which has now collected its first £100,000 (say $500,000). The men who are leading the campaign, busy as they are in all conscience in their own particular walks of life, still find time, and offer it lavishly, in the interests of this big drive. In particular, one must name Mr. Robert Waley Cohen, who is literally sacrificing himself in the cause. He travels up and down the country addressing meetings, and nothing is too small or too great for his attention or his energy. During the last month perhaps the most successful gathering in aid of the scheme was organized in Manchester, where not only a large sum of money was collected but—and this is the important point—every stratum of the population was tapped. The men contributed, the women contributed, and there was even a children's fund. Manchester certainly rose to the occasion and distinguished itself, intending as it did to lead the way which other cities in the provinces might follow. Emissaries of the scheme have visited Leeds, where likewise there was a great reception. Mr. Cohen himself went down to Cambridge, his old university, to address the Jewish students there, in order to win their sympathy and practical support for the movement. It must be admitted, however, that so far no definite policy has been formulated in regard to the expenditure of the £1,000,000 which it is hoped to collect within the next five years, nor will it be easy to satisfy all the contributors. Already there are signs of special demands being put forward. The extreme orthodox wing are asking their supporters to earmark such sums as they may contribute; and Berkeley Street people, though they have not yet slammed the door, have not, on the other hand, definitely committed themselves. It is, however, probable that they will come in. The Liberals, who, as we pointed out some time ago, at first refused to have anything to do with the scheme, have now allowed second thoughts to prevail and are coming in. All this is to the good. At any rate it provides one platform where common work can be done by all wings of the community, and a united front is required more than ever.

It is to be hoped that one subject to which the communal scheme will devote attention will be a central hall or building for all communal affairs. It may strike American readers as strange that a large community, such as we have in London, should be without a center or habitat. Yet such is the case. One is almost ashamed to chronicle this fact, when one remembers how many a provinicial city in the United States has its own building for all Jewish activities. The London Lodge would be one of the institutions to profit by such an arrangement; and, indeed, we have been thinking seriously whether it would not be possible to lay the foundations of such a building ourselves, or at least to co-operate with others in its erection. Certain it is that it would supply a long-felt want, and many people hope that part of the £1,000,000 will be devoted to the erection of such a structure in the heart of London, large in extent, beautiful to look at, and worthy in every way of the memorial which the great scheme intends to set up.

Another interesting item connected with the scheme is the proposal to send the Chief Rabbi to the Dominions and Colonies in order to stir up congregations in the outlying parts of the British Empire. It will undoubtedly interest our readers to learn that in this connection the organization of the Order will very likely help the communal scheme. It has been suggested to the leaders of the scheme that to reach the Canadian congregations most effectively it would be best to appeal to them through the various lodges in Canada, and to this end the London Lodge has been approached to act as intermediary between the scheme and the Canadian congregations. Needless to add, the London Lodge replied with alacrity to the suggestion that was made to it, being only too pleased to help in a good cause, which deserves the support of all right-thinking people. It should not be overlooked, while we are mentioning this, that the Chief Rabbi himself is a member of the Order and, if he is wise, will not forget that fact if and when he goes to Canada.

Apart from the communal scheme there is little news to report of doings in Anglo-Jewry. Zionism is very much to the fore, particularly as during the last month the General Executive of the Movement held daily meetings, after an interval of some six years. Representatives came from all countries of the globe to learn of what had been done and what was proposed; there were private meetings and public meetings; there was criticism and praise; but on the whole a spirit of unanimity and friendliness dominated these proceedings. Outside the Zionist camp, however, a good deal of dissatisfaction is being expressed, first because the leaders are not more specific in describing their achievements hitherto, and, secondly, because their actual achievements are not expected to amount to very much. Some people, Mr. Israel Zangwill among them, would have liked to see claims put forward for the setting up of a state in Palestine, paralleled with the establishment of states in Czecho-Slovakia, Esthonia, Latvia, and the rest, with absolute independence and self-determination. The Zionist leaders, on the other hand, prefer to build slowly, in accordance with the prevailing conditions in Palestine, hoping that in due course the dreams of the dreamers may actually become realized.

Meanwhile the Zionist Central Office continues to be as busy as ever, and one or two outstanding facts certainly hold out a rich promise for the future. One is the universal support which has been promised to the Jerusalem University Scheme, for which an Advisory Committee has been formed under the chairmanship of Lord Rothschild, containing very many prominent university men, who all appear to be enthusiastic in their desire that the proposed university shall be a success. Another attractive fact is the influence exercised by Mr. Ittamar Benavi, a very clever journalist from Jerusalem. Mr. Benavi has a golden tongue and a marvelous personality. He proves over again that not meetings or pamphlets or advertisements move the world but only personality. He has been addressing meetings in London and in the provinces, describing the present conditions in the Holy Land, depicting future possibilities, and winning adherents by the force of his eloquence. He must be a wonderful man, and his gifts have struck many people who may be expected to be good judges of character. Lord Northcliffe, for instance, felt attracted to him almost from the first, expressed a desire to visit Palestine under his guidance, and promptly appointed him the correspondent for the Northcliffe papers in the near East, an honorable and influential position for any man to hold. If only there were a dozen or so of Benavis, not only the Zionist Movement, but the whole of Jewry, would reap untold benefit.

One branch of Zionist activity deserves special reference, to-wit, the Mizrachi. It must be confessed that though their supporters are not many numerically, the influence of such adherents as they boast is great. They have taken a Central Office in London, they propose to keep a close watch on Zionist development, and they talk of publishing a monthly to further their cause. Surprising as it may sound, Sir Stuart Samuel is one of the members of their body, the life and soul of which in this country is Dr. Schonfeld.

A new series of extension lectures will be delivered next month at Toynbee Hall, under the auspices of the Jewish Historical Society of England, and the University of London. The previous courses have been so successful that the organizers of these lectures feel warranted in going ahead at full speed. This year the lectures will be devoted to the history of the Jews in the 17th Century, and the lecturers include Mr. Elkan Adler, Mr. Kilner, Mr. Israel Cohen, Dr. Gaster, Mr. Lucien Wolf, Dr. Abraham Wolf, the Chief Rabbi, Dr. A. Cowley, and the Rev. E. Levine. We cannot, of course, claim anything like the success of your Chautauqua Movement, but our own Historical Society is dong what little it can of work along the same lines. We have no doubt that the present course of lectures will be as successful as those that went before.

We have already referred to the libel perpetrated on Sir Afred Mond by two nobodies some little while back. One of thees nobodies is making a specialty of stirring up anti-Jewish feeling, and for that purpose is sending our scurrilous literature, which on the face of it is third-rate. We believe that one of his precious pamphlets has actually reached America, and we may inform our American friends that no less an authority than Dr. Hagberg Wright, the learned librarian of the London Library, who is an expert on Russian affairs, pronounces this publication as a fraud on the British public. According to Dr. Wright the latest effusion of this small clique of anti-Semites is the translation of a worthless Russian book which purports to set forth the dreams and visions of a monk. Its whole object is political, mainly intending to warn good Russians of an alliance with England, or America, or Japan. The effort defeats itself by its stupidity, and little more need be said about it. One would have thought that with so many world-problems to solve, with famine in Central Europe, and the shadow of famine in Western Europe, with prices high, with a currency inflated, with industrial unrest in all directions, that the best brains of the world would be devoted to finding some solution for all its manifold difficulties. It seems a waste of time and energy to attack harmless people who go about their daily lives with high ideals and live as good citizens should.

That was the keynote of the recent meeting of the London Lodge, which was held to celebrate the 70th anniversary of the birth of the respected President of the Order. We in London combined this special celebration with the more general celebration of Purim. The Lodge was "at home" in the afternoon to members and their friends; light refreshments were served; there was general talk and a tone of good fellowship; and only two speeches were delivered that afternoon, one by the President of the Lodge, the other by a Past President, who is at the same time distinguished in Anglo-Jewry, Dr. M. Gaster. Both speeches concentrated on the achievements of the Order, both pointed out that if brethren were proud of their achievements, they must necessarily be proud of the man who directed them. Good wishes were sent across the ocean to the New Continent of the West, bidding God-speed to President Kraus in his work and praying that he may be spared for many, many years to come, to carry on the splendid activities of a splendid organization.

The London Lodge, too, recently welcomed two emissaries from Lemburg who came to plead the cause of the pogrom orphans. Mesdames Rothberg and Meltzer came as representatives of the Lemburg Lodge and spoke before our Ladies' Auxiliary, which undoubtedly rose to the occasion. The members responded quite liberally, and a respectable sum was collected for the poor little victims, which helped to swell the general collection made in this country. We feel that here was work indeed for the Ladies' Auxiliary, and we can only add that we hope they will continue as good work in the future.

tained prominence in political, as well as in industrial and commercial spheres. Among those who early became prominent in the colony was Simon Jacobs. He was attorney-general of Cape Colony and a justice of the Supreme Court. Samuel Solomon, who died in 1892, was offered the premiership; another member of the family was attorney-general of the Transvaal. Today there are many who are conspicuous in positions of trust and high responsibility. Among these should be mentioned Hon. M. Alexander, the husband of Mrs. Ruth Schechter, formerly of Chicago, who is a daughter of the eminent Jewish sage, savant and educator, the late Dr. Solomon Schechter; Mr. Alexander is at present a member of parliament for the Castle Division, Capetown, and a leader among the liberals. He is conspicuously identified with public matters throughout the colony, and has rendered eminent services in philanthropic and welfare work among all classes. Hon. Henry Crauman is a member of the legislative assembly of Transvaal; Col. David Harris is the member for Kimberly. Dr. Manfred Nathan, of Johannesburg, is a barrister of high repute and a distinguished legal author and compiler. Hon. Emile Nathan is a member for Johannesburg constituency, and the Unionist party whip. Hon. Samuel Marks is a member of the Senate, and a power in the financial world. Rev. A. P. Bender, minister of the old Hebrew congregation at Capetown, is a member of the School Board and Hospital Board. In art circles, Amschutz, an artist, at Johannesburg, and Hottler, sculptor, at Capetown, have achieved a reputation.

As early as 1828 Nathaniel Isaacs was granted by Tschaka, chief of the Zulus, an immense principality in Natal, extending 100 miles inland from the coast for conspicuous service in subduing hostile tribes.

While on the subject of the Jews of Africa, it will, no doubt, be interesting to call attention to the existence of a large colony of negro Jews in Abyssinia, known as Falashas, estimated to number 50,000; they trace their history back to the days of the temple and their origin to the visit paid by the

San Remo Conference Fixes Palestine Status

The Supreme Council at San Remo Has At Last Placed the Stamp of Approval on Palestine as the Jewish Homeland

The Peace Conference has awarded the mandate over Palestine to Great Britain, specifically for the purpose of establishing there a Jewish Homeland.

This action by the Peace Conference stamps with success the Zionist movement, which was launched at Basle, Switzerland, on Aug. 21, 1897, for the "establishment in Palestine of a Jewish homeland, recognized and protected by public law". Derided, in the beginning, as visionary and Utopian, the movement captured the imagination of thousands of Jews all over the world. Under the inspiration of Zionism over 60 Jewish agriculturist colonies have been established in Palestine. The movement itself became, in time, the strongest party in Jewish life, and the recent wholesale massacres of Jews, which began with the outbreak of the war, have caused millions of Jews throughout Europe to turn to Palestine as their only haven and refuge.

In the ports of Odessa, Constantinople, Constanza and Vladivostok, hundreds of thousands of Jews are waiting opportunity to embark for the land of their desire. Thousands of Jews have ventured across the Mediterranean in unseaworthy fishing smacks and hundreds have been drowned in these mad attempts to reach the Holy Land. Hundreds upon hundreds have walked across Europe to reach sea ports near Palestine.

With the issuance of the Balfour Declaration on Nov. 2, 1917, by which Great Britain pledged itself to aid the Zionists to establish a Jewish Homeland in Palestine, and which has been endorsed by President Wilson, all of the allied, and many of the neutral powers, the Zionist Organization of America, of which United States Supreme Court Justice Louis D. Brandeis is honorary president, and Federal Judge Julian W. Mack is president, began a series of operations to prepare Palestine for the vast migration which will ensue now that the political status of the land has been fixed. It has sent to Palestine the American Zionist Medical Unit, which has become the Health Department of the land; it is preparing to send a corps of engineers to investigate the natural resources of the land, to plan the building of harbors, hydroelectric plants, and to create industries and opportunities in a land made desolate by the oppressive rule of the Turk. In all of its plans, the Zionists have reckoned with the Arab population as equal beneficiaries of the development of the country. By the adoption of the "Pittsburgh program", two years ago, the American Zionists declared in favor of nationalization of the land and public ownership of all utilities and natural resources in Palestine. To carry out the vast projects for the development of the Jewish Homeland the Zionist Organization of America is raising $10,000,000 as a first installment.

The statement sent out by the Associated Press that, by the terms of the Balfour Declaration, Jews may be citizens of Palestine, and, at the same time citizens of the lands in which they reside, is incorrect. Only such Jews as actually settle permanently in Palestine may become citizens thereof. The Balfour Declaration specifically provides that the political status of the Jews of other lands shall remain unaffected by the establishment of the Jewish Homeland

Queen of Sheba to King Solomon; they are dark brown, with the features of the African. On the Melaba coast of China there are also small communities of Jews who claim to have migrated there nearly 2,000 years ago. In those settlements there are both white and black residents who worship according to the Jewish ritual; there is a sharp line of demarcation between the whites and blacks, the former claiming that the latter are descendants of slaves which their ancestors brought with them centuries ago. There are also settlements of black Jews on the Loango coast of Western Africa.

In concluding this brief sketch of the Jews in these remote quarters of the globe, the thought is impelling that this wide dispersion of our people must be divine dispensation; they must have been preserved through the ages to keep inviolate their spiritual mandate, to safeguard for all time the faith in Omnipotent God, to hold aloft the lambent flame of their ideals, a people chosen to hand down to all ages the indestructible, ineffable truths of their ancestral faith, given into their keeping by the Almighty amid the thunders of Sinai and through the inspired prophets who were His chosen instruments to communicate His divine will.

The world is reborn. The furnaces of war consumed discordant and conflicting interests, traditions, prejudices age-long misunderstandings. The cataclysm which convulsed the world brought nations into closer alliance and produced nearer relationships; bonds of friendships and amicable intercourse were wielded which never will be severed. A new spirit of universal brotherhood is diffused, new ideals are terminated, new standards of human rights have been erected. The sorrow-laden years of Israel, as respects civil disabilities, that hideous relic of a barbarous age, ended when the peace council of the allied and associated nations, in solemn session at Paris, proclaimed in unmistakable terms that the civil and religious rights of minorities were inalienable; that in all the cycles of time hereafter and in all nations a sacred covenant would be stipulated that no nation in future should be admitted to the sisterhood of states until this obligation was accepted in solemn treaty; that the definite price of recognition, with privilege of intercourse with the dominant countries of the world, was a permanent, unreserved, unrepealable grant to all their subjects of unrestricted civil rights, with absolute equality before the law.

National Conference of Jewish Social Service

The 1920 meeting of the National conference of Jewish Social Service was held in New Orleans, April 12 to 14.

The conference offers a forum for exchange of experiences and a means whereby standards and methods of social service can be maintained and improved.

Through the annual Conference meetings definite principles of Jewish social service are being developed, standards of professional qualifications are being worked out, and programs for the coming year are presented. The program for this Conference was diversified in character and no less interesting than varied. New questions were taken up and old ones discussed and brought up to date.

Standardization was the feature of the Conference this year. Standardization of technique and method have at no time been so urgent as at present. In most communities the organization of Jewish social service has passed its experimental stage. What is most needed now is uniformity of purpose and method. This the New Orleans Conference endeavored to bring about by means of special sessions, each devoted to a distinct phase of social service and each concerned with the local and national aspects of the problems and methods involved.

The Conference was arranged with no formal papers, but the oportunity was offered all delegates to participate in the discussions and bring home to fellow workers the problems nearest to them. Round table Conferences on the new tendencies in community organization and standards, family care, child welfare, delinquency, education, recreation and health were arranged.

The professional social worker bears the burden of developing and maintaining high standards of Jewish social service. Specialization has proceeded to such a degree that the ordinary director or voluntary worker cannot be expected to follow the problems in their minute details. As never before, the progress of Jewish social service lies in the hands of the trained social worker, yet at no time before has the situation been so critical as it is at present. The social unrest manifesting itself in other quarters, is also affecting the Jewish social worker. Despite his readiness to sacrifice his own welfare for the good of the community, the High Cost of Living has been too difficult an obstacle for him to ignore. The withdrawal from the field of social workers affects the well-being of social service organizations and threatens to set back standards and achievements accomplished by many years of strenuous community effort. How is this problem to be met? How are new workers to be brought into the field? What should be their qualifications and how are they to be trained for efficient service? These were the main topics for discussion at the New Orleans Conference.

The awakening of the community social consciousness as manifest in war service and in the response of American Jewry towards the needs of their brethren in the war-distracted countries, may be rightly considered one of the great achievements of the New World remnant of Israel. Yet the enormous tasks that we in the United States must impose upon ourselves in order to save European Jewry from complete physical and spiritual destruction are only now assuming definite form. The period of emergency relief is practically passed. Now all efforts must be bent upon carrying through a program of reconstruction that will enable European Jewry to regain its economic and social well-being. This calls for the united effort of the social forces of American Jewry and most of all, for the active contribution that Jewish Social Service can and must make. At the New Orleans Conference an exposition of the technique and method of relief and reconstruction service developed by American War Relief Organizations was presented for discussion.

The nascent forces of the more recent elements in American Jewish communities are now beginning to assume certain forms which are pregnant with great consequences to Jewish community organization in the United States. The process of centralization of effort is one of the forms already discernable. The small ''landsleut'' societies recently banded together into large federations for war relief; the Jewish Congress, aiming as it does, to create a truly democratic spokesmanship for American Jewry and the strengthening of the Nationalist Movement as expressed in Zionism and kindred organizations, are providing a firmer ground and a sounder motive for the knitting together of Jewish communal effort in the United States. The final forms in which these efforts will express themselves and the extent to which they will become a power for good in American community life, will greatly depend on the attitude of the social workers and community leaders. They cannot possibly stand by and watch developments.

While essentially practical and constructive, the Conference was of a definite inspirational character and as such, was eager to draw to its sessions socially minded persons, even though not actually engaged in social service.

In addition to the officially accredited delegates from organizations, a large number of Board and Trustees of social service agencies and numerous volunteer social workers and interested lay citizens from every part of the country, attended.

Message of B'nai B'rith

The following address was delivered by Rabbi Alexander Segal, of Fresno, Calif., to the Jewish people of that city upon his return from the Convention of District No. 4 at Los Angeles:

''I have just returned from the District Grand Convention of the Independent Order B'nai B'rith. The delegates were busy business men, successful lawyers and physicians; men who rarely take a vacation because they cannot spare the time, but who tore themselves away from their work in order to attend this convention. Many of them are at the heads of their communities, non-Jewish as well as Jewish. What was it that gripped them to the B'nai B'rith, that inspired them to confess it meant more to them than all the other fraternal orders to which they belonged put together?

''The very name of the Order, 'B'nai B'rith,' Sons of the Covenant, is significant. It throws upon the screen of the mind the picture of the Children of Israel standing in awe at Mt. Sinai hearing the divine charge, Ex. 19-5, 'Now if you will really hearken to My voice, and keep My covenant, you shall be Mine own treasure from among all peoples; for all the earth is Mine.' It brings up the picture of the successive fortunes of the Jewish people, when the cord of persecution was transformed into the cord of co-operation and brotherhood, glowingly promising of the day when all men will recognize the image of God in one another, and will strive to live together in justice, peace and good will.

''The charge of the B'nai B'rith is co-operation. It tries to carry into communal life the password of the business world; co-operation gets us farther than competition; energy wasted in quarreling will not make the world go around better. It was this idea which L. M. Mendelsohn, of our city, the first resident of the San Joaquin Valley to be elected Grand President of the District I. O. B. B., tried to persuade the delegates to take hope: 'Two working together can accomplish more than three working separately. Three working hand-in-hand can accomplish more than 10 singly'. And well he might know this, because it was the co-operation of Stockton, Fresno and Bakersfield which boosted him to the top of the ladder of the Order.

''The message of B'nai B'rith, is the command given by God to Abraham, the first Jew, starting out to seek his brothers as his spiritual fortune: 'Be thou a blessing'! Be a blessing to yourself, to your family, to your community. Live in order to give—give not only of your money, but also of your time, your effort, your ability, your sympathy. Put out a helping hand for others rather than for your own benefit. The essence of religion is to feed the hungry, clothe the naked, take the friendless to your habitation and to establish justice among men.

''Wherever the B'nai B'rith have sounded their message they have worked miracles. In Jewish communities few in number they have encouraged one another. To Jews who had slipped away from the field, to them they have whispered the word of brotherhood, which has led them back to their people and their faith. In this very community, the Jewish religion languished until the B'nai B'rith aroused enthusiasm among themselves and their neighbors. The large Jewish populations of the coast were appalled by the indifference, the shamefaced attitude of the local Jews. Rabbis volunteered to try to kindle the latent spirit of the community; but to little effect. At last the local Jewish leaders realized that God helps those who help themselves. The B'nai B'rith volunteered to start a Jewish congregation, and to secure a rabbi; and to the happy surprise of the Jewry of the Pacific Coast they succeeded. Now the call is to build a temple and an ideal Jewish community. May it also fulfill its purpose''.

Jews and Dogs Not Admitted

The Vienna correspondent of the London Jewish Correspondence Bureau writes:

''An announcement has been affixed to the notice-board at the Budapest University to the effect that ''Jews and dogs are forbidden to enter the University''.

Such inscriptions up to the present have only been used by certain obscure hotels. The University of Budapest may pride itself on being the first scientific institution in the world to indulge in such barbaric forms of anti-Semitism.

The Jews in Lithuania

The London Jewish Correspondence Bureau stated some time ago that, according to the Warsaw papers Jewish Deputies in the Lithuanian Taryba have complained that Jews are being excluded from positions in the municipal administrations as officials, etc.

The Lithuanian Legation in London states that according to their inquiries this report is untrue, and that the rumor was officially denied by the Lithuanian State Council.

Special Restrictions on Hungarian Jews

The Vienna correspondent of the London Jewish Correspondence Bureau wires:

''Official placards have been pasted on the walls of the town of Miskolz, forbidding the Jews to appear in the streets after nine o'clock at night.''

Chicago, Illinois

Ramah Lodge No. 33, entertained the members and their guests at a card parts at the Hotel La Salle on April 13th. This entertainment concluded the calendar of social events for the season. All the parties have been largely attended and thoroughly enjoyed.

Sacramento, Calif.

A class of 26 members was initiated as part of the Kraus Honor Class at the meeting of Etham Lodge No. 37 on March 16. The lodge is now conducting a membership campaign and hopes by April 1 to include within the lodge all eligible Jews of that community. The lodge is taking an active interest in Americanization work and has apointed a committee to co-operate with the Americanization committee of District No. 4. An address was delivered by Brother Albert Elkus. A drive to raise money for the loan fund was also initiated at the meeting.

Gary, Ind.

Lake Lodge No. 831, which has been largely to the front in the last months in the programs provided for its members, gave a very successful banquet and dance on April 21. The guest of the evening was Brother Sidney G. Kusworm, member of the Executive Committee for District No. 2, who spoke on the work of the Order. Two hundred members and their guests attended the banquet.

Soul of the Stranger

den no carriages await them, and at the Charities they are told that previous experiments have failed and that they had better stay in New York and get to work. Is it any wonder that a dingy tenement in Orchard Street fails to appeal to this man who left behind a comfortable house and position, or that peddling as a means of obtaining a livelihood does not fascinate him? No one, it appears, took the trouble to place him where he was fittest. He returns to Russia twice, and each time the oppression grows, until at last in his fifties he lands here to stay. He is not a pauper. He brings several thousands of dollars with him. But his children are put to work at starvation wages and long hours. He is loath to live upon the earnings of his children. At last he wrenches himself away from the East Side. He buys a farm in Connecticut. He and his household work their hardest. But they cannot make it pay. It speaks well for the man that he comes out of his year's experience without substantial loss. So back to New York. He misses his friends at home, that social life among his equals so ruthlessly destroyed in the new world. Small trade and small bookkeeping will not satisfy him. The synagogue with its bickerings, the lodge with its small talk are not to his liking. Even the Zionist meetings are so different from those at home. Does he know or understand America? How can he? All he knows is that fringe known as the East Side. Quick to learn, he writes in Yiddish a work on agriculture which receives the approval of the Department of Agriculture and of Cornell University. But he is diffident about it; in all likelihood there are better treatises in the English language.

Altogether it may be appreciated what this uprooting means to the stranger. Actually the curse in the Law is fulfilled that his soul finds no rest. His children grow up and become independent. His wants are few and are supplied by the writing he does. But, after all, the life of this man and of thousands like him is a failure. And how it could have been made into a success had we who preceded him in our exile studied his soul, had we endeavored to put him in the niche where he would have fitted! Think of the economic value of such a man. Think of the waste when this man is bidden to carry a peddler's basket. Think of the many like him who are thrown into sweat shops. Americanization begins with a study of the stranger's soul. To all such who are engaged in this important work the present autobiography is recommended for earnest perusal.

Convention of Constitution Grand Lodge

Beirut, Turkey

The following communication has just been received from Beirut Lodge No. 691. This is one of the few letters which have been received from the lodges of District No. 11 outside of Constantinople since 1914, and is indicative of the continued interest and activity of the lodges in that District:

Beirut, Feb. 28, 1920.

We beg to confirm our telegram of the 22nd inst. reading as follows:

''Brothers Beirut Lodge respectfully tender venerable Grand President affectionate heartfelt wishes, happy long life, prosperity order under precious wise guidance commemorating seventieth anniversary creation Kraus Fund for orphans craftslearning unanimously decided, 691.''

It was indeed a very great pleasure to all our brethren here to celebrate this memorial anniversary of our dear and venerable Grand President, Brother Adolf Kraus.

A general meeting was convocated on the 26th of February, five new brothers were duly initiated to increase the number of the class Adolf Kraus, and several addresses were delivered on this occasion by several brothers. All brothers of our lodge attended this special meeting that was followed by a banquet for our families. Many toasts were made for the welfare and continued long and happy life of our venerable Grand President as well as for the welfare of our sister lodges all over the world that were at the same time also feasting this anniversary.

To further commemorate this event a fund was started for the creation of a craftlearning institution for orphans to be called ''Adolf Kraus Fund for Craftlearning for Orphans''.

We trust that our heartfelt wishes and brotherly greetings reached you in due time by our cable to be read at the banquet which we are sure was as well a perfect success.

Program for Eleventh Quinquennial Convention of the Order to Be Held at Cleveland May 8th to May 13th.

General plans for the program of the Quinquennial Convention of the Constitution Grand Lodge of the Order, which takes place in Cleveland in May, have been adopted by the committee in charge of arrangements. Delegates from all sections of the country will be in attendance at the gathering. Headquarters will be at the Hotel Statler and business sessions will take place at the B'nai B'rith Building, Euclid avenue and East Seventy-first street.

It is expected that the coming quinquennial gathering will be the most important Constitution Grand Lodge Convention in the history of the Order. The program as outlined by the local Committee on Arrangements is as follows:

Saturday Evening, May 8

Public Reception at Hotel Statler.

Sunday

Formal opening of convention at B'nai B'rith Building. Open to the public.

Sunday Noon

Dinner at B'nai B'rith Building.

Sunday Evening

Delegates will be guests of the Excelsior Club for dinner and evening entertainment.

Monday, May 10

All day session for delegates at B'nai B'rith Building. Ladies to be entertained by Council of Jewish Women. Dinner and afternoon entertainment.

Monday Evening

Musical entertainment at Hotel Statler.

Tuesday, May 11

Session at B'nai B'rith Building in the morning. Sightseeing in afternoon. Prominent speakers at B'nai B'rith Building in the evening.

Wednesday, May 12

Session in the morning. Noon dinner at Jewish Orphan Home with entertainment at Orphan Home in the afternoon.

Wednesday Evening

Public memorial services in the evening at the Euclid Avenue Temple. Delegates will be speakers.

Jerusalem Lodge

The following communication has just been received from Jerusalem Lodge No. 376:

''Jerusalem, the 27 February, 1920.

''The great festival of yesterday evening has truly marked a historical moment in our Lodge. The 70th anniversary of our highly esteemed Grand President Adolf Kraus, Esq., has gathered together all our brethren, associating all of them in one feeling of good wishes to their President.

''Truly said our Lodge never witnessed such an assembly as that of yesterday. Ten new members were initiated and the evening was spent in high spirits. Speakers remarkably mentioned the prosperous activities of our President during so long a period, and expressed their wishes to see the President for many other long years among us, acting vigorously for the benefit of the Lodge.

''The festival was closed by raising a fund of 500 pounds towards the foundation of a Jewish Colony in the neighborhood of Jerusalem on the name of Adolf Kraus. This amount will grow largely in the future. We expect that this fund will reach soon several thousands of pounds from among our own brethren. It will really be an honorable memory to the Order, and to its beloved President.

''By this occasion we venture to invite the co-operation of all our lodges throughout the world and especially those of the United States to the foundation of the Colony. The name of our President is attractive enough to multiply the number of adherents. We are living in an age of great hopes in Israel and let the name of Adolf Kraus be the blessed cause for the reconstruction of our Holy Land.

''The scheme is launched on quite a non-charitable base. Shares of 5 pounds each will be issued and ground will be acquired for the funds realized in the neighborhood of Jerusalem. A colony will be founded on that ground on the name of our President. Those who desire to settle themselves or their substitutes may become the legal owners of the land. This is a prosperous idea, because land, in the course of days, will undoubtedly rise in Palestine.

''We are confident that our call will find prompt response and that the honorable Executive Committee will issue a circular to all our lodges, inviting their efforts to collaborate to the realization of our scheme. People may participate with ten, fifty or hundred shares. We are sure that our District Lodge at Constantinople and its daughter lodges as well as the lodges at Cairo and Alexandria, who are ready to do something efficient for Palestine, will gladly give their support to this colony.

''We expect to see our idea on the order of the day at the Conference of Cleveland. Great success is insured if the Executive Committee gives to it the necessary support.

''We wired you today, reading:

'' 'Jerushalaim Lodge 376 sends heartiest wishes seventieth anniversary Grand President, wishing youthful vigor, prosperous work. Jerushalaim Lodge is founding colony neighborhood Jerusalem, name Adolf Kraus, Commemorating jubilee. New membership enlisted.'

''We beg to annex under separate cover copies of the two leading dailies, where the festival of our Lodge is appreciated and our resolution on the outlined colony highly welcomed.

''We hereby extend to our Grand President our best wishes.

J. PRESS, President.''

Philadelphia, Pa.

Joshua Lodge No. 23 initiated 120 candidates at its meeting on March 26. A dinner and dance at the Adelphia Hotel followed the initiation and was enjoyed by all present. The members initiated were secured in the Kraus Testimonial Membership Campaign. Nearly two hundred additional applicants secured in this campaign remain to be initiated at the next meeting.

Tacoma, Wash.

Rabbi Goldenstein of Tacoma Lodge was recently appointed by the President of District No. 4 as a member of the District Intellectual Advancement Committee.

A very intensive membership drive is now being carried on by the Tacoma Lodge, I. O. B. B., under the chairmanship of P. B. Friedman, assisted by the following committee: S. A. Andrews, F. Spiegel, A. Rose, E. Weldocks, H. A. Kaufman, J. Friedman, Rabbi Goldenstein and S. Cohen.

Los Angeles, Calif.

Los Angeles Lodge initiated about 300 candidates in its ''Kraus Honor Class'' at a special meeting of the Lodge held on the evening of March 30. Owing to the lack of space in the B'nai B'rith hall, this special meeting was held at the Eagles' Hall.

Brother Lucius L. Solomons, of San Francisco, the first vice-president of the Constitution Grand Lodge, was in Los Angeles for three days prior to the initiation to assist in procuring candidates and delivered an address to the Lodge and the candidates upon the night of the initiation.

Long Beach, Calif.

Marco R. Newmark, President of Los Angeles Lodge; Milton Schwartz, First Vice-President of District No. 4; M. J. Finkenstein, Second Vice-President, and Rabbi Edgar F. Magnin, Vice-President of Los Angeles Lodge, went to Long Beach recently to address a mass meeting held there for the purpose of organizing a branch of the Order.

Convention of District No. 7

District Grand Lodge No. 7 will hold its annual convention in Birmingham on May 5, 6 and 7. The members of the Order in that city have appointed several strong committees which are actively engaged in making plans for the entertainment of the delegates. One committee is engaged in securing invitations for the delegates so that each one of them will be invited to a family dinner at the home of some member on the evening of May 7.

Resolutions on Victor Abraham

The Board of Trustees and Directors of the Jewish Orphan Home at its meeting on April 11th adopted the following resolutions in memory of the late Victor Abraham of Cincinnati:

''WHEREAS, in his life-time Victor Abraham was a man who did much for our Institution and aided in many ways in carrying out the great purposes for which our Institution was founded; and,

''WHEREAS, in his death the whole of Jewry mourns the loss of a genteel, kindly, courteous gentleman, ever alert to the problems of his brethren, a sterling fighter, a natural born leader of men, who abhorred sham and frivolity, and who made his life an example of those principles of our faith best annunciated in the motto of the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith—benevolence, brotherly love and harmony; and,

''WHEREAS, his was a life of quiet and unassuming service, a life that had abundant stores of worldy goods in sight which were sacrificed that he might serve the Order which has founded our Institution and indirectly served his fellowmen, leaving earthly activities without great wordly means, the treasure of a noble life well lived, an example to the countless thousands who will follow.

''THEREFORE BE IT RESOLVED by the Board of Trustees and Directors of the Jewish Orphan Asylum of Districts number two and six, I. O. B. B., that in the death of our beloved brother and co-worker, Victor Abraham, we have lost one of the pillars of Israel, a man among men, an earnest, sincere, lovable and kindly soul whose presence will be sadly missed and whose place at our councils cannot be readily filled; and,

''BE IT FURTHER RESOLVED, that a copy of these resolutions be spread upon a separate page of our minutes reserved for that purpose, another copy sent to the family of the deceased, and that necessary copies be furnished the press that the world may know of our deep loss in the death of this eminent and esteemed man.''

B'nai B'rith Helps Students

A special committee of Portland Lodge No. 65, I. O. B. B., met at Temple Beth Israel to take up the matter of assisting students in Oregon. The chairman suggested the following division: Co-operation with the Menorah Society, stipends to worthy students, prizes for essays on Jewish topics. It was decided to follow this plan in general and to put the large resources of Portland Lodge behind the movement.

The particulars of the plan will involve the assistance of Menorah groups in securing special shelves for college libraries to be equipped with Jewish literature by the lodge, the providing of funds to help men and women who are financially unable to continue their work in college and the arrangement for a competitive prize essay contest in Oregon colleges on any one of a number of topics related to Jewish matters, selected by the committee. A cash prize of fifty dollars has been donated by Mr. Ben Rubin and the lodge will offer others.

Meriden, N. H.

On April 11 Meriden Lodge I. O. B. B. held an open meeting at Temple Hall. Rabbi Louis Mann, of New Haven, delivered an address on ''Jewish Contributions to Civilization.'' The affair was open to the public.

What Our Lodges Are Doing

New York City

Reports of meetings of the lodges in New York City show great progress in the development of the work of the Order in that city. The lodges have been fortunate in securing as officers men whose standing in the community is of the highest and who are heart and soul in the work.

On April 12, 1920, at a quarterly meeting of Rehoboth Lodge, No. 38, a surprise was tendered to President William Klapp by the members of the Lodge. The surprise was in the nature of a 21 jewel gold Waltham watch. Simon M. Platt, Governor of the Home in Yonkers, introduced Hon. Albert Cohn, Assistant District Attorney of Bronx County, who made the presentation address. Brother Cohn reviewed the work of President Klapp during the past two years and in behalf of the brethren, gave assurances that the good work and untiring efforts in behalf of the B'nai B'rith cause were highly appreciated, and that Brother Klapp has won the esteem of every member of the Lodge.

President Klapp has put new life into Rehoboth Lodge. An increase of nearly 100 members was made since his association with the Lodge. Men of influence in business, social and political affairs have been brought into the Lodge, and the Lodge is now a strong power in the Borough of the Bronx. Within the past six months Big Brother work was undertaken and the Committee composed of laymen and lawyers are actively engaged in rescuing Jews who are first offenders. The good work of the Committee has been officially recognized by County Judge Louis D. Gibbs, who has commended the efforts of the Committee.

Marcus S. Gross is chairman of the Committee and Samuel Cherkos is counsel; with him are associated many other lawyers who give their services gratis.

On March 23, 1920, Hebron Lodge No. 5 and Progressive Lodge No. 841, the oldest and the youngest Lodges of District No. 1, met in joint session. Each transacted its routine work and Progressive Lodge had a special session to elect a President, pursuant to a dispensation from the Grand Lodge, which was followed by a joint meeting.

Brother Leon B. Ginsburg, the first President, elected at the installation of Progressive Lodge, and re-elected in December, resigned to make room for Brother Samuel Dorf, who was unanimously elected its second President. He was installed by Brother William Klapp, chairman of the Intellectual Advancement Committee for District No. 1.

The joint session was most interesting and discussion was full of pep. The pessimistic query by Hebron's old guard and the optimistic reply by Progressive's new President gave ample proof that joint meetings should be encouraged. It means rejuvenation to the older Lodge and encouragement for the younger.

Entertaining and enthusiastic addresses were made by William Klapp, representing the Grand Lodge, Nelson A. Bartow, President of Hebron Lodge, Samuel Dorf, President of Progressive Lodge, Leon B. Ginsburg, ex-President of Progressive Lodge.

Progressive Lodge No. 841 was instituted July 10, 1919, with 35 members, and now numbers 60, with 22 propositions awaiting initiation, which will keep the newly elected President busy.

Brother Samuel Dorf is Grand Master of the Order B'rith Abraham, to which position he was elected in 1892 and has held the office ever since. Brother Dorf is also prominent in all the Jewish fraternal and philantropic organizations in New York.

A special joint meeting of New York Isaiah Lodge No. 1, Jordon Lodge No. 15 and Edward Everett Lodge No. 97 was held at District No. 1 Headquarters, 2307 Broadway, New York City, Thursday, April 1. Sixteen new members were initiated into the three lodges by a specially selected degree team, consisting of Bros. Myer L. Victorius, Harry A. Silberstein, Joseph Rosenzweig, Harry G. Goldman, Wm. Asher and Harry Sammet, members of the three lodges. After the initiation, which was declared by those present to have been one of the most impressive they had ever witnessed, addresses were delivered by Brother Rabbi Frisch of Mount Sinai No. 2, Brother William Klapp, president of Rehoboth No. 38, and chairman of the Intellectual Advancement Committee of the District, and Brother Rosenzweig of Jordon, Past District President. Brother Frisch was taken unawares, as he had come to the meeting as he said "to be with the boys and to sit with my legs crossed and have a smoke, which one can hardly do in the synagogue," but after yielding to the request for a speech he gave a most interesting and forceful discourse on the co-operation of the Order and the Synagogue.

The joint meeting was presided over by Bros. Harry F. Mela, president of New York Isaiah No. 1, Harry A. Silberstein, president of Jordon No. 15, and Judge Joseph Schwab, acting president of Edward Everett No. 97. After the closing of the three lodges, a collation was served.

Bro. William Klapp, chairman of the Intellectual Advancement Committee, is urging the lodges of District No. 1 to hold more joint meetings, as they promote mutual acquaintainceship and draw closer the fraternal bonds of the Order. He also reviewed the work of the General Committee and of some of its new undertakings.

St. Paul, Minn.

Minnesota Lodge is conducting an active membership campaign in a most enthusiastic manner. The members of the lodge have been divided into two teams, one known as the Red Army and the other as the Blue Army, each endeavoring to get the greatest number of applications. The losing team under the terms of the campaign is required to buy the winning team a dinner. Much interest has already been worked up and more than 50 applications have been secured. The lodge expects to secure a total of 150 new condidates before the end of the campaign.

The lodge is at the present time investigating ways and means to secure a club house.

St. Joseph, Mo.

The largest class that Joseph Lodge of St. Joseph has had in five years, consisting of 60 new members, was initiated at a meeting of the lodge on April 11.

Milwaukee, Wis.

Gilead Lodge No. 41 has had several very interesting meetings during the past few months.

Brother I. Kadis, superintendent of the Federated Jewish Charities, spoke on "Social Work—Our Job." Brother Robert Hess addressed the lodge on "My Experience as a Welfare Worker"; Past President H. D. Frankel on "Open Portals"; Brother Fisher on "My Visit to Europe After the War."

Several large classes have been initiated and contributions from the members to the loan fund have been constantly increasing. The attendance at the meetings has been very large. The Intellectual Advancement work has had the closest attention.

Oakland, Calif.

The lodge rooms of Oakland Lodge No. 252, I. O. B. B., were crowded to overflowing with an enthusiastic audience of live, active members of the B'nai B'rith to witness the second Kraus Honor Class of 105 candidates.

The Degree Team, headed by Sidney S. Kahn, exemplified the work in a most impressive manner.

The Oakland Lodge can well be proud of being able to boast of a degree team that the Lodge believes is second to none on the Pacific Coast.

Following the initiation, Lucius L. Solomons, First Vice-President of the Constitutional Grand Lodge, delivered an address that the members present cheered to the echo. The applause lasted for fully five minutes.

Following the address a most delightful banquet was served in the adjacent rooms and everyone present voted the evening as one of the most enjoyable that Oakland Lodge has ever held.

Oakland Lodge is starting a series of "get together" luncheons to be held at the local cafes, at which time a speaker of prominence will be invited to be present to address the gathering for a 15-minute talk. Present indications show that these luncheons will be the means of stimulating interest in the work of the Order.

At the opening luncheon next Friday, April 16, Judge George Samuels will address the meeting on the spirit of co-operation.

Stockton, Calif.

Another monthly paper has been added to the list of those edited by the lodges of the order. A little four page sheet bearing the title "Swaps" is being published monthly by Hope Lodge, No. 126, of Stockton, Cal. The paper which bears the caption "Boost with Jazz and Pep," also serves as the means of announcing B'nai B'rith meetings and entertainments to the members of the lodge. The lodge is at the present time fitting out its new club rooms for which a large fund has been subscribed. A whist tournament was recently announced by the lodge to be held on April 15, 1820. The error of the proofreader should not, however, be taken as indicative of the spirit of the lodge which, by the way, is one of the most progressive on the Pacific Coast.

Bridgeport, Conn.

Harmony Lodge, No. 711, I. O. B. B., held a meeting in their headquarters at 189 State street, April 11. Steps were taken to increase the membership, as well as the finances. A smoker will be held in the near future to stimulate interest in the welfare of the Order.

Creation of a charity fund for the benefit of worthy local organizations was undertaken, and Maximillian Stein was elected treasurer. The charity ball committee gave its final report and stated that the proceeds were distributed among charitable organizations in accordance with previous customs. This charity ball was given some time ago by the local order.

Dr. I. L. Bril, of the New York "Jewish Daily News", delivered a very interesting address on "B'nai B'rith as a Factor in Modern Jewish Fraternal Life."

At the next meeting it is expected that Honorable Henry Lasker, President, and Charles H. Shapiro, Past President of the District Grand Lodge, will be the guests of Harmony Lodge at a smoker, and Dr. Louis Smirnow, who has just completed a new work, "The Covenant and Other Poems", will give a reading.

New Haven, Conn.

Before an unusually large attendance, of members at a meeting of Horeb Lodge No. 25, of New Haven, Conn., held Sunday, April 11, 1920, Mr. Alexander Brin, editor of the Boston Jewish Advocate, delivered a strong address, pleading for the Jews to "Judaize". He declared that while the Jews of America in the last two years expended over $50,000,000 in philanthropies, little has been done by them to spread religious and moral education among the Jews.

In discussing the subject, "The Renaissance of the American Jew", the speaker asserted that the future existence and progress of the Jewish people depends on Jewish education, the source and foundation of all future Jewish life. He stated that self-preservation demands adequate facilities for the Jewish training of the young man of the future generation.

"The Jews in America", said Mr. Brin, "now have a two-fold task. They must not only Americanize, but they must also Judaize themselves". America says to the Jew, "If you wish to serve America best, remain a Jew to the best of your capacity". America asks the Jews to live Jewishly, and to live Jewishly is to be truth-seeking and truth-loving, right-serving and justice-pursuing.

Stamford, Conn

On March 31, 1920, William Klapp, Chairman of the Intellectual Advancement Committee, visited Jacob B. Ullman Lodge No. 685, which meets in the Hebrew Institute, Stamford, Conn. Brother Klapp addressed the meeting and dwelt on the necessity for full cooperation by the members in behalf of the loan fund to enable our suffering brethren in Europe to rehabilitate themselves. The Anti-Defamation League and Big Brother work were ably referred to. Reference was also made to the new Publicity Committee of which Dr. Blumenthal, Second Vice-President of the District, is Chairman. The meeting was presided over by Brother Max M. Wilk, President of the Lodge. The brethren expressed their thanks for the address and extended to the General Committee invitations to visit them in the future.

Hartford, Conn.

Ararat Lodge No. 13, I. O. B. B., of Hartford, held its annual spring Dansant at the Hartford Club on Saturday evening, April 17. Only members and friends recommended by them were invited. The affair was informal and dancing continued from 8 p.m. to 1 a.m. One of the best orchestras in the state was secured and the affair was declared to be the nicest ever given in this city by this organization.

San Francisco, Calif.

More than 400 strong, the "Kraus Honor Class" was initiated into the B'nai B'rith of San Francisco in Scottish Rite Hall, Van Ness avenue and Sutter street at the last meeting.

This class initiation, one of the lagest ever held by the B'nai B'rith in San Francisco, culminated an intensive membership drive which has been conducted in this city as a part of a nation wide B'nai B'rith campaign for new members in honor of the seventieth birthday of Brother Adolf Kraus, president of the Order.

An elaborate program was arranged for the occasion, which marked the induction of the "Kraus Honor Class" into the B'nai B'rith. Past Grand President Harry K. Wolff presided, and the principal speaker was Rabbi Jacob Nieto.

What Our Lodges Are Doing

Blytheville, Ark.

Menorah Lodge No. 832 was instituted on Sept. 1, 1918, with a small charter membership of twenty. At the time of its institution the lodge did not realize the important part it was destined to play in bringing together the Jews of southeastern Missouri and northeastern Arkansas.

As a result of hard work the lodge succeeded in interesting co-religionists from surrounding towns in the work of the lodge. The lodge held its meetings in various parts of the territory with the view of interesting Jews in those cities to affiliate with the lodge. At present it has a membership of 53.

Its B'nai B'rith Day Celebration, held on Dec. 31, 1919, was exceptionally well attended and much enjoyed. It was an occasion of three-fold purposes, namely, the observance of B'nai B'rith Day, the Celebration of Chanuka, and the observance of the first anniversary of the institution of the lodge. And yet it served to do still more, as it brought together the co-religionists of that territory into more cordial fellowship.

St. Joseph, Mo.

On Sunday, April 11, 1920, Joseph Lodge No. 73 of St. Joseph Missouri, initiated a class of forty candidates at a well-attended meeting of the lodge held at the Temple.

The degree team was composed of Brother Eugene Silverman, Louis Bernstein, Basil Kauffman and Louis Kranitz.

After the close of the meeting, dinner was served in the vestry rooms of the Temple by the sisterhood and the Hadasa Society. Following the supper, talks were made by the president of the lodge, Brother Kangisser, Nathan Bernstein, Louis Bernstein and others.

Musical as well as vocal numbers were rendered, which were very much appreciated.

Joseph Lodge will celebrate Mothers' Day on Sunday, May 9, at the Temple and during the month of May the lodge will give a dance for its members.

Dallas, Tex.

B'nai B'rith Day was observed by Dallas Lodge No. 197 on Feb. 15, 1920. Rabbi Dr. David Lefkowitz, of Dayton, Ohio, who accepted the Dallas pulpit, was the principal speaker for the occasion. The following was the order of exercises:

Fargo, N. D.

For the regular meeting, held April 11, 1920, John Hay Lodge was very fortunate in securing Dr. L. I. Rypins, of St. Paul.

In the afternoon a regular business meeting was held and a class initiated by the Degree Team, in which Dr. Rypins took part.

In the evening at 8 o'clock the annual memorial service, which was well attended by the members and ladies, was held. The addresss which Dr. Rypins delivered was very well received.

Okmulgee, Okla.

On Sunday, March 21, 1920, Okmulgee Lodge No. 859 was instituted with a charter membership of 25. Mr. Louis Cohen, of Ft. Smith, Ark., a member of the General Committee of District No. 7 represented the District Grand Lodge and had charge of the institution ceremonies.

The new membership showed much enthusiasm, and a campaign to increase the membership of the lodge from the surrounding towns was decided upon.

The lodge will hold regular meetings bi-monthly and will arrange for social affairs for the Jewish people of that section of the country.

The campaign for $12,000 for the relief of the war sufferers in Europe has also been inaugurated as the first activity of the new lodge.

Institution of B'nai B'rith Lodge at Pontiac, Mich.

Pontiac Lodge No. 850 of Pontiac, Mich., was instituted on March 7, 1920.

The degree team of Pisgah Lodge of Detroit, consisting of Brother M. M. Alexander, M. Garvett, C. Rosenthal, L. P. Goldsmith, S. D. Rosenzweig and the Pisgah Lodge Glee Club assisted in the initiation ceremonies.

The members and their ladies, numbering 60, boarded a special car chartered for the occasion to be present at the ceremonies. J. J. Gusfield of Chicago, Chairman of the Propaganda Committee, represented the District Grand Lodge on the occasion.

After the initiatory ceremonies were concluded, the election of officers was held and at the close of the regular order of business, a banquet followed at which more than 150 participated. Apppropriate speeches were made by all the visiting brethren and Grand Lodge officers.

S. D. Rosenzweig acted as toastmaster. During the dinner, the Glee Club sang several selections and other vocal numbers were rendered. Later in the evening dancing was indulged in until a late hour.

Bridgeport, Conn.

Harmony Lodge No. 711 of Bridgeport, Conn., held its second formal dance of the season at the Stratfield Hotel on Saturday evening, April 10, 1920, at which 300 persons were present.

The first dance, the Charity Ball, was given on February 5. Representatives from lodges of the Order from a number of nearby cities were present, including several officers of the Grand Lodge. The affair was successful in all respects.

New Haven, Conn.

Horeb Lodge "Pep" is a happy-go-lucky, full-of-punch, little paper which reaches the editorial desk monthly. The paper is responsible to a large extent for the great interest which is constantly being displayed in New Haven in B'nai B'rith activities. The original ideas which have fallen to its credit have been adopted on a wide scale throughout the district.

Nearly 300 new members joined Horeb Lodge during 1919. The lodge now has a membership of 900. The lodge may well be proud of the record which it has established both in membership and in enthusiasm. The President of the lodge, Joseph Koletsky, is serving his second consecutive term.

At its meeting on April 11, the lodge heard a most impressive address by Alex Brin, editor of the Jewish Advocate, who spoke on the "Leo Frank Case."

Jackson, Mich.

David Heuman Lodge No. 807 initiated one of the largest classes in its history at a meeting on March 21. Pisgah Lodge Degree Team officiated at the installation ceremonies. The Glee Club from the same lodge was highly lauded by an appreciative audience. The large Detroit delegation arrived in Jackson in a special chartered car and were the guests at an informal reception held in their honor. Brother Milton M. Alexander, who spoke at the banquet that followed the initiatory ceremonies, pointed out the function of the Order in the Jewish life of the country as the big force in bringing Jews back to the synagogue and to an observance of their religious ideals. Brother Alexander said:

"Steeped in the mire of world-old Ghettos, the Jew retained his Jewish spirit, clean, pure and undefiled. Locked in his earthly dungeon, the Jew retained his Jewish mind—keen, alert, intellectual. Fettered to the burning stake, fanned by the flames of the kindling faggot, the Jew retained his Jewish spirit—devout, determined and optimistic.

"Who will deny that in free America the Jew has lost something of the purity of his heart, something of the intellectuality of his mind, something of the optimism of his spirit.

"The B'nai B'rith is a big dominant force that is destined to redeem the Jew. Founded to reclaim the Jew to humanity, the B'nai B'rith will live to reclaim the Jew to himself.

"More important than orphan asylums and hospitals—more important than educational leagues and social service activities—is the work of the B'nai B'rith in welding together all the forces of Judaism in America. The B'nai B'rith is the spokeman of the Jews of the world. As such it must ever be the spokesman of humanity."

Spokane, Wash.

Abr. Geiger Lodge is conducting an intensive membership campaign for the "Kraus Honor Class." It has placed as its objective 150 new members, a goodly number of whom have already been initiated at a special meeting on March 30.

Portland, Ore.

Portland Lodge No. 65 held a memorial service at its regular meeting on April 6. A stirring memorial address was delivered by Brother Charles Rubins. The religious service was conducted by Rabbi A. Rosencrantz and Rabbi R. Abrahamson. Seventy candidates were initiated at the same meeting. The lodge room was crowded to capacity. The degree team was the recipient of a great deal of commendation for the dignity and impressiveness of its work.

The Lodge passed a resolution submitted by the Committee on Educational Co-operation for the help of indigent students and co-operation with Menorah groups.

San Antonio Tex.

In the February issue of the B'nai B'rith News it was stated that the principal speaker at the meeting of Edar Lodge No. 211 on Jan. 19 was Brother L. N. Lee. Brother Leo advises us that this was an error and that the principal speaker of the evening was Major Sylvan Lang, a member of Edar Lodge who spoke on "Judaism and the B'nai B'rith." Brother Lee took as his theme "Is the B'nai B'rith a Mere Charity Society?"

Cleveland, Ohio

Reports of the B'nai B'rith activities in Cleveland are indicative of the wide scope of work done by the Order in that city. Dramatic reading circles, bowling clubs, chess clubs, a French circle, a speakers' club, oratorical contests, civic forums and various educational classes—all conducted under the auspices of the B'nai B'rith in that city, are constantly providing interesting work for the members of the lodge. In addition, the lodge has been giving a series of dances at the B'nai B'rith Building, which have met with great success.

The lodge held a community Seder on April 2 which was largely attended. In addition to the members, a number of young men rooming in the city and who had no opportunity of attending a Seder were made welcome and participated in the festive spirit which characterized the services conducted by Rabbi Wolsey. All those present joined in singing the traditional melodies. An excellent rendition of Hebrew songs was given during the evening.

Detroit, Mich.

Pisgah Lodge No. 34 held its first community Seder in its lodge rooms on the first day of Passover. The Seder was arranged for those members and their families who preferred to attend a community service instead of holding the ceremonies in their own homes and for their friends without home affiliations in the city who otherwise might have been denied the privilege of participating in the traditional services. The Seder Committee under the chairmanship of Lester J. Leopold spared no efforts in making the beautiful services conform faithfully to all traditional laws and at the same time to make it acceptable both to the orthodox and liberal groups. The ceremonies were conducted by Rabbi Lapin-Cohn.

The lodge held its monthly informal dance on April 4. Some unusual features of entertainment were provided and everybody present conceded the "Spring party" to have been the most enjoyable thus far held.

Pisgah Lodge's membership campaign is progressing steadily. If the same progress is maintained as has been thus far exhibited, the aim of the membership committee to make Pisgah Lodge the largest in the order may well be realized.

A committee, of which Brother Milton M. Alexander is chairman, has been appointed to consider the advisability of establishing the custom of giving an annual testimonial to that citizen of Detroit who during the year has best served humanity. The honor is to be bestowed for the most noteworthy achievement recorded in the field of civic betterment. The testimonial, in all probability, will take the form of a gold medal to be presented with appropriate ceremonies.

Toledo, Ohio

Toledo Lodge has been having some unusually interesting programs.

At its first March meeting, Professor Bushnell of Toledo University, gave a very instructive talk on "The History of Industry". Charts showing different stages in history made the talk more illuminating.

A Boy Scout drill was the feature of the second March meeting. Judge Aaron B. Cohn gave a talk on the work of the Boy Scouts. Members of Toledo Lodge agreed to take a more active interest in the work of the Jewish Scout Troop, which is housed in a log cabin adjoining the Jewish Educational League Building, in which Toledo Lodge holds its meetings.

President Kraus' Message

To the Constitution Grand Lodge of the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith in Convention Assembled:

Before proceeding to the main business of my message, which must largely concern the war, its effect upon the Jews, and in part, too, the peace and its influence on the people of our faith, I may be pardoned, perhaps, if I indulge a reminiscence.

In August, 1905, M. de Witte, former premier of Russia, to whom Baron Rosen alludes in his recent memoirs as the one diplomat whose astuteness could have averted the war, was the principal plenipotentiary whom Russia sent to Portsmouth, N. H., to agree on peace terms with Japan. A committee, of which I was one, met M. de Witte by appointment to appeal through him to the Russian government to grant its Jewish subjects human rights.

The diplomat, upon whom the Czar later conferred the title of Count and elevated to his post as Premier in reward of his services, was courteous, even cordial, but gave us very little encouragement. He declared only the Czar could help the Jews and conditions were such that, even so, many years must elapse before full relief could be obtained.

Whereupon, one of our members said: ''If the Czar will not grant his people the liberties they are entitled to, a revolution may establish a republic through which those rights will be attained''.

''Of course'', responded M. de Witte, ''such a thing may happen, but not for a hundred years at least. The Romanoffs will rule for another century''.

Yet less than fifteen years have elapsed and the Czar is dead; his consort and his heir likewise have been killed, while others of the House of Romanoff are fugitives or captives in the hands of the proletarians: contending peoples of Russia rule, notwithstanding opinions differ as to whether for good or evil.

I know of no way better to illustrate the transformation in the world's affairs which has occurred since we last met—the utter unpreparedness of all of us for the cataclysm. Empires have crumbled; millions of lives have been sacrificed; disease and starvation have exacted tribute beyond our power to comprehend. Science has been made the instrument of murder; at no point to the last degree of barbarity has civilized man paused in the attempted attainment of his ends; and from the resultant chaos, which is still incompletely dispersed, new nations have sprung, new rulers risen, new theories of government have been evolved, new liberties decreed, old liberties restored—to what end, no man may say.

If we accept as established, though the theologian's principle, that in the quest of the spiritual goal to which humanity at large aspires, no backward step is ever taken—that all change is progress—then we must reconcile ourselves to the disaster which seemingly has overtaken the world. I believe the proposition is sound: that out of evil good will come.

Consider, if you will, the annals of the war, replete with sacrific of one human life for another—the highest altruism, I believe, the human heart is capable of expressing. Shall we then say the ennobling effect of such deeds is lost, that the bond, in which the proximity of death links men, will be sundered at once their peril is at an end? I think not.

But there is, too, a more general manifestation of the change through which the consciousness of all the race is passing: publicists and men of business and industrial affairs denominate the phenomena ''unrest''. Yet it seems to me that this is in it something finer than they express by a term that has come to imply the mere seeking selfishly of more money and more influence. It seems to me that there is in it the germ of a new and more democratic order of society, in which educational and cultural opportunities will be more nearly equal, and with the maturity of which will come a broader intelligence, and following this a new tolerance in thought and a greater nobility of purpose. For I perceive that as those who dwell in society's lower strata seek the higher and better planes of life, there is a tendency by those who dwell above them to recognize their right to their aspirations; and notwithstanding the millenium does not appear, a trend toward greater economic and social justice is established.

Our organization was dedicated to such an end—to the assistance of those less fortunate than ourselves, to the purposes of charity and to the realization in fact, as well as in principle, that there exists a brotherhood of man.

The Order's Work in the World War

Two major tasks were imposed upon us—I refer especially now to our organization in America—by the world conflict: to care for our own, who three years after Europe embarked on war, were drawn into its maelstrom; to succor others, separated from us by national allegiances but united to us in a common religious faith and racial tradition.

Upon our lodges abroad, a similar duty was imposed, though the exigencies of war curtailed their efforts largely to the countries in which they were established. Those efforts I intend, in due course, to review. But it is not premature, I believe, at this time to record that, notwithstanding the greater rigors they experienced, our members abroad were faithful in the fullest measure to their charitable trust, as well as to their obligations of loyalty and good citizenship in their several States. It is gratifying, furthermore, that the latter should be true, because, no matter how much our personal political convictions may have differed, the patriotism of our European lodges must stand as a memorial to the high respect in which these constituents held their obligations of loyalty. Even in Roumania, which seized upon the conflict as an excuse to redouble its affliction of the Jews, our Order remained loyal. The attributes of character so disclosed merit unstinted praise, and I am glad to be able to express our sincere acknowledgment and appreciation.

The American Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare League of the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith

You prefer, I am sure, that I relate first what our Order, in the country of its birth, did in behalf of those whom the United States called to its service, for among them were a number of our brethren who paid the highest price of citizenship.

War found America largely unprepared, despite the warning that had been spoken for months from across the sea; and philanthropic organizations were no better fortified for the emergency than was the nation in a military and naval sense. After mobilization had begun, however, several affiliations of Jews joined in creating the Jewish Welfare Board, to the end that soldiers and sailors, especially those of Jewish faith, at camps, cantonments and naval bases might have some measure of paternal care; but until July 29th and 30th, 1917, when our Executive Committee met in Chicago, the activities of the Board had a very limited scope.

It had become apparent, in the committee's opinion, that while the military discipline within the camps would serve to keep the men within proper bounds, guidance of them elsewhere would be necessary, and to furnish such guidance was to perform a patriotic as well as a social duty. It was therefore decided to raise the necessary funds to establish clubs in cities near military reservations, in which soldiers on leave of absence could gather to be properly entertained, surrounded by influences akin to those at home. And so the American Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare League of the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith was founded.

A Managing Board of influential members of the Order, residents of various cities, was named. Soon thereafter commodious halls were rented and furnished as club rooms in nine cities; local committees acted as hosts and hostesses until paid workers could be put in charge, and within ten days after the opening of each of the club rooms soldiers of adjoining camps began to enjoy every facility that such an establishment could be made to provide.

In some of them lodgings were available, and they were used, too, as a place of meeting for soldiers and their visiting relatives. The Order's representatives in charge further arranged for the invitation of the men in uniform to private homes for meals and entertainment; in a remarkably short time the success of our work, so far as it had gone, was assured. This was not confined to Jewish soldiers; all who wished to come were welcome. Coincidently, the lodges were requested to establish soldier welfare committees, to ascertain the names of men called to the colors, to keep in touch with them, to look into the condition of their families, and if necessary to render them assistance.

In several cities, the wives and daughters of our members formed knitting clubs which sent hundreds of sweaters and socks to our club rooms for distribution. That this distribution was made regardless of race or creed is illustrated by the receipt by the makers of many letters of appreciation from non-Jewish soldiers which resulted from the practice of attaching the maker's name to each knitted article.

Numerous communications from Jewish as well as Gentile soldiers and from visitors at the club rooms were also received by us praising our work, in particular, one from the War Department, signed by Raymoud B. Fosdick, Esq., Chairman of the Commission on Training Activities, who wrote:

> ''Dear Mr. Kraus:
> Your activity at Rockford, which has already been brought to our attention, is a very creditable piece of work, and it is to be sincerely hoped that you will continue it and extend it.''

The government, however, had meanwhile recognized the Y. M. C. A., the Knights of Columbus and the Jewish Welfare Board as welfare organizations in the camps. Our workers had established a custom of visiting adjacent cantonments to invite Jewish soldiers to entertainments. It seemed proper that they should; but when, a few weeks after our clubs were started, workers from the Jewish Welfare Board arrived at the same camps, or some of them, disputes arose and we were notified that the government had recognized the three organizations named and would recognize no other. We, therefore, instructed our workers to confine their efforts to our club rooms.

The Masonic Fraternity next subjected the War Department to severe criticism for having recognized the Knights of Columbus, a Catholic body, and withholding recognition of all other fraternities. Other fraternal societies protested also.

In that movement we took no part, for we believed that if ever there was a time when all our people should act in concert it surely must be when our country was at war. We were willing, furthermore, to co-operate with the Welfare Board to that end, and so when the Chairman of the Welfare Board came to Chicago I had a lengthy conference with him, from which resulted an understanding to merge our efforts, subject to the approval of our respective organizations. It was agreed that all money collected by us should be turned over to the Treasurer of the Jewish Welfare Board; that we should name three members of the Administrative Committee of the Welfare Board; that the rules adopted by the Welfare Board should apply to our clubs, but that our clubs should remain under our exclusive control and management. The merger as outlined was not carried out.

I received an invitation from Mr. Baker, Secretary of War, requesting me to meet him in Washington, October 29th, prepared to confer with the heads of other fraternal organizations.

I attended the conference and in his office met the heads of all national fraternal organizations, including the Knights of Columbus. The discussion lasted several hours, with Mr. Baker presiding, save for a few minutes when Mr. Fosdick took his place. Since a large majority of the people of America were there represented, Mr. Baker seemed to be very desirous of granting their representatives anything within reason. His final ruling was that the workers of all fraternal organizations should have the same rights to visit the camps as the workers of the three organizations already recognized; that they should be permitted to put buildings in camps and cantonments, provided room existed, but that initiation of new members in the camps would not be permitted. Mr. Baker advised those present, however, not to erect unnecessary buildings, but rather to look after the welfare of their members in nearby cities. He kindly commended our activities at Rockford.

In that connection, it is proper to state that the lodges by an overwhelming vote adopted a law to assess each member in the United States $1.00 a year to help maintain the work, and that while all the Districts tried to do their duty, the enthusiastic and energetic efforts of Districts No. 2 and 6 deserve special mention.

In January, 1918, Colonel Cutler, Chairman of the Jewish Welfare Board, was in Chicago. We met, and after extended consultation again came to an understanding substantially identical with the first. It was agreed that I should write him a letter embodying the proposed agreement, and therefore, on January 29th, I addressed him in part as follows:

> “We were willing to merge our activities in Soldiers' Welfare Work with those of the Jewish Board for Welfare Work, but were at no time, nor are we now, willing to merge the organizations.
> “Regardless of who is to blame for the failure of previous efforts, the fact remains that considerable ill-feeling has been aroused in certain quarters; that it seems to be spreading, and if not checked may result in a conflict which will seriously affect the best interest of American Jewry. An earnest effort should be made to avoid future friction.
> “It is somewhat difficult to understand why there should be any conflict between the two organizations working separately. The work of your organization is inside of camps, ours is outside. The work we have undertaken, we are in a position to carry on to the end and to finance it. We ask for no concessions nor do we need any.
> “That the work we are doing is helpful is proven by the fact that the War Department has approved it and has asked us to extend it, and that citizens, regardless of creed, in localities where our clubs have been established, approve of it.
> “Having, however, fully considered the situation and all you have said, we are ready, in order to avoid friction and possible animosities, to accept the following as an agreement . . .”

Briefly stated, the agreement provided that we would not undertake separate collections, but would join the Jewish Board of Welfare Work in its efforts to obtain funds; that we would turn over to it all money received from assessments and subscriptions—a sum in our opinion sufficient to maintain our clubs, that our clubs should be known and designated as the B'nai B'rith Branch of the Jewish Board for Welfare Work and should be controlled by the B'nai B'rith and not be abandoned during the war, or as long as there were sufficient soldiers in the camps or cantonments nearby to justify their maintenance. The Jewish Board for Welfare Work agreed to defray all the expenses of the clubs and both organizations pledged their best efforts to make the work inside, as well as outside, the camps a success.

The agreement was adopted by the Welfare Board and approved by the General Committees of the American Districts and went into force April 1, 1918. It is proper to report that both organizations carried out that agreement.

The Order's Efforts in Behalf of Our Afflicted Co-Religionists Abroad

In order to inform you of our organization's war work in behalf of Jews in foreign lands, it is necessary to revert to 1914, when, shortly after hostilities in Europe were begun, I wrote to Congressman Sabath, a member of my lodge, to ascertain whether President Wilson would be willing to appeal to the powers at the Peace Conference in an effort to obtain for our co-religionists full liberties everywhere. In response the President informed me, through the Congressman, that he would be glad to do whatever he could. Similar appeals were made to governments abroad by representatives of our Order there.

From the reports of our leading members in Europe it appeared that the British and French governments favored a Jewish policy in conformity with that incorporated in the treaty of Berlin. But we recalled that that treaty had become, in Roumania at least, a nullity—through antagonistic internal legislation and the restrictive judicial interpretations of government functionaries, whose adroitness when exercised to afflict the Jews, had never failed. Wherefore, I could not doubt that unless a tribunal was created with power to enforce like terms in the treaty of Paris—if Roumania, for example, should refuse to enforce it—the Jews would attempt in vain to avail themselves of the covenant's protection.

So, when the peace delegates were preparing for their pilgrimage to Paris, I sent to President Wilson the following letter:

> “Chicago, Nov. 14, 1918.
> “Mr. President:
> “The Independent Order of B'nai Brith, of which I am the chief executive, is an international Jewish fraternal organization of more than seventy-five years' standing, with branches in almost all countries of Europe, Asia Minor and Egypt.
> “While the war was in progress, I received resuests from leading Jews of those countries to appeal, when hostilities should cease and the Peace Conference meet, to you, who have taken such a broad and humane view of the European situation, not only to aid in obtaining for the small nations the right of self-government, but also to secure for all inhabitants of those lands equal rights, regardless of their religious belief, and, should a tribunal of nations be established, power to enforce those rights for that tribunal.
> “I have hesitated, Mr. President, to submit such an appeal to you, because I felt sure that you would on your own initiative insist that justice be done to all peoples. My apology for addressing you at this time, when so many important subjects are requiring your attention, is that I owe it as a duty to those for whom I speak. I am confident that it is unnecessary for me to submit facts showing how essential it is for the future safety and happiness of my co-religionists that the allied powers consider their situation.
> “You have been so wonderfully well informed of the European situation that I believe there is nothing I can say which will furnish you additional information. However, if you desire, I shall be glad to come to Washington and give such information as I possess.
> “I have the honor to be
> “Yours most respectfully,
>
> “Adolf Kraus.
> “To Hon. Woodrow Wilson,
> President of the United States”.

I mailed a copy of this letter to Brother Wolf, who, upon its receipt, wrote to the President as follows:

> “November 16, 1918.
> “My dear Mr. President:
> “In this hour when every moment of your time is engrossed with problems of world magnitude, it behooves every one to abstain from bringing ordinary subjects to your attention; but in this instance my information is in direct line with matters with which you will have to deal.
> “The Independent Order of B'nai B'rith is an organization having, as you no doubt know, branches in all parts of the world. During the time that we have been engaged in the war, international relations, as far as Germany, Austria and Turkey were concerned, naturally were suspended. Now that peace is within sight, it becomes a matter of the most serious concern, not only of how the physical conditions of our brethren abroad are to be helped, but also as to what civil and religious rights are to be accorded to citizens of Jewish faith in countries which have heretofore restricted those privileges.
> “My dear Mr. President, do not forget that, while Russia in her days of arrogance was a constant source of persecution, Rumania and Poland were even worse in afflicting the Jews, and today, notwithstanding your trumpet call, and notwithstanding all that is in prospect for the welfare of the respective peoples, the persecution of the Jew continues.
> “It will be a very difficult problem to handle, not only on account of geographical and racial conditions, but on account of religious prejudice that has been handed down from father to son. Thus you may weld together certain nationalities, but the other problem will remain unsolved.
> “It is, therefore, my judgment that the President of the Order of B'nai B'rith should have a conference with you on these matters which affect the whole situation and which are of vital importance to the welfare and the future of the people who are allied in this organization.
>
> “Very sincerely yours,
> “Simon Wolf”.

The following was the President's reply:

> “My dear Mr. Kraus:
> “There was certainly no need to apologize for your interesting letter of the 14th of November, which was, I am sorry to say, delayed in reaching me because it was sent to the wrong department.
> “I appreciate very fully the grave matter to which the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith directed you to call my attention, and I beg to assure you that it will be very much in my mind during the conference on the other side of the water.
> “Cordially and sincerely yours,
> “Woodrow Wilson”.

Brother Wolf wired me that he received the following from the President:

> “I have read your letter of November 16th with the greatest attention and you may be sure that its subject matter has engaged and is engaging my most serious and anxious attention.”

The President accepted Brother Wolf's suggestion for a conference and Brother Wolf thereupon wired me that the afternoon of Thanksgiving Day, 1918, had been set for that purpose. A committee consisting of Brother Wolf, Henry Morgenthau, Secretary A. B. Seelenfreund and myself appeared at the White House, representing the Executive Committee of the Order and presented to the President the gold medal which the Executive Committee had previously voted him.

We were cordially received. I read an address which I had prepared, in response to which the President said:

> “I cannot extemporaneously reply adequately to the very beautiful address you have just read, sir, but I can reply with great feeling, and with the most genuine gratitude to the Order for the distinguished honor they have paid me.
> “I am sometimes embarrassed by occasions of this sort, because I know the great tasks that lie ahead of us. The past is secure, but the future is doubtful, and there are so many questions intimately associated with justice that are to be solved at the peace table and by the commissions which no doubt will be arranged for at the peace table, that I feel in one sense as if our work of justice had just begun. I realize that, for one thing, one of the most difficult problems will be to secure the proper guarantees for the just treatment of the Jewish people in the countries where they have not been justly dealt with, and unhappily there are several countries of which that may be said.
> “And the embarrassment in that connection is this. It is one thing to give a people its right of self-determination, but it is another to enter into its internal affairs and get satisfactory guarantees of the use it will make of its independence and its power, because that, in a way, involves a kind of supervision which is hateful to the people concerned and difficult to those who undertake it.
> “But I do not care to dwell on the difficulties. I would rather dwell upon the purpose that we all have at heart to see that the nearest possible approach is made to a proper solution of questions of this sort, and I think that this will be evident to everybody who is dealing with the affairs of the world at this time; that if we truly intend peace we must truly intend contentment, because there cannot be any peace with disturbed spirits. There cannot be any peace with a constantly recurring sense of injustice. And, therefore, we have this challenge to put to the peoples who will be concerned with the settlement. Do you, or do you not, truly desire permanent peace, and are you ready to pay the price—the only price—which will secure it? It will be awkward for them to answer that question except in the affirmative, and impossible for them to answer it genuinely in the affirmative unless they intend that every race shall have justice. So that I think the probability is that the more plainly we speak—I do not mean the more harshly—but the more plainly and candidly we speak, the more probable it will be that we shall arrive at just settlement. And in the attempt that I shall personally make, I shall be very much encouraged by kindly acts such as your Order, as represented by you, performed today, and I hope that you will convey to your associates my very deep sense of the honor and distinction they have conferred upon me. Thank you, very much indeed.”

We deemed the President's remarks of so great importance that we asked whether we might not have a stenographic report of them. The President assented. A discussion of European Jewish affairs ensued. The day after my return home, I received the report of the President's remarks with the following communication:

> “The White House,
> “Washington, D. C.,
> “November 29, 1918.
> “My dear Mr. Kraus:
> “At the request of the President, I am enclosing herewith a copy of his remarks to the representatives of the B'nai B'rith on the occasion of their meeting with him yesterday.
> Sincerely yours,
>
> “Gilbert F. Close,
> “Confidential Secretary.”

The next week the President departed for Paris. The results of the Peace Conference have been published and require only a brief review. The treaty with Poland ordains equal rights for all without distinction as to race, language or religion; nor may the freedom of the press be abridged, nor the right of public assemblage be forbidden. Notwithstanding the establishment of an official language by the Polish government, adequate facilities must be given all nationals of non-Polish speech for the use of their tongue, either orally or in writing, or before the Courts.

A Jew may not be compelled to perform an act which violates the Sabbath, nor shall he be penalized for refusal to attend Courts or to perform legal business on that day. Likewise, no election, general or local, may be held on Saturday, nor registration for electoral or other purposes be required.

In transmitting to Mr. Paderewski the terms of the Treaty, Mr. Clemenceau wrote in part as follows:

> "Clauses 10 and 12 deal specifically with the Jewish citizens of Poland. The information at the disposal of the principal Allied and Associated Powers as to existing relations between the Jews and the other Polish citizens has led them to the conclusion that, in view of the historical development of the Jewish question and the great animosity aroused by it, special protection is necessary for the Jews in Poland. The clauses have been limited to the minimum which seems necessary under the circumstances of the present day, viz., the maintenance of the Jewish schools and the protection of the Jews in their religious observance of their Sabbath. It is believed that these stipulations will not create any obstacle to the political unity of Poland."

Echo of Polish Pogroms

Not all of our Order's war-time efforts to better the condition of our co-religionists abroad were exclusively ours; when the opportunity presented itself we joined with other Jewish organizations in promoting the common welfare. Of these activities I presently shall speak. But there remains another matter, which I desire first to discuss—the differences which arose between Americans of Jewish and Polish origin concerning the reports of pogroms.

Coincident with press dispatches describing outrages against the Jews in countries whose claims to independence were to be heard at the Paris Peace Table, the following cablegram came to me from our lodge in Salonica:

> "Deeply exasperated and afflicted by the massacre and pillage of which our brethren in Poland and Galicia have been the victims during the recent days, all the members of our Lodge protest most energetically against these odious crimes and request your action on behalf of the Universal Judaism with the governments of the Entente, which have undertaken to secure everywhere the triumph of right and justice, so that they may take adequate measures to prevent any renewal of anti-Jewish troubles, and efficiently protect the lives and the honor of our co-religionists.
> "DAVID MATALON,
> "President."

Confirmation had been given to Mr. Matalon's representations by the London Times, whose correspondent, sent to Poland to investigate reported pogroms, had wired his newspaper under date of October 9, 1918, that assaults upon Jews had been made by both Polish military and civil authorities, while later dispatches reporting pogroms of varied gravity in many towns and villages had resulted in inquiries of the British Foreign Office by members of Parliament.

Such stories, pursuing each other with rapidity, served in America to arouse great excitement among Jews generally as well as Gentiles of Polish extraction. Tens of thousands of Jews—immigrants from Poland—most of whom had relatives there, believed those dear to them either had been killed or were in danger of massacre, and in their utter helplessness, cried out for aid by parading the streets and holding mass meetings.

The first of the public assemblages took place in New York City. Judged by the large audience and the high official and social position of the speakers, it was a pronounced success. Resolutions were cabled to the representatives of the Powers in Paris, appealing for the protection of the Polish Jews. Whereupon similar demonstrations followed in other cities.

There appeared no reason for the Jews to doubt the stories of the pogroms published in the daily press. But after the New York meeting, when M. Paderewski, tho Polish Premier, denied their truth, it was natural that among the Poles here he should receive credence. A result was that their leader. Mr. Smulski, cabled to President Wilson that the reports of the pogroms were fabrications.

In Chicago, a committee of about fifty, representing all classes of Jewry, was formed, of which I was selected chairman. It was proposed to arouse in every city public sentiment against the excesses of Polish mobs and soldiers; but I knew the acting Secretary of State had cabled the American Minister at Warsaw to render a report of the violence, and I advocated that nothing be done until that report had been received. For if the minister should confirm the press dispatches we could rely on the sympathy of the American public; whereas, if he should assert that no pogroms had taken place, or that the atrocities were very much exaggerated, it would place us in an awkward position. After a lengthy discussion, the policy I proposed was accepted by the entire committee.

In the meantime, the American Poles were not idle. They held meetings and denounced the Jewish fellow citizens in unmeasured terms. They claimed we invented the press dispatches; were hired with German money to do so, in order to destroy Poland's independence; they declared boycotts, and in some places prepared for physical encounters.

A Polish priest in Fall River, Mass., even published a statement that a Jew of that city had taken prisoner a Christian boy and slit his tongue so as to have Christian blood for Passover, while a Chicago Polish newspaper printed a cartoon, the first portion of which depicted three Jews knocking at the door of a house asking for admission and protection. A female figure, emblematic of Poland, held the portal wide. The next picture showed the Jews within the house; having entered, they had attacked the female figure and were beating it.

I have selected the following editorial from the "Polish Daily Zgoda" of May 17, 1919, as one of the mildest of its kind published:

> "What are the Jews allowing themselves to do? They are beginning to cause alarm. They are purposely raising an alarm to lead the American people to understand that they are unfortunate and always persecuted. It will not take long before America, however, will realize the truth and will open her eyes as to what the Jews, who are permeated with Bolshevism and Anarchism, are driving at.
> "On the other hand, the Jews already are taking hold of industry and trades. At this day there are many industries and trades which are solely in the Jewish hands, and yet they are always kicking that they are being so much persecuted and abused. When at last the American people will lose their patience, at that time no alarm will help, and it will then be woe unto them".

Then came the report of our Minister to Poland which, while confirming the killing of a number of Jews in two cities, indicated that exaggeration of the atrocities had occurred. An aftermath of that report—which did not pretend to be based on a complete survey of the evidence—was the mission of investigation, headed by Mr. Henry Morgenthau.

Mr. Smulski, Polish leader, before leaving for Europe, kindly called at my office. We both agreed the quarrel between Jews and Poles in America must stop. He told me that all Polish priests would be requested the following Sunday to preach against further agitation and that the Polish press would be asked to cease its attacks. I promised on my part to use whatever influence we possessed to prevent further mass meetings.

In this connection, the statement made by Hon. Henry Morgenthau, who was appointed by President Wilson Chairman of the Commission to Investigate Conditions in Poland, is interesting. He said:

> "We found that not as many murders had been committed in Poland as the Jews had unfortunately proclaimed, but the sight of many dead bodies and hundreds of others being shipped away in cars was a justification of the feeling that all those who were deported had been killed. But the economic boycott is absolutely as fearful as it had been painted. While among the Turks, I saw how they sent the Armenians out into the deserts with released criminals and had the latter kill them on the way. The Poles have a more refined, if you will, method. They thought they could strangulate the Jews by not dealing with them. Jewish railroad and government employees were discharged. No officers in the army could be Jews. In designating the professors for four universities they were organizing, they had not a single Jew in the list. They impressed Jews into service regardless of age and made them do the hardest kind of work, and the old bearded Jews were afraid to go out alone in the dark, for fear that their beards would be torn or cut from their faces.
> "The conditions in Poland are indescribable and cannot be appreciated unless actually seen. In Vilna, a witness testified that he was tied to a horse and had to run five or six kilometers around the city at a pace set by a soldier who was mounted on the animal".

Ukraine Horrors

It was left to the hyenas in human form, most of them in soldier's uniform, to outdo the murderers of other countries. Jews by the tens of thousands, men, women and children, were tortured and murdered without cause, solely to satiate the appetite of the murderers for blood.

Your Executive Committee, which met in Chicago on November 16, 17 and 18, 1919, directed me to appoint a committee to appeal to the Secretary of State for such assistance and protection as in the circumstances our country could give.

On November 20th, I sent to the Secretary of State the following letter:

> "November 20, 1919.
> "To the Honorable Robert Lansing, Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.
> "Sir: I have the honor to address you in regard to the action taken at a meeting of the Executive Committee of the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith, held in Chicago this week, at which numerous petitions were presented by lodges of the Order and by individuals calling attention to apparently authenticated press reports regarding excesses and pogroms practised against Jews in various parts of the territory of what was formerly the Russian Empire and particularly in that part now known as the Republic of Ukraine and requesting steps to secure sympathetic action of our government with a view to preventing a repetition of these outrages.
> "The Executive Committee is well aware of the earnest efforts made by the President of the United States and yourself to ameliorate the condition of all oppressed peoples, and we are especially cognizant of his and your untiring efforts to relieve and protect as far as possible the Jewish people in certain parts of Europe from the suffering which they have been made to endure.
> "In view of these recent outrages, however, the Executive Committee feels that it is its duty to lay before the State Department such information as has come to its knowledge, so that this government may have a definite basis for protest and action. To this end, therefore, the Executive Committee has deemed it wise to appoint a committee of three, of which the Honorable Simon Wolf is chairman, to call on you at the earliest possible moment and lay the matter before you in person.
> "Permit me, therefore, on behalf of the Order, as well as on behalf of all American citizens of the Jewish faith, to bespeak for this committee and its cause your earnest consideration and sympathetic action. With renewed expressions of respect and esteem, I have the honor to be,
> "Most respectfully yours,
> "ADOLF KRAUS,
> "President".

On November 28th, our Committee, consisting of Brothers Simon Wolf, Dr. Abram Simon and Sol. Herzog, President of District No. 5, called on Secretary Lansing and had an interview with him. His answer was that the Government was doing everything it could, but, unfortunately, had no means of enforcing anything, as it has no representation in the Ukraine; that the situation is almost helpless, for there is no responsible government with whom this country can reason; that our Government sympathizes with the distress existing there; that when the time comes to recognize whatever government may exist, there will be a decided movement for the proper protection of all peoples and the righting of wrongs that have been done, so far as that is possible.

On December 10th following, a large committee of representative Jews of the American Jewish Congress called on Secretary Lansing for a like purpose. They submitted the cause of our poor co-religionists in an able manner. The Secretary of State answered them substantially the same way as he answered our committee.

It seems that all that can be done is to wait until a stable government is established in that country. It is safe to presume that when that is done, the Government of this country, as well as those of the leading powers of Europe, will do all that can be done to protect our people.

Review of Our Co-operation with Other Organizations

The war work of the Order, where it touched other associations of Jews, divides itself into two principal fields: our efforts at the Peace Conference, where through our representative we co-operated with other Jewish organizations, and our previous attempts to induce American Jewry to direct its endeavors in behalf of equal rights for all our people into a single channel.

The latter undertaking originated in August, 1918, after the Provisional Executive Committee for General Zionistic Affairs, with which Mr. Louis D. Brandeis, since appointed Justice of the United States Supreme Court, was identified, had associated with several other organizations of Jews in a Jewish Congress Organization Committee for the purpose of being instrumental in obtaining justice for our co-religionists in every land.

In opposition to a Congress, the American Jewish Committee advocated a Conference between the different organizations, and opinion as to the proper course seemed to be nearly evenly divided. Each Committee sent us an invitation to name delegates to its proposed meeting, but the struggle between the factions for a mode of procedure—or supremacy, for that was its virtual significance—if persisted in, could by no chance have had a beneficial effort on our common cause.

On behalf of the Executive Committee, under date of August 10th, I therefore addressed to the Jewish Congress Organization Board and the American Jewish Committee, a letter which was intended to avert, if possible, a breach. I said:

> "Our Executive Committee is of the opinion that a large gathering of one hundred and fifty or more, whether it be styled a conference or a congress, is inadvisable and liable to do more harm than good. Our Committee is further of the opinion that at the proposed meeting only one subject should be considered, and that is: What measures are to be taken to secure for our people in certain countries the same measure of liberty and equality as is enjoyed by other inhabitants,
> "We also feel that the most earnest endeavors should be made to prevent the Jews of this land, who desire to aid such cause, from working at cross-purposes. If our persecuted brethren are to obtain relief through our efforts here, such relief must come in a diplomatic way. Diplomacy as a rule does not work through the medium of town meetings".

I concluded my letter with the suggestion that the presidents of Jewish organizations convene, and in private council seek to formulate a program in pursuance of which all interested parties might take concerted action.

In response, Mr. Brandeis said:

> "We are glad to find in your proposal substantial agreement with that portion of my proposition made to Cyrus Adler on July 12th, and subsequently referred to in my letter of July 28th, that concerted action on the part of the Jews of this country can be effected only through an understanding reached upon consultation of representatives of those national organizations which actually bring about a better understanding among all concerned by thus adopting American democratic methods of proceeding in the conduct of Jewish affairs, and I trust you will succeed in securing the assent also of the American Jewish Committee to so reasonable a proposal".

On August 29th Dr. Adler, in behalf of the American Jewish Committee, wrote:

> "I so fully recognize your strong desire to bring about mutual co-operation at this time—the purpose for which the American Jewish Committee was founded—that although our preparations have gone very far and we have sent our invitations to forty organizations, some of which have already designated their delegates and others of which have indicated their expectation of doing so, I am, nevertheless, prepared to agee to your suggestion and to submit your proposal to the members of the American Jewish Committee".

While the purpose of the meeting ostensibly was to give complete expression to the steps necessary to obtain for Jews in countries abroad full political, civil and religious rights, the hope naturally persisted that the session might be instrumental in fusing the congress and conference movements.

All of those invited participated in deliberations, which lasted from 10 o'clock in the morning to 7 o'clock at night, and were entirely frank and friendly. Insofar as fusion was concerned, however, the conference was non-productive; for, albeit the conferees agreed that the time was opportune when the Jews of America should, through concerted action, place before the proper national and international authorities their demand for universal equality, they were unable temporarily to reconcile their views of the appropriate method.

Still it was decided that the discussion should proceed informally; and the meeting, of which I had been chairman, adjourned subject to my call.

At subsequent private consultation, participated in extensively by two subcommittees of five members each, representing the conference and congress ideas, harmony was achieved in that a Congress was unanimously recommended, but with its scope of action limited to some extent. In that congress the B'nai B'rith was asked to participate. I promptly accepted the invitation, conditional upon the requirements that the principals, for whom the conferees acted, should endorse their program. The endorsement was slow, but in the ensuing spring the plan came to fruition in a preliminary conference, at which a Congress Executive Committee of one hundred and forty was designated, with seventy members allotted to the Zionists and seventy to the other organizations.

This Committee assembled for its first meeting in New York City on November 26th, 1916. Mr. Louis Marshall's name and my own were presented for the temporary chairmanship, and by roll call I was chosen. The nominating committee appointed to recommend a permanent chairman then presented my name as the majority choice and Mr. Marshall's as that of the minority. In the interest of harmony I suggested that we both withdraw—to which Mr. Marshall assented—and Mr. Nathan Strauss was elected.

The Congress itself convened on Sunday afternoon, December 15th, 1918, in Philadelphia. Judge Julian W. Mack was elected president and Mr. Strauss honorary president. A delegation of nine members was selected to present to the Peace Conference a bill of rights for the Jews of all the world. It was instructed further to co-operate with other representatives of Jewish organizations at Paris.

I was numbered among those chosen to go abroad, but was unable to accept. A number of our leading members urged me to send a representative of the Order in my stead; but I was of the opinion that America was sufficiently represented by the Jewish Congress' delegation and the Order by Dr. Adolphe Stern of Bucharest, one of the able European diplomats, whom I had previously asked to act in our behalf.

On January 16th, 1919, London Lodge cabled me the following:

> "Is there anything London Lodge can do to assit you at the Peace Conference?"

And to fortify our position I responded:

> "Dr. Adolphe Stern of Bucharest, now at Zurich, will be one of our representatives at Paris. Would like leading member of London Lodge to join him at our expense. Wire us name of representative selected".

To Dr. Stern, who had written me that he was ill but expected to be able to attend, I cabled:

> "Please proceed to Paris as soon as you deem proper. London Lodge offers co-operation. Co-operate with representatives of other organizations in endeavoring to secure equal rights for our co-religionists everywhere. Our government is friendly".

London Lodge advised me thereafter that its envoy would be Mr. Herbert Bentwich. Dr. Stern unfortunately was prevented from making the journey by the illness of his daughter and himself.

Jews representing many countries met in Paris. They were not all of the same opinion as to the best method to pursue, but finally agreed to select officers to act in their behalf, and the latter prepared and presented an appeal to the peace envoys. It was signed by the American Jewish Committee, the B'nai B'rith and the Zionists, by the Congress delegation representing the United States, and by delegates credentialed from Canada, Italy, Palestine, Roumania, Russia, Czecho-Slovakia, Ukraine, Greece, Transylvania and Bukovina.

Mr. Bentwich acquitted himself most creditably in the performance of his heavy task, and the thanks of the Order are due him for the service he rendered, not only to us but to the cause of Judaism at large. The same appreciation is due to the Committee of the American Jewish Congress and representatives of the other organizations who joined in submitting the appeal.

The Roumanian Situation

And while on this side of the Atlantic and in Paris we exerted ourselves in their behalf, how fared our co-religionists in Roumania—when the war had taken their fate into its hands?

It would serve no useful purpose to reiterate the many atrocities committed by government officials of that so-called Christian country against the Jews. If it might be assumed that Roumania had intended to dispute with the minions of the former Czar under his regime the distinction of making the life of the Jew in their respective lands the most miserable, I would be inclined to think that Roumania had won first place.

To me the first ray of sunshine lightened the heavens there when President Wilson appointed my friend, the Hon. Charles J. Vopicka, minister to that country. Having discussed with him the plight of our co-religionists, I knew the Jews would find in him a friend at court; and to that conviction Mr. Vopicka was true, for he rendered faithful and efficient service, not only to his government, but to humanity as well. A communication by District Grand Lodge No. 9, reporting Roumanian excesses, testifies to Mr. Vopicka's worth. The letter concludes:

> "As terrible as are the facts herein set forth, they would have been worse if our luck had not brought here at the head of the diplomatic mission of the United States the Honorable Charles J. Vopicka, who has shown for all the miseries which afflicted the Jewish population of Roumania not only a mind full of understanding but a heart full of sympathy and human love, a compassion which made him act and interfere in behalf of every persecuted one everywhere. He helped always where protection was needed and might be given.
> "It will be sufficient to mention one fact which clearly shows what Mr. Vopicka has meant and still means to the Jews of Roumania. In November, 1918, he chanced to hear by mere rumor that a pogrom was planned against the Jews. He interefered at 'propria motu' with General Cuanda, then Minister-President, and so energetically that the government was compelled to take necessary measures. The excesses were prevented and many lives saved.
> "Mr. Vopicka in consequence is justly considered by the whole Jewish population as the representative of true democracy and as the only man who has rescued and can rescue them in evil days of oppression and weariness".

Hence the following letter which I received from the Minister is interesting:

> "My Dear Mr. Kraus:
> "Soon after I arrived in Bucharest and was received as Minister of the United States to Roumania, I investigated to ascertain why so few Jewish subjects of that country were permitted to become citizens and why so much ill feeling existed against them. I even spoke to King Carol and to the present King Ferdinand concerning it.
> "When on August 27, 1916, Roumania entered into war the Jewish question became more acute than ever, for many Jews were charged with being German spies, many were arrested, interned and their property confiscated. I took the part of the Jews, defended them before the Roumanian government, and succeeded in having many of them freed and their property returned to them.
> "The most important matter in connection with the Jewish situation developed in 1917, when the seat of the Roumanian government was in Jassy. I arrived there on September 16th. Mr. Moritz Wachtel, President of the Banca Moldavia, who was the recognized leader of the Jews in Moldavia, informed me that he could furnish proof that the Jewish soldiers in Roumanian service were selected from their various regiments and placed in the front rank, so that they should be the first to get killed; also that they were inhumanely treated by Roumanian officers and soldiers alike, and that they failed in receiving advancement or any reward for heroic conduct. On the other hand, Prime Minister Bratiano and other high Roumanian officials complained that many Jewish soldiers were deserters and German spies.
> "The King told me that he would favor a decree conferring citizenship on all Jews serving in the army, but at the same time he stated that many Jewish soldiers were deserters. I suggested that if they were given equal rights it might not be so. Later I investigated the charges and counter-charges and became satisfied that the Jewish soldiers were treated badly and that the accusation that many of them deserted also was true.
> "Early in November, 1918, information reached me that Roumanians were preparing a pogrom, to start on the 12th of that month. Mr. Stern, a young lawyer of Bucharest, and son of your old friend, Dr. Adolphe Stern, sent me a letter in which he appealed to me to use what influence I had to stop the threatened excess. When I was convinced that I had sufficient evidence to justify prompt action, I prepared a letter to the then Prime Minister, General Cuanda, in which I called attention to the expected pogrom and asked that he take steps to stop it at once. To assure quick compliance, I delivered the letter personally, and I told the Minister that my country entered into the war solely for the sake of humanity; that if Roumania should start to kill the Jews it could not expect anything from the Peace Conference, and that most likely I would be obliged to quit my post, as my government would not ignore such an outrage.
> "General Cuanda assured me he would do everything in his power to avert a massacre; that he would give orders immediately by telegraph and that where there were no telegraphic communication he would send messengers to prevent it. A few weeks later he told me Germans had made the preparations for the pogrom in order to discredit Roumania before the world and Peace Conference. Pogroms were started on the 12th of November in Braila and Bucharest but were suppressed by military authorities.
> "Whenever I had a chance to speak to the King or to the Roumanian Minister concerning the Jews, I urged that citizenship and equal rights be given them, and that that course would be best not only for them but also for Roumania. A decree finally was proclaimed purporting to confer such rights, and I submitted it for an opinion to my counsel, who reported, however, that it contained what some people are pleased to term a 'joker', and that it was of very little if any value.
> "I therefore suggested to the Jewish Committee that the members call upon the Prime Minister and ask for a new decree which would be so clear as not to be subject to an unfavorable construction; I also appealed to the government.
> "In the early part of May last the new decree was issued, which, according to the opinion of Lawyer Stern and the Jewish Committee, is clear and satisfactory and assures to all Jews born in Roumania citizenship and equal rights with other subjects of that country.
> "Before closing this letter I wish to say that our government was very much interested in the Jewish question in Roumania and that my work for the Jews in that country was officially approved.

"With very best regards to yourself and Mrs. Kraus, I remain,

Sincerely yours,
"CHARLES J. VOPICKA".

Yet a signal instance of Mr. Vopicka's assistance to our race he failed to record. Intelligence came to me of a new threatened massacre in Roumania on December 8, 1918, in a telegram from our Lodge in Denmark. Whereupon I telegraphed:

"Secretary of State,
"Washington, D. C.

"Received the following cable from our B'nai B'rith Lodge at Copenhagen:

" 'Alarming news has arrived here of impending massacre of Roumanian Jews. Request your government to take steps to protect the Jews against the expected pogroms.'

"Will you kindly cause the Roumanian government's attention to be called to this report?

"ADOLF KRAUS".

I asked Brother Simon Wolf, our representative in Washington, orally to request action by the United States.

Within 48 hours Brother Wolf wired:

"The American Ambassador at Paris has been cabled to bring the President's immediate attention to the Roumanian situation."

The matter was closed on December 14th, when the following communication reached me from the State Department:

"The department begs to inform you that it has brought this information to the attention of the American Legation in Roumania by cable, and has requested an investigation and report".

When Mr. Vopicka visited his home in August, 1919, I inquired as to result of his investigation. He replied:

"Upon receiving the State Department's cablegram I promptly obtained an audience with King Ferdinand, during which the King informed me that Jews of Bessarabia were somewhat alarmed for their safety, but without good cause, and that precautionary measures had been taken to prevent a massacre". Massacre did not take place.

The Anti-Defamation League

The Constitution of the United States ordains the freedom of speech and of the press.

Yet during the war both were restricted by Congress, which the Constitution created and whose servant it is. My purpose is not to call into question the necessity of the Espionage Act, nor to attack the men who passed it. I use the illustration merely to make plain that the guarantees of political organizations are never inviolable; that they may be curtailed at the pleasure of a predominant faction.

We are all concerned for our permanent welfare in the country in which we live; and since that is a fact, we dare not close our eyes to the potentialities of the future. There is no gainsaying the prejudice which is present around us. Some of it is active, some latent. But in either form it is a danger we are bound to heed and combat.

Seven years ago the Anti-Defamation League was founded to destroy those factors which tend to keep animosity toward us alive, to bring about the abatement of defamation of the Jew, and ultimately to put an end to unfair discrimination against all citizens on account of their race or religion. I believe that nothing of greater importance could have been done to protect our status in America—a conclusion in which the results sustain me.

The League's inception found the name of the Jew the subject of calumnies of every character. From the stage ridicule was heaped upon it unrebuked. In motion pictures it was vilified as synonymic of pawnbrokers, thieves and procurers. Newspapers were prone to call attention to the fact, if one of our faith committed a crime, that the offender was a Jew; while various summer resorts announced in widely scattered advertisements that they would not receive us as guests. Among humorous magazines, too, it was recognized as traditional that a malicious quip at the Jews' expense would appeal to their readers' risibilities when all other expedients failed; and some authors of fiction, like some writers of scenarios, found us convenient persons to cast in contemptible roles.

How the situation has changed even a superficial survey will disclose. Hundreds of complaints have been received and acted upon, for a detailed statement of which I refer you to the report of the Administration Committee of the League: I need concern myself with only a few typical instances.

Of the metamorphosis which was brought about in the motion picture industry a notable example is afforded by the conduct of the director, D. W. Griffith. The corporation of which he is the head was producing in 1915 a film to depict the relations of mothers toward the law throughout the ages. One scene revealed a number of Jews stoning and beating Jesus while carrying the cross. It had been an expensive bit of photography, but after a conference between Mr. Griffith's representative and the Administrative Committee of the League the episode and all incidents leading up to it were deleted.

Some hotels and summer resorts advertised "Hebrew patronage not solicited". One desiring to outdo others advertised, "Jews and dogs not allowed on our premises", while another advertised that the climate was not suitable for "Jews and consumptives". Proprietors of some of these hotels questioned as to the reason for taking such a position, frankly stated that they had no objection to Jews but that it paid them to so advertise. There are in this country many persons who have grown rich. Riches often cause the owner to believe that he is superior to the less fortunate, and therefore he desires to belong to an exclusive set. Such set is too frequently composed of a vain, brainless and often vulgar group of men and women, and mostly anti-semitic. No self-respecting Jew could be induced to patronize a hotel catering to such patronage, and there are not enough of them to cause us any inconvenience. The insulting innuendo contained in these advertisements, however, has the tendency to cause prejudice against us among citizens who otherwise would not have it. Therefore, the Anti-Defamation League prepared a law prohibiting such advertisements on the ground that they tended to create class hatred and dissension. We submitted the proposed law to the Legislatures of eight States in which such hotels were located. The law was adopted, and it is now a criminal offense in those States to so advertise. One of those States is the State of Pennsylvania. We sent the secretary of the League, Mr. Lewis, to Harrisburg, where he was in conference with the Governor, Attorney General and prominent members of the Legislature. Owing to his efforts, we succeeded in having the law enacted in Pennsylvania. I was, therefore, somewhat surprised when I found in the Year Book for 1918-1919 on page 381 a statement tending to give another organization credit for the adoption of the law in that State.

The Associated Press, the largest news gathering and distributing agency in the world, lent assistance to the League in an important particular. It discontinued mentioning in its dispatches the religious or racial stamp of criminals—a practice which since has become general among the larger newspapers of the country. "Notes on the word Jew", a card issued by the League to promote correct usage, also hangs in most newspaper offices, or did until its contents became familiar.

It was doubtless to be expected that the war would be seized as a pretext by the anti-semites here as in other countries. Newspapers, magazines and song writers took turns in designating the Jew as a slacker, coward and traitor—some for the purpose of making conscienceless jests, others in all seriousness. Perhaps the most objectionable statement, because it seemed to be sponsored by the Government, was put forth in connection with the drafting of the national army. In "The Medical Advisory Board Manual", as a part of a chapter headed "Causes of Malingering", the folloging sentence was inserted:

> "Foreign born, and especially Jews, are more apt to malinger than the native born".

The Administrative Committeed wired for an appointment with the President. The League's representative there answered by wire that the President had on that very day declaring in writing that the sentence complained of should not have been expressed nor entertained and that it should be stricken out, as it was absolutely contrary to the views of the administration.

To the offices of newspapers and magazines the war brought a flood of mostly fictitious narratives, syndicated as "Germany's Greatest Woman Spy", "The Kaiser's Master Spy", and so on, purporting to give secret information of the Russian situation, but being in reality attacks upon the Jews. The Anti-Defamation League succeeded in having publication of many of these stories stopped.

E. T. Brontson, in "The Mysterious Case of K. of K.", published in the March, 1919, issue of Popular Mechanics, uttered a most vicious slander. The author attempted to lay the blame of Lord Kitchener's death upon the Jews by stating that they obtained state secrets from British Cabinet members and used them to further the interests of Germany. A committee of the League called on the editor, who admitted that there was no proof to substantiate the charges, and after apologizing for his thoughtlessness in permitting them to be published, assured the committee that thereafter Popular Mechanics would be free from such attacks. He offered to apologize publicly, but the committee believed additional publicity would be unwise.

One notoriously anti-semitic magazine, which at the beginning of hostilities printed a series of cartoons depicting Jews as slackers, desisted after learning the views of its numerous advertisers, who expressed themselves by letter at our request. The stage, too, responded to our propaganda. More than one hundred complaints against vaudeville performers have been acted upon since the League was founded; yet these amusement enterprises remain one of the most difficult fields of operation, largely because many Jewish patrons apparently enjoy, and certainly encourage by applause, the vulgarities uttered at their expense. Nevertheless, a marked change in the attitude of managers was made apparent—a change indicated by the following admonition posted by Nixon Nirdlanger in his playhouses:

> "A SUGGESTION AND A NOTICE
> "Tens of thousands of Jewish boys in the army and navy of the United States are offering their lives in the defense of the nation. Slurs and gibes upon the courage and sacrifices of the race to which these fighting men belong are obviously impudent and indecent and will not be tolerated upon the stage of this theater; least of all from Jewish performers who have been the customary offenders in this matter. If you feel that you cannot get your act over the footlights without insulting brave boys who are going over the top, please consider your act canceled".

The work of the League as a whole was remarkably satisfactory. But it is far from finished. By seven years of constant activity it has reduced greatly public affronts to the Jews. It has not, however, effected their complete eradication. Nor has it educated non-Jews sufficiently to preclude their recurrence, even if present offenses were to end.

I have reserved until this juncture mention of four transactions of the League which, though trivial in themselves, have in my mind the highest import.

"Our World Reader", published by Ginn & Co. for use in the schools, declared that the Jews crucified Christ. So the League submitted to the publishers a substitute paragraph setting forth the historical reality that the crucifixion took place pursuant to an order of Pontius Pilate, the Roman Procurator; and the substitution was duly made. At the behest of the League, Houghton-Mifflin Company also agreed, by a footnote in all future editions of Hiawatha, to call attention to the error in Longfellow's lines which attributed the crucifixion to the Jews.

"The Children's Book of Knowledge", issued by the Grolier Society, and "Nelson's Loose Leaf Encyclopedia" presented the same problem in another aspect. The former was induced to substitute an illustration from "The Taming of the Shrew" for a picture of Shylock; the latter to withdraw from a plate entitled "Physiognomy" a drawing of a nose described as "Jewish-Avaricious".

I hope that the publishers of readers for children, will in lieu of defamatory articles against Jews, print a part of Macaulay's speech of April 17, 1833, wherein he pleaded with the House of Commons to remove all civil disabilities from the Jews. He said:

> "There is nothing in their national character which unfits them for the highest duties of citizens. In the infancy of civilization when our island was as savage as New Guinea, when letters and arts were still unknown to Athens, when scarcely a thatched hut stood on what was afterwards the site of Rome, this condemned people had their fenced cities and cedar palaces, their splendid temple, their great statesmen and their soldiers, their natural philosophers, their historians and their poets.
> "What nation ever contended more manfully against overwhelming odds for its independence and religion? What nation ever in its agonies gave such signal proofs of what may be accomplished by a brave despair? * * *
> "Let us do justice to them. Let us open to them the door of the House of Commons. Let us open to them every career in which ability and energy can be displayed. Till we have done this, let us not presume to say that there is no genius among the countrymen of Isaiah, no heroism among the descendants of the Maccabees".

Have the Jews been false to that advocate? Certainly not in England, where the Lordd Chief Justiceship has been given into the custody of a Jew. And not, I venture to say, in any other country, although in some their follow-nationals have done little to merit their loyalty. Yet, although the Jews were loyal in every country to the flag under which they lived, they were not only accused of bringing on the war and of traitorous conduct while it was in progress, but with the signing of the armistice came the accusation that they were responsible for the ensuing unrest.

In September, 1919, thousands of rioters pressed along the streets of Vienna. Hunger was their plaint and their leaders raised the cry, "Profiteers, profiteers, the Jews brought on the war! Away with the Jews"! They moved against their fellow countrymen, our co-religionists—Jews, who had fought with them for their common moral and political convictions, who had given of their blood and money unstintingly, thousands of whom were starving even then in the dearth of food that spared no one; yet the public wrath would have formed against them with terrible results if the government troops had not protected them.

Our secretary, while walking in Unter den Linden during the few days he was in Berlin, was handed a number of circulars which are now in our possession. I shall quote from some of them. Circular No. 10 was issued at Easter time. It contains the following statement:

> “More than two hundred children are missing in Berlin. Sausages have been made out of these unfortunate children and sold to us.
> “What has become of our children? They have become victims of ritual murderers. They have been terribly tortured in order to obtain their blood”.
> “Bela Lichtenberg was arrested because he sold thirteen pounds of flesh of a murdered girl for mutton”.
> “Men and women of Germany, how long will you stand this? Join us! Destroy and kill all who so violate God's command. Away with the criminals”!

Circular No. 14 contains the following:

> “The Talmud and the Rabbis teach the best non-Jew should be killed. He who takes the blood of a non-Jew pleases God. If a non-Jew falls into a pit leave him there. Non-Jews are inferior to dogs and asses”!

Circular No. 1000 inquires:

> “Will you stand idly by while your sisters are being outraged day by day by Jews, so that eventually there will be nobody for you to marry except street-walkers? Curses upon you if you stand idly by and see this done! Woe to you, cowards. We need money to carry on the fight. Join our society. Annual dues only 6 marks”.

In another circular it was stated in big headlines:

> “The Germans would have won the war if the B'nai B'rith of Germany had not conspired with the B'nai B'rith of America to betray our Government”.

It is difficult to believe that in the city of Berlin, which prided itself upon being the city of “Kultur”, persons could be found who would believe such lies, but those who prepared them expected that a mob would gather which would be incited to violence, for as a rule a mob does not reason.

It is time that we realized not only what has happened abroad but also what those happenings may portend. If in a city of two million souls pamphleteers and murder mongers in other guises can go about by daylight crying their wares unmolested and unrebuked, in which European city are our people safe? I do not intend to stress this point as against the German people. I employ it solely to disclose that the mainspring which actuates our enemies has the power to function as dynamically as when its energy first was loosed many centuries ago. What is their grudge—these enemies of ours? Can you name it?

A sin that Jews are guilty of that has not its counterpart in every other people? The thing that sets us apart in hours of stress as the inevitable scapegoat of our own neighbors' distempers? What is it? It is not money, for great wealth does not distinguish the Jews; the majority of them are very poor. Nor is it political preferment or power, because as a whole we have little of either. Nor is it vice, since the criminal records of all countries show the Jew as a class to be law-abiding.

What is it, then, if not the legend which, repeated generation after generation at the cradles of Christendom, first imprints in child minds a picture of the Jews crucifying and putting Him to death in a most horrible manner whom they are taught to adore as their Saviour? What else but the impression which Longfellow received as a child could have possibly induced him in “The Song of Hiawatha” to write:

“Then the Black Robe, chief of the prophet,
Told his message to the people,
Told the purpose of his mission,
Told them of the Virgin Mary,
And her blessed Son, the Saviour,
How in distant land and ages,
He had lived on earth as we do,
How the Jews, the tribe accursed,
Mocked him, scourged Him, crucified Him”.

The New Testament does not teach that the “Jews mocked him, scourged him, or crucified him”, for we read in the book of Matthew, Chapter 27, that Pontius Pilate scourged Jesus, that he, the Roman governor, turned Jesus over to his soldiers to crucify Him, and that they stripped Him, that they put the crown of thorns upon His head, that they mocked Him, etc.

At the time of the Crucifixion Jews were a conquered people. The nation whose humblest citizen was proud to proclaim “Civis Romanus Sum” was the victor. Crucifixion was not a Jewish but a Roman punishment. Caiaphas, the High Priest, did not hold his position by descent nor by the selection of the Jewish people, but by appointment of Rome. Jesus proclaimed himself to be king of the Jews. Caesar, however, was their ruler.

The High Priest, like modern politicians, desired to stand well with the ruler of the nation and dispenser of patronage. He, therefore, advocated the crucifixion and Jesus was brought before Pilate to be judged. The judge asked him, “Art Thou the king of the Jews”? And Jesus answered, “Thou sayest”. That answer was sufficient to adjudge Jesus guilty of treason and to pronounce judgment of death. Caiaphas retained his position as High Priest during Pilate's term as Governor. The next Roman Governor, Vitellius, removed him from office.

Fourteen hundred years later, John Huss, a Catholic Priest, and President of the faculty of Theology at Prague, attempted to reform the clergy. He demanded the despoiling of the churches of useless ornaments, that the poor might be clothed and fed. He also called upon the secular officers to hinder and punish the open vices of ecclesiastics. For this he was condemned as a heretic by Rome and the city of Prague was placed under ban so long as he would remain there. In 1415, at the demand of the High Priest, of the Catholic church, a commission of three bishops was formed in the city of Constance to try him. The charges against him were that he was teaching the doctrine of Wycliffe, that he was encouraging his friends to resist the mandates of the Archbishop and that he insisted that Jesus and not the Pope is the head of the church to whom ultimate appeal must be made. He was found guilty and sentenced to be tied to a stake and burned to death. At the stake, he was summoned to abjure those heresies and his only answer was a prayer using the words of the Psalm of David. So that no trace should be left of him, his ashes were thrown in the river Rhine.

Huss raised Wycliffism to the dignity of a religion and thus the spirit of the English teacher had its influence on the reformed churches of Europe embracing millions of people of different nationalities.

Yet it would be difficult to find among all those followers one person whose mind is so warped as to cause him to hate the Catholic people of today for the action of Catholic priests in Constance in the year 1415.

Although the hatreds and prejudices arising out of and based upon this truth of history have long since burned themselves out and died, hatreds and prejudices a hundred fold more cruel and intense against the Jews continue to live and spread their poisonous effects, when the only basis for their existence is the distorted story, repeated from generation to generation, concerning the crucifixion.

Anti-semitism cannot be cured by threats and force. It can only be cured by an appeal to reason and justice. To succeed will require much patience and hard work.

Are we or our children after us in any danger in this country? I think not, but it is well to remember that public opinion is plastic.

You are all familiar with the prohibitionist: the legal effect of his propaganda is apparent in the anti-liquor amendment to the Constitution. But has it not also an ethical reflection, of especial consequence to us in the corollary that millions of dollars in property values have been destroyed quite without compensation—a sacrifice to the majority's conception of what is for its good?

Could it not be argued that the rights of a minority have been infringed, particularly as for generations the trade had been specifically legalized by taxation?

I do not wish to be understood as expressing an opinion of the prohibition legislation. Nor am I attempting to criticise it. I am calling attention to it only because it does not seem to me a difficult feat of imagination to substitute ourselves, or any minority, for the distillers and their associates.

Let a majority be convinced that a minority possesses special rights inimical to its interests, and those rights will be taken away with at least a show of justification, irrespective of what they may be.

A majority does not need to step outside the law, for the law is the majority's will. What the majority gives it can take away. The crux of the matter is the majority's pleasure.

It is human enough to ignore signs of peril. To erect the bulwarks of protection is often a tedious and arduous task. Yet they must be erected in our case, because who, lacking prophetic vision, can say when their strength will be tested?

The war dwarfed the previous financial perceptions of everyone. Gigantic funds were raised from all quarters. The war is over, but the world has not returned to its ante-bellum status; it never will.

Our organization was created for purposes of philanthropy and fraternity, and we have made a record of which we have every reason to be proud. Our usefulness will remain unimpaired provided we are ready to meet promptly in the open all questions as they arise and have sufficient means to meet necessary expenses connected therewith.

Our financial resources for work that has to be done are woefully insufficient. In my opinion, the work our Anti-Defamation League is doing and will have to do in the future is one among the most important of our activities. The dues our members pay, even if increased what to the members will seem a reasonable amount, will be insufficient to defray necessary expenses for effective work. We have never asked for financial assistance outside of our membership. Other organizations have not hesitated so to do.

Why should we hesitate to appeal for funds to maintain successfully work which is of interest to all? Why not appeal for contributions to men and women who adhere to those principles of justice in the face of which no people may be defamed without cause; who believe that every man stands or falls by his own virtues or iniquities alone, and who view with alarm conduct, individual or organized, which tends to overthrow the law and seat passion and prejudice in its place?

Let the League's scope be international and non-sectarian; that having always uppermost in mind the welfare of our own co-religionists, yet it render aid to any afflicted people who suffer persecution for no fault of their own.

That the best talent be marshalled in the activities of the League.

That it strike at the root of the hatred of the Jews by destroying the current distorted story of the crucifixion, besides beating to earth the canards and slanders which are nurtured from that source.

That the battle in behalf of fair play be carried into schools and colleges, where lecturers, Gentiles as well as Jews, versed in the history of our race and its traditions, shall speak of it with sympathy and authority, so that if the coming generation still lends ear to our traducers it will not be for lack of never having heard them refuted. No attempt, however, must be made at proselyting or turning the lecture into a religious one.

That the League enter a campaign of publicity through the publication of its own journal and through such other mediums of every sort, here and abroad, as it is able to sway.

That we employ the best talent obtainable to write for and to edit our journal, that the same be enlarged; that an attempt be made to compete with the best periodical in the land, so that it may attract to itself a general class of readers without which it will fail to serve the useful purpose to which it should be put. It is not nearly as important, it seems to me, that we should inform our members of what we are doing, of what our hopes and aspirations are, as it is that members of other creeds should be informed.

I recommend that in raising funds for this work we follow the example of our enemies. The anti-Semites of Berlin have asked for an annual contribution of six marks. For what purpose? To tear down, to destroy, to murder our people, or to make them fugitives on the face of the earth. I urge that we appeal for annual contributions to enable us, not to tear down, but to build up; not to murder, but to save human life; not to promote the ultimate in human mistry and despair by arraying neighbor against neighbor and friend against friend, but to beget universal contentment and happiness and to bring nearer that sacred hour when there shall prevail upon earth a real brotherhood of man.

To that end I recommend that we ask our members as well as non-members to take part in this work by at least contributing annually a sum commensurate with the importance of the work herein proposed.

It is for you to decide. And the time, I think, is at hand. There is no germ more virile than the spirit of the mob; none more quick, more ruthless. And once aroused to havoc, its spread may be measured only by the number of receptive organisms on which it falls. The departure from our policy is marked. But to my mind the aim is worthy. I am convinced that we have it in our power to write for the Jews everywhere a new bill of rights. A non-enforcible bill, it is true, but one that will not need to be enforced; a bill founded on a rock of mutual understanding and respect.

Today we may elect what we will do. Tomorrow is an unconjectured possibility. When last we met who would have ventured to predict what was to intervene before our next assemblage? Who ventures now to say what five years hence shall have befallen us? More than a century ago a company of Virginia colonists came together for the purpose of determining a matter which concerned their destiny; which was to concern the destiny of a 100,000,000 people, including yours and mine. There were of that number those who would have turned their backs to the issue. Are there any here? If so, may I revert to our text books for the answer:

> “They tell us, sir, that we are weak, unable to cope with so formidable an adversary. But when shall we be stronger? Will it be next week or the next year? Will it be when we are totally disarmed and when a . . . guard shall be stationed in every house?
> “Shall we gather strength by irresolution and inaction? Shall we acquire the means of effectual resistance by lying supinely on our backs and hugging the delusive phantom of hope, until our enemies shall have bound us hand and foot?
> “Sir, we are not weak, if we make a proper use of the means which the God of nature had placed in our power. . . . The battle, sir, is not to the strong alone; it is to the vigilant, the active, the brave. Besides, sir, we have no election. If we were base enough to desire it, it is now too late to retire from the contest. . . . Gentlemen may cry peace, peace—but there is no peace. The war is actually begun!''

There is no need to read further from Patrick Henry's epic of liberty. We have not as yet reached the extremity where we must voice the immortal challenge of his closing lines.

Let us never reach it! Let us meet our enemies in the center of the field. Let ours be the first blow for righteousness and justice. And let us assure to our children and to our children's children, and to the children of all oppressed humanity, the full heritage of universal tolerance and equality which ought to be theirs.

And while appealing to non-Jews for fair play, let us do likewise to our own people. Let each one of us always bear in mind that by his own acts he must refute his enemies even before they assail him. He must be, not as moral as the average non-Jew, but more moral; for his conduct must establish the conviction universally that to be a Jew is to be embodiment of the best in humanity.

It is no light ambition; your fellowmen will know you for what you are, no matter what you pretend to be. But once the goal has been achieved, therein is complete sanctuary. None may assail you unless he assails the enlightenment of all races, and in that unhappy day, civilization may be expected to perish.

Americanization

The General Committee of District No. 1, at a meeting held on January 17th of this year passed a resolution recommending that the Order inaugurate and vigorously conduct a campaign of education against the false and dangerous economic, industrial and social theories responsible for the prevailing social unrest.

The suggestion which forms the basis of that solution flows from the recognition which is becoming general, that too little attention has heretofore been given to the further status and development of the immigrant after he reaches our shores.

America has been the hope and the haven of the persecuted of all nations. I hope it will always remain so. For a generation before the late war there was a very large and constantly increasing immigration to America from the various countries of Europe. Most of them came here ignorant of the laws, language and customs of the country. It could hardly have been expected of them that, finding themselves in utterly new and strange surroundings, their eyes searching unfamiliar faces, their ears hearing only unmeaning sounds, their hearts assailed with undefined fears at every hesitant, unaccustomed turn, they should not have sought out those of their own race, and huddled together with them in the only companionship of sympathy and understanding which a strange country afforded them.

And so we find them gathered together in the great cities of the land, clinging to the old traditions, with little or no social contact with the typical American elements, learning all to slowly the language of America, and hardly anything at all of its theory or system of government.

The public schools, of course, take care of the children of these immigrants and these children as they grow to maturity quickly take on the ideals and the characteristics of Americans. But the recent rapid spread of radical propaganda demonstrates that there is a very considerable adult alien population which the schools cannot reach. Until very recently no attention or thought has been given to the Americanization of these alien elements of our population. About the only outside interest ever manifested in them was that of some enterprising political gentleman who, more deeply interested in the success of his party and of himself as its efficient and deserving representative just before an important election, horded them together, sometimes by the hundreds, and having duly attended to a few simple preliminaries, marched them before some official who bade them hold up their right hands, then recited the oath of allegiance in words of the meaning of which they had not the slightest conception, but by the magic of which they stood forth full fledged citizens of the United States—with full power to vote, particularly for the candidates of the poiltical gentlemen who had thus caused this great boon to be conferred on them!

Thus left to work out their own salvation, these distinctly foreign elements of our population remained foreign and unnoticed until the social unrest following the war in Europe spread to these elements in America, and awakened us to a sense of the danger lurking in our midst, and to the necessity of some effort, too long delayed, to bring home to the alien residing here an understanding and appreciation of the beneficent character of the government and institutions of the land in which he lives.

Left alone as he has been, he has been an easy victim of the political demagogue and the radical agitator. He is particularly the prey of the fanatical agent of disorder and unrest imported here from the chaotic social unheavals of Europe. Like his fanatical teacher, the agitator, he knows nothing of government but evil. The only government he ever knew was cruel, oppressive, corrupt. To him the badge of authority is the sign of cruelty and oppression. There has been no one to tell him that it is any different in America while the agitator and the anarchistic pamphlets and newspapers printed in his native tongue are ever present, teaching, urging him that all governments are vile, corrupt, oppressive, and that of America is no exception. His life is necessarily one of toil and struggle, while he sees about him on every hand the evidences of wealth, ease and comfort which he is told is attained by the possessors through the taking from him, or the failure to give him his just due. He is told that his unhappy station is due to the corrupt capitalistic government here in America as elsewhere in the world and that all this will be changed if he and his fellow workers will join in the overthrow of all present government and the establishment of a government by the proletariat, under which he will be the equal of any, and entitled to equal participation in all of the material necessities and comforts of life.

This is the vicious doctrine he hears constantly preached, and there has been no one to tell him the other side. So far as he is concerned, the cause of sanity, of a healthy view of life, of development and progress through a proper understanding of his surroundings and opportunities and a clearly fixed purpose of bettering his condition in life, has had no defender.

And so we have our problem, the menace of which has been recognized in the disturbances and unrest which have followed the war, and the consequent action of the Government in the recent deportations of large numbers of these malcontents, who rewarded the liberty and generosity of America by seeking to undermine and destroy its government.

It has been charged that many of those recently ordered deported from this country were Jews. Our Washington representative, Mr. Simon Wolf, seeking to ascertain how much of truth there might be in this charge, wrote to Mr. Palmer, the Attorney General of the United States, asking for the facts. Mr. Palmer answered as follows:

''My Dear Sir:

''I am in receipt of your communication of January 3, 1920, inquiring as to whether among the alien radicals recently arested there were any of Jewish faith. I have to advise you that the reports from the local office of the Bureau of Investigation of the department show that there were a large number of Russian Jews among those arrested. It is impossible to state at the present time whether or not these persons still adhere to the Jewish faith, for previous investigations by the department have shown that many of the persons arested as alien anarchists are atheists in belief and while previously members of the Jewish faith have renounced that faith and are at the present time in no way connected with any religion.

''I note your expression of approval of the attitude being taken by this department and desire to state that it is exceedingly gratifying to me that my stand has been approved in this matter.

''Faithfully yours,
''A. MITCHELL PALMER''.

That there were any of Jewish extraction or ancestry at all among them is unfortunate, and it helps but little that they have become atheists or have adoped some religious faith other than Judaism, for the distinction will not be made by the general public and it will still be charged that they are Jews. However this may be, sufficient appears to indicate that a share of the alien problem is ours, and we shall have to assume it and do the best we can to eliminate the stain which even one ungrateful Jew should make upon the gratitude of our people to a country and government that has afforded the largest measure of liberty and happiness our race has known.

But how is this problem to be met? What is the solution? What direction shall our efforts take? I submit to this convention these questions and bespeak your earnest consideration of them in the hope that a way may be found to rescue the good name of the Jews from among this new enemy of civilization, the bolshevist and all his tribe.

The United States Government is undertaking the work of Americanizing the alien. I recommend that we consider the question how best we can cooperate with the Government in that work, particularly that branch of the work which touches more nearly the Jewish element in our population with the idea that through our kinship with that element, our efforts among them will be more efficient.

But whatever may be done, I am of the opinion that American citizenship is too precious a boon to be forced or thrust upon anyone. Rather it is an honor that ought to be conferred upon him only who understands what it means, appreciates its worth, earnestly desires it, and has proven himself worthy to receive it. That which is easily attained is little appreciated. No alien should be admitted to American citizenship who has not during his probationary period brought himself to an understanding of the benefits and obligations of such citizenship, and by his life and conduct shown his appreciation of it, his desire for it, and his fitness to achieve it.

America has invited the oppressed and persecuted of all nations to come here and enjoy the blessings of liberty and opportunity which are open to all upon equal terms. She asks nothing of the invited guest but obedience to her laws, which bear but lightly and without oppression upon all alike. If one comes who finds things not to his liking let him go back whence he came or to some other land better suited to his fancy; but let him not, while under the rooftrees of a generous host, seek by secret and insidious means to destroy the home thaat gave him shelter.

For the welfare of America, for the welfare of Judaism, we as Jews should see to it that no Jew is admitted to American citizenship who is not worthy of that honor, and that everyone who comes to this country and proves himself unworthy to remain in it, is ferreted out and sent back to the country from whence he came. Let every alien Jew who seeks to remain in America understand that hatred for American institutions and affiliations with those elements which seek their destruction, are inconsistent with further residence in America, not only in the opinion of the United States Government, but also in the opinion of the great body of Jews who are proud of their American citizenship and who will tolerate no assault upon it by anyone whose act might call into question their appreciation of it.

Let this be generally and definitely understood, and the alien problem, so far as the Jewish element in it is concerned, will be solved.

Military Participation by Members of the Order

Statistics recently reported from reliable sources show that during the great war, 250,000 American Jews served in the army and navy of the United States, representing between 4 and 5 per cent of the total military and naval personnel. The Jewish population of this country is about 3 per cent of the total population. Although the average age of our members is well beyond the age limit of those called out under the Selective Service Act, yet 13 per cent of our membership was the contribution which the B'nai B'rith made to the military power of the United States.

In the foreign districts, statistics thus far gathered show an even higher percentage, due, of course, to the fact that our participation in the war was of much shorter duration. For detailed information on this and other subjects involving war activities, I refer to the reports of the lodges and members of the Executive Committee. The only district that made a complete record of the war activities of its members is District No. 8. At the beginning of the world war, there were 8,610 members in that district. Two thousand and forty-four, or nearly 25 percent, of the members served in the army or navy in addition to 3,113 sons, making a total of 5,157. Three hundred and eighty-six gave their lives on the field of battle; 53 were captured and 81, out of a total of 96, who were wounded, died in hospitals. Of 22 reported missing in battle, no records can be secured and their remains will probably never be discovered. Of the 5,157 above enumerated, 16 per cent voluntarily enlisted. The decorations bestowed upon them speak most concincingly for the courage and devotion of the Jewish people, and of our members in particular, to the country to which they owe allegiance. One thousand seven hundred and seventy-five, or more than 30 per cent, were decorated for bravery in action; 2,130 were mentioned in citations and 292 were promoted from the ranks to the grade of officers.

When the whole story of Jewish participation will be written, it will be found that in every land the members of our Order have lived up to that precept of our ritual which commands us to be loyal and true in our devotion to the flag of the land and to the government under whose protection we live. Full reports from other districts have not yet reached us. They will be published in the B'nai B'rith News.

Conclusion

The fifteenth year of my service as President of the Order is now coming to a close. I gratefully acknowledge the earnest, enthusiastic support given by officers and members, which has made it possible to show an increase in membership during my terms of office of over 200 per cent, and an increase in the usefulness of the Order to the cause of humanity which, I believe, has fully justified all our labors to that end.

In reviewing our work for the past five years, I can see where mistakes have been made, my own not only but those of others. If ever the necessity existed for looking forward and carefully considering in advance every step that is proposed to be taken in order to be certain that it is in the right direction, the time is now.

The Reconvening of the Jewish Congress

The American Jewish Congress will be reconvened in the city of Philadelphia on the thirtieth day of May. The views of our own organization on the Congress are well known. It is needless to go into the history of the agitation and to point out how the Order strove to make peace where the controversy raged not always on the lines of conviction or in freedom from motives bordering on the interests of certain organizations and their leaders. The Congress did meet. It adjourned to allow its appointed delegation to go to Paris and it was stipulated that the convention should resume its sessions to hear the report of that delegation. That report is now due, and it is but proper that the parent body shall receive it. When that is done, it is clear that the Congress adjourn for good. It should abide by its own constitution. What will happen may be prognosticated. Some, probably the majority, of the delegates present will reconvene immediately after adjournment and meet as a new Congress. We hope that there will be clear heads among the delegates to show that their mandate has expired with the adjournment after receiving the report and that their meeting must now partake of the nature of an assembly of individual Jews discussing Jewish affairs. They may decide to declare the institution permanent. But they lack, again, the right to do that. They must go back once more to their electors. We shall be treated to a renewed agitation which ,to say the least, is altogether unnecessary, and should be nipped in the bud. There are such Jews as are Congress mad. The idea is almost a fixed one in their heads. Whether the Congress was needed in the particular period when it was first convened is a question that, as said before, need not be entered into now. But there is no earthly reason for another one and certainly not for a permanent one. It is all of a piece with the obsession in many minds that the things that worked successfully (and some did not at all) during the war must continue beyond its termination. It were far better for the world, for the American nation, and for us Jews, to resume our pre-war mentality, and that the sooner the better. We have done soldiering. We have done regulating. We have done interfering. There are many problems of reconstruction, of readjustment. We can cope with them in the normal way. It is not necessary to make so much noise. Arise and be doing. Toil, and not talk, will save a distracted world. Overcentralization, effective in days of stress, ill becomes the system of government under which we live. In Jewish affairs, likewise, there is room for all and every organization. Let each do its allotted sphere, without overlapping and without interference. Nothing is to be gained by destroying organizations. No new one is needed. Let the old and approved ones be strengthened, solidified. Let, above all, the energy of American Israel be turned into channels that have been clear cut and are beyond the freshness of new and unwonted working hands. Agitation begets division. Let the animosities be forgotten. They must not be resuscitated. We have no patience with any pet scheme. Names will not accomplish deeds. We have our world affairs and our domestic issues. We have the agencies to grapple with both. Let the Congress go as it came. Let it be a war memory, and no more. If it has done any good, let it rest on its laurels. If the good it has done could have been done without it, and we are certain it could have been done, then to call it back into an artificial life lacks all foundation in reality. And where there is no foundation, the structure is bound to topple over.

The Broad Synagogue

By Dr. Max L. Margolis

In the introduction to his ''Studies in Judaism,'' the late Dr. Schechter coined the terms ''High Synagogue'' and ''Low Synagogue,'' The ''Studies'' were written at Cambridge, England. There it was given to the great master, whose crowning achievement was his career in this country, brought to a close by his untimely death, to blend with his vast Jewish erudition the culture of England's great seat of learning with which only Oxford rivals in importance. The Jewish scholar who resides among Christian students and whose daily associations are with them, cannot fail to reflect on Jewish movements from the new angle of vision which is opened up to him. Comparisons are instituted; analogies are sought; the little world is seen to be a part of the big world. Of course, analogies can never be perfect, especially between heterogeneous bodies like the Church and the Synagogue. But the slogans were there in the air; High Church and Low Church both had their vigorous exponents. So Schechter carried the names into the party divisions of contemporaneous Jewry, fully aware of the limited sense in which they could be applied. In the footsteps of the master, to whose profound influence the writer is indebted for much of his conception of Judaism during the last fifteen years, I venture to introduce as a third term that of the ''Broad Synagogue.''

Let it be understood that I use the term with the same freedom which marks the application by Schechter of the adjectives ''High'' and ''Low'' to the Synagogue. I wish it were in my power to make his meaning clear to every reader, so as to prepare the way for an understanding of my own meaning. The party of the ''High Synagogue'' is, to Schechter, that group of men who are known as the pathfinders in the provinces of the newer Jewish learning. Their work was concerned with post-Biblical Jewish literature and history. That side would have little practical bearing on the problems of the day, except that all fresh information must be welcomed and the orderly treatment of the products of the past must influence our position in the life and circumstances of the day. Schechter saw deeper into the meaning of all those stupendous volumes and treatises. He understood that these men, some of whom, at least, shared the opinions of Christian scholars on the Bible, relegated the Scriptures to a corner and tacitly placed the center of gravity of Judaism in the Spoken Word as opposed to the Written Word. The Spoken Word is, of course, Tradition. Tradition, superimposed upon the Book, constituted the sum and substance of Israel's activity during the last two thousand years. The Bible was not fetish to the Jew. The written letter was often sacrificed. The same spirit that worked through the prophets continued with the masters of the haggadah, or sermon. Origins lie too far away. The thing that is of importance is that definite teachings and customs were invested with a Jewish significance. Those live; and what lives is Judaism. Accordingly, a follower of this school may be an agnostic in philosophy, a critic as to the Bible, but, withal, a staunch conservative living up to every Jewish custom. It is a comfortable point of view. It means outward conformity with utmost freedom of opinion. Opinions are of the heart; conformity is tangible, visible. The majority of the school in the former and latter generations regard the Pentateuch as a subject hardly to be touched; it is accepted, but not examined, at any rate, not critically. That is certainly a convenient point of view. But, unfortunately, we live in an Anglo-Saxon environment where the Bible is much made of. We associate largely with Low Church Christians or Evangelicals. The average lay Jew looks upon the Scriptures as quite apart from all other products of Jewish literature and, rightly or wrongly, assumes that the whole of Judaism is there in the Book and that anything that deviates from the Scriptural religion cannot possibly be binding or Jewish. Schechter is quite free to confess that, though much given to the admiration of the masters of Jewish learning in the nineteenth century, he is quite ill at ease with this fashionable attitude of exalting Tradition at the expense of Scripture. We who knew him may even say that, as his mood varied he now allied himself with the Traditionists, now with the Scripturists.

There must be a middle course. I am not an ecclesiastic and I have not the least inclination to found a party. But I know that the thoughts I utter will find an echo in many thinking Jews. To that extent, a school is in process of formation and its progress cannot be impeded by an opposition based upon expediency. What proverbially happens to the man who attempts to sit upon two stools may be the fate of this central position. That position is not dictated by practical issues, though it has a bearing on them. It is rooted in learning, in Jewish learning, in one that regards the process of Judaism as one, from the begining to this day. Everything that was produced by the Jewish mind comes fitly within its purview. You cannot apply to a work of the Middle Ages scientific method and then refuse to apply it to the Scriptures. But it is not a question that really depends upon us. Bible studies in the nineteenth century have been largely in the hands of Christians. We cannot find fault with Christians if they look upon the Hebrew Scriptures through the glasses of their own body of Scriptures. A great mass of literature has been built up to demonstrate that the study of the very making of the Hebrew Scriptures reveals the justness of the Christian estimate of them as at best a preparation for the higher form of religion. The Law followed the Prophets, so they teach, thus inverting the traditional order; Judaism is the successor to the Law, Christianity to the Prophets. This view would not concern us, were it not for the fact that it is popularized and that Jewish laymen find it impressed on themselves, for the simple reason that there is no other view to counterbalance it.

For, be it said, in all clearness, that merely ignoring the view just described or ruling it out of court by the gesture of the hand will not refute it. Our Jewish young men and women rightly look to us to give them a Jewish verdict. There is, at present, no corporate Jewish opinion on the subject. What passes for the traditional account will not suffice for the ''perplexed of our own times.'' As a Jewish scholar put it, you cannot come to the present-day generation and tell them that David peaened prophetically the Psalm ''By the rivers of Babylon we sat.'' And yet, it is the bounden duty of the Jewish scholar to encourage the study of the Bible, but from a point of view which shall endeavor to bring out the spirit in the traditional account, not the letter. It must be shown that Bible and Tradition are one and the same process. The Broad Synagogue will take its stand upon the living Jewish consciousness which is itself the result of spiritual forces that lie at the basis of the Written as well as the Spoken Word. With the High Synagogue we are conformists, as, indeed, a gentleman always conforms. But the motivation with us will be different. We shall not idle away our time in the pursuit of beginnings. The fruit falls from the tree, the root deeply imbedded and twisted, will not yield it to us. What we came to be is the absorbing study. And true historicism will show that we came to be through a process of conflicting parties and opposing points of view, that, at no time, whether in Biblical or post-Biblical times, were the extremes allowed to dominate Judaism, that in every cross-section of our spiritual existence it is the middle position that won the day. Both the Written and the Spoken Word is a composite. The Judaism that lives and that will live is a composite. We have always had divisions in our midst; that which was ''in the name of Heaven'' survived. History, that is posterity, establishes the claim of a division to abiding force. Even the prophet must submit to the verdict of history. It is in the nature of conflicting opinions that they will exaggerate their positions and almost make caricatures of them. Petrification is just as bad as putrefaction. Where there is no conflict there is stagnation, there is death and no life. But we would ask the contending parties to be tolerant of each other and to put the weal of the whole body of Israel and of Judaism above the interests of either party. And that, we hope, will be achieved by that large body of men and women who will not swear upon the words of any master or ecclesiastic, who will refuse to be indoctrinated, who must be taken in the confidence of the scholar and into his workroom, and there be shown how the extremes vanish at every stage of Judaism and how neither the High nor the Low Synagogue will command our allegience, but only the Broad Synagogue, which is the ancient Synagogue consciously apprehended in the light of a reverent, yet open-minded study of Written and Spoken Word alike.

Warning

A communication from Salt Lake City states that the local community has been imposed upon by one Harry Carson who claims to have been recently discharged from the Federal prison at Fort Leavenworth, and to have been formerly a member of the Order. He appealed to members of Peixotto Lodge for assistance in securing employment. He was aided by the members in this respect, but a few days later, forged several checks, signing the names of members who had aided him, and hurriedly left the city. Carson is 5 feet 6 inches tall, weighs about 150 lbs. and has a supposedly crippled left hand.

Members of the Order in other cities should wire the sheriff of Salt Lake City on receipt of any information as to Carson's whereabouts.

THE outstanding news of the last month is the action of the Supreme Council of the Allied Nations, held in San Remo, which gave to England the mandate over Palestine, declaring it "the National Home for the Jews" (April 24). Zionist papers in this country were jubilant. The "Juedisches Tageblatt" appeared in festival garb, and a mass meeting in London declared the long-cherished dream of the Jewish people realized. Conversely the Board of Governors of the Hebrew Union College protested against the supposed attempt to "declare American Jews citizens of Palestine . . . without their consent" (April 30).

According to the report of the gospel, John the Baptist sent messengers to Jesus, asking him: "Art Thou He that is to come?" The historically minded reviewer will ask himself the same question. Is the name "National Home for the Jews" without changing the status of the Arabs and with Great Britain as the real ruler, indeed the realization of the Jewish state of Herzl? Is the fact that an American Jew may live in Palestine and exercise there the right to vote without losing his American citizenship, being what international law called "sujet mixte," as the Princes of Hanover were peers of England, really a question mark placed after the designation of American Jew, provided that this interpretation of the San Remo oracle is correct?

A Dream When One Waketh

The realities, coming from Palestine, are by no means pleasant. "Tog" (April 18) reports that the Arabs threaten pogroms all over Palestine if the Zionist Commission is not sent out of the land, which General Allenby promptly refused. Bonar Law, in reply to an interpellation in the House of Commons, expressed his full confidence in General Allenby's ability to keep order in Palestine, but stated officially that the disorders lasted three days (April 4-6) and that the losses were two dead and 186 wounded (April 15). Of the latter a few are said to have died since. He also stated that England stands by the Balfour declaration, in this way emphatically denying the report of the London "Times" that the United States Department of State suspected England of a double deal with Prince Feisal and the Zionists. Israel Zangwill, on the other hand, claims that the British authorities had previous notice of trouble brewing and criminally neglected to take precautions. Joseph Cowen, the Zionist leader, even went farther and charged the British officers in Jerusalem with having participated in the pogrom and having acted like "Huns and barbarians." Zangwill's statement seems to be proven by the undeniable fact that European papers reported at the end of March a statement of Mr. Jacobus Kann, the Dutch Zionist leader, who, upon his return from Palestine, told representatives of the Jewish press that the Arabs displayed an ugly temper.

Jerusalem and Jitomir

Wladimir Jabotinsky, the real founder of the Jewish Legion, was sentenced to 15 years' imprisonment. The fact seems perfectly true. About the reason we have not official information. One report has it that Jabotinsky was sentenced for having armed the Jews for self-protection. Another report has it that he aspired to the laurels of d'Annunzio and planned a Jewish army for the conquest of a genuine Jewish state. In a Jewish mass meeting, held at London (April 27), Col. Patterson, the commander of the Zion Mule Corps, paid Jabotinsky a high tribute, and declared that he was the victim of a frame-up. Max Nordau demanded at the same meeting the immediate liberation of the imprisoned hero, and in Jerusalem signatures to a petition were circulated, which the rabbis permitted to sign on Sabbath, an aged rabbi giving an example by signing it in the synagogue. This would be an interesting case for the Great Sanhedrin, which is once more planned in the Holy City. It seems incredible that British civil, or even military, authorities should imitate the late czarist government, which had Jews in Jitomir arrested after the pogrom of 1905 for organizing a self-protective society.

The British mandate includes Mesopotamia, and this probably will bring us closer to the distant brethren in Mosul, near the ruins of old Nineveh, in Bagdad, the seat of the Geonim, and many other historic places. The Jewish population of Mesopotamia is estimated at 88,000 souls, of which Bagdad contains more than half. The present writer cherishes the fond hope that in this marshy country a dry place will be found where old manuscripts of the Talmud may be discovered, confirming his proposed textual changes in certain difficult passages of the Talmud. British capitalists may have other hopes.

Low Latin

Magyars were always fond of medievalism. Their magnates used to wear furs, precious stones and similar paraphernalia on gala occasions, and for a long time they talked so-called Latin in their so-called parliament, and even now they have any number of Latin designations for high offices. To the same class belongs their habit of calling the police "brachial force" (vis brachialis). It is indeed highly appropriate that they maintain this tradition, for the "brachial force" is conducting itself in typical medieval style. The brutality of this strong-arm squad was so objectionable that foreign laborers employed in Budapest protested so emphatically that the government found it necessary to give the leader of this police force, Ostenburg, a leave of absence. Before their departure these re-awakened Christian Magyars, as guardians of public order, went through the streets, conducting themselves as worthy descendants of Attila. Respectable Jews were arrested, taken to police stations, undressed, robbed and beaten; women pleading for their husbands were shamefully treated. The prisons are filled with Jews dying from starvation, and 800 Jews are said to have disappeared in Budapest alone.

Don't Tell in Gath

Real publicity, when it harms anti-Bolsheviki, be they Poles or Magyars, is somewhat inconvenient right now. We saw it in the case of the butchery of Pinsk, which was so apologetically presented by the American commissioners, Jadwin and Johnson. Some Jews had the courage to write to the Supreme Council, submitting a few specimens of the re-awakened "vis brachialis", and Count Apponyi, Hungary's representative at the peace negotiations, an inveterate clerical, though fair-minded, warned his home government against the dangers incurred by such provocation of public opinion, which, in the long run, even anti-Bolshevik politics could not ignore. Premier Simonyi-Samadam, who (March 17) succeeded the bloodhound Friedrich, read the statement in the House of Representatives, and rather frankly declared that the fun of killing a few Jews was not worth the loss of territory. The "re-awakened Magyars" in parliament woke up and blamed it all on the Jew-ridden press, which spread lies about Christian Hungary in foreign countries. No amount of hypocritical talk about the Jewish communists will be able to deny the fact, proven by documents, that the editors of the socialist paper, "Nepszawa," were assassinated on Feb. 17, after an order of the government of Feb. 13 had directed the "vis brachialis" to watch this paper and take "appropriate measures." It is further a fact that Jewish physicians are afraid to answer night calls. It is a fact that a Jewish student, wounded in the war and decorated with a gold medal for bravery and wounded a second time, when on duty in the fight against the communist government, was clubbed out of the university when he attempted to register. It is reported—and, under the conditions we must believe it—that one Samuel Kohn was arrested in Budapest for a supposed irregularity in his papers, and on the next day the police reported that he had committed suicide. The fact was that that police had taken him to the roof of the cathedral and thrown him down on the street. Such "involuntary suicides" have happened repeatedly, though in a less spectacular manner. Rabbi Immanuel Loew, of Szeged, was arrested on the charge of libeling the government because he signed a report enumerating some of these atrocities. Loew is 66 years old, has been rabbi of Szeged since 1878, when he succeeded his father, who was the pioneer of Magyarization among the Jews. Some years ago he declined a call as Chief Rabbi of Vienna out of patriotic motives. It is reported that the government found in Rabbi Hevesi of Budapest a witness for the defense. We shall wait before passing an opinion.

Midjan and Moab

The fine observation of the Midrash, popularized by Rashi (Num. 24:4), that the bitterest enemies come to an agreement when they attack the Jews, comes true again in the case of Poland and Hungary. The anti-Semitic publicist, Desider Szabo, said to a reporter of the Jewish paper, "Mult es Joevoe," that he looks for the legalization of pogroms in the same way as war between two nations is legalized. The identical statement was made by the Polish publicist Andrew Niemojewski. The theory has been put into practice in various Galician cities, as Cracow, Kolomea, Brody and Tarnopol. Details are still missing. Ritual murder charges, the old trick for stirring up the fanaticism of a bigoted population, was tried again by the Poles in the Lithuanian cities, Poniewez and Wolkowishk. It is really inconceivable how people expect to be taken seriously with such theories when the census proves that Poland has 1,770,000 Jews, equal to 14 per cent of the total population, forming in Warsaw alone about 300,000, or one-third of the population, and in various provincial towns 50 to 80 per cent. While Polish patriots are treating the Jews as alien outlaws in the land where their fathers have resided for centuries, they are in foreign countries treated as Poles, and as such expelled or threatened with expulsion in Berlin, Munich, Vienna and Paris, let alone Hungary. In Upper Silesia, where they are feared as favoring the German cause in the impending plebiscite, the French troops aided the Poles in assaults and arbitrary arrests. The surprising delay of the publication of the report of the British Commission to investigate the pogroms in Poland, on which Mr. Kenworthy interpellated the government, seems also inspired by a desire to protect Polish, respectively allied, political interests, regardless of the principles of humanity. The farce of the protection of minorities in the treaty of Versailles becomes daily more evident. Jewish bakers in Praga, a suburb of Warsaw, received a warning that their licenses would be withdrawn if they kept their stores closed on the Sabbath. In Drohobycz a meeting was closed by the police because a member of a Jewish delegation in Paris, Dr. Leon Reich, made an address in Yiddish. An interpellation by the Jewish members of the Sejm why Jewish children did not receive any aid from the relief fund sent from America was answered by the minister with the lame excuse that certain irregularities were caused by incomplete statistics.

Neighbors and Satrapies

Yiddish papers publish appallingly large lists of the victims of the pogroms in the Ukraine, and Rabbi Mirken, who fled from the Ukraine to Szavli, reports that he saw with his own eyes how Denikin's heroes forced Jewish parents to drink the blood of their children butchered before their own eyes. The Jews of Kiev sent out a heartrending appeal for aid, urging that relief come at once, or epidemics and starvation will have made all aid unnecessary. After the strange report, noted in the last issue, that the soviet government appropriated several millions of roubles for the publication of a Yiddish encyclopedia, we are treated to another surprise. We are informed via Switzerland that the same government, in a circular, ordered the suspension of all Jewish communal organizations on the ground that the religious influence over the Jewish proletariat keeps them from joining the bolshevik party.

The Seed of Junkerism

The term "democracy" has proven a most remarkable adaptability. The old conservative party of Germany metamorphosed itself into a "National Democratic Party," which, in its platform, is kind enough to admit Jews to public office, but only in proportion to their number. Its branch in Mecklenburg, the classic home of junkerdom, goes a little farther and excludes Jews from membership. But even those who are not officially affiliated with this peculiar brand of democracy occasionally show their colors. General von Seeckt, the commander of the Berlin forces, had, one day, all Polish Jews—officially they were, of course, designated as foreigners—arrested, kept them in prison for a day, fed them on starvation rations, and charged them board after they were dismissed. He "accidentally" selected the Jewish Sabbath for this raid. It is somewhat reassuring that such brutal acts are condemned by the poet Herbert Eulenburg—a non-Jew—who, in a public declaration, points to his warning in the early period of the war against similar brutalities committed against the Jews of Poland, who were bound to influence American public opinion against Prussianism.

The Choice of the Nation

It seems that the most vehement anti-Semitism is found among the students at the universities, where again agitation is primarily directed against foreign Jewish students. The Prussian minister of education, Haenisch, declared that he believed in a liberal policy with regard to aliens, but he could not deny that there was some ground for irritation when foreigners occupy the best places in laboratories and demonstration halls and, by their industry and frugality, become dangerous competitors of their colleagues in the professions. The "Freie Studentenschaft" of Greifswald excludes Jews from membership. If this term—nobody can be sure of the meaning of such terms

In these days of recoined euphemisms—means what it used to mean, it would prove that the liberal element of the academic youth has turned reactionary, like the Burschenschaft of old, which, after Waterloo, was the bulwark of liberalism against the "Korps," which was the center of reaction, but in the course of the anti-Semitic movement after 1880 became anti-Semitic and Chauvinistic. The "Freie Studentenschaft" then, as we can see in Sudermann's "Sturmgeselle Sokrates" meant the liberal element in opposition to the reactionary "Burschenschaft." Judging from the latest reports, it has followed the course of its predecessor. It is not without significance that the movement is manifested in Greifswald, for this university had in 1884 a Jew, Behrend (1833-1907), as dean. He was one of Germany's leading jurists and served for years as justice of the Supreme Court (Reichsgericht) in Leipsic.

A Commentary on the Sermon on the Mount

The Prussian diet debated on the division of the private property of the Hohenzollern dynasty from the state's property. In the course of this debate, member Oscar Cassel said: "I am a Jew, and while my ancestors suffered for centuries injustice from the kings of Prussia, I am for absolute fairness in dealing with this question." It is worth while recalling on this occasion that Frederick William I said in his will (1722), in which he left this advice to his successor: "The Jews must be oppressed for they betrayed Jesus Christ, but it is always good to have a limited number of them, for they come handy when you need 20,000 to 30,000 thalers 'vor euren plesir'." His son and successor, Frederick the Great, who, in 1870, ordered the expulsion of numerous Jews from the newly acquired Polish territory, for he wanted "mehr Menschen und weniger Juden", ordered, in 1773, that the Jews of Berlin pay 10,000 thalers to a burglarized bank because among the burglars was one Jew. Upon the protest of the Berlin Jewry that they were no party to the crime and they surely could not have prevented it, since the police, charged with the duty to prevent crimes, could not do it, the king merely replied: "Es muss bei dehm gesetze bleyben". We read in the gospel (Matthew 5:3): "Ye have heard that it was said, an eye for an eye, but I say unto you," etc. The commentary, given by the Jew Cassel on one hand, and by the recently established union of Catholic nobles of the Rhineland, which passed a resolution to curb the "rassenfremde" elements, on the other, does not make the Jew afraid of the test of the gospel: by their fruits ye shall know them. Justice requires that in this connection we take notice of a glowing tribute paid by Professor Paul Natorp, of the University of Marburg, to his late colleague, Hermann Cohen, in a memorial address. "If absolute loyalty," says Natorp, "be a German virtue, this Jew was German as were very few. He was a Jew, not merely from 'Pietaet,' but from the conviction that Judaism has its place in the spiritual life of humanity."

Afflicted Anatoth

In a clever pun on Isaiah 10:30, the Midrash (Lam. Petihta 1) makes the prophet say to Israel: "If you fail to heed the terrible lesson of a calamitous war, the prophecy of the man of Anatoth (Jeremiah) will come true in all its horror." An Austrian Jewish poet, Arnold Zweig, has, in a masterly drama. "Jeremias," tried to interpret this lesson to his countrymen. They evidently fail to grasp it. The Christian socialists, both in the diet of Lower Austria and in the city council of Vienna, continue as in Lueger's days to befog the popular mind by continuing their agitation against the Jewish refugees in Vienna as the source of all trouble. A "Catholic Day," held in Vienna, March 25, heard the same old song of the socialists held in the leashes of international Jewry who overthrew the "glorious dynasty, who, on the eve of its collapse, still offered its homage to the eucharist savior." On the very same day one of its champions, Prince Alois Lichtenstein, died. He was the powerful ally of Lueger, and, as if history had intended a prank, his wife, Hannah Klinkosch, was a Jewess whose uncle, Reb Yossef Preisach, of Presburg, was quite proud of his affiliation with a sovereign family.

An obscure report from Czecho-Slovakia informs us that the Jews will not have a representative in the first parliament of the new republic. The information is not quite intelligible, for we were under the impression that the Jews would register as a separate nationality, and thus be entitled to a proportionate representation even if their candidates should not obtain a majority in any electoral district.

A Reminder of the Golden Rule

The "Sankt Josephsblatt," of St. Benedict, Ore. (April 16), reports terrible atrocities committed by the Rumanian authorities in the newly acquired territory of Transsylvania. One of the many acts of brutality committed against Roman Catholic priests shall be recorded as typical. A Jesuit priest was taken from a railroad train, given 25 lashes and asked to cross himself. When he did it according to the Roman ritual, his face was slapped until he complied with the order to make the sign of the cross according to the Greek ritual, and when he had done so, he was slapped a few more times in order that he should not forget it. The fathers of St. Benedict might take a lesson and recommend to re-awakening Hungary and to re-awakened Poland the enactment of the rule: "Whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, even so do ye also unto them." We Jews, being more modest in our demands, are satisfied with Hillel's formulation not to do unto others what we do not wish others to do to us. The latest reports are somewhat more favorable to the deceased senator Jacob Hecht. It is said that, while timid in asserting the rights of the Jews, he was indefatigable in his intercession on behalf of individual Jews who were the victims of official persecution. It is also reported that Benno Straucher, former member of the Austrian Reichsrat as Jewish nationalist, will be a candidate for the vacant seat of Jacob Hecht, whose election was practically an appointment by the government.

Miscellaneous News

The Jewish Congress, a creation of the Jewish problem, as it had developed before America entered into the war, and when Czarist Russia had the promise to hold not only her territory but to receive Prussian and Austrian Poland in addition to Constantinople, thus obtaining control of another very large Jewish population without being obliged to give any guarantee as to its treatment, is to be revived under an entirely different aspect of the situation. It is called for June 6. The convention will have to prove how it will conquer its place as representative body of all American Jews.

The Sabbath bill, which was to exempt Sabbath-observing Jews from some of the restrictions imposed on Sunday labor, failed to pass the senate of the state of New York. It is sad and somewhat illustrative of the claim of Jewish world dominion that such an act of justice and a consistent application of the secular nature of the state failed to receive recognition in the state of the union which has the largest Jewish population. It is, however, regrettable that Rabbi Drachman and Mr. Isaac Allen, of Brownsville, a district represented in the Assembly by one of the five disbarred socialists, should have stooped to low politics in defending this act of justice. Rabbi Drachman said that such a bill was needed to prevent bolshevism, and Mr. Allen justified it on the ground of its effect on curbing socialism. Leaving aside the undeniable fact that Jewish radicals are, to a great extent, the product of strictly orthodox homes, it is prostituting religion to offer it as a prop to a political machine. It is, under these conditions, gratifying to record the action taken by the Orthodox Rabbinical Convention, assembled in Lakewood, Apr. 20 which sent a cable to San Remo, pleading for peace and for the realization of the Balfour Declaration. This was a considerable step forward compared with other conventions which restricted their activity to petty ritualistic questions.

Another one of the periodically recurring melodramatic attempts to atone for Spain's crime in 1492 is reported. Senor Raphael de Roda, of Madrid, delivered a lecture in which he recommended better relations between Spain and the Jews of Morocco. We have had various such bids since 1881, and the fact remains that the population of Spain is too bigoted and the land too much ruind by centuries of misgovernment to afford any immigrants, let alone Jews, a fair opportunity for a livelihood.

Obituary

American Judaism, and especially the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith, mourns deeply the loss of Samuel Grabfelder (April 17), the devoted worker for the National Home for Jewish Consumptives, one of the proudest achievements of the Order. Brother Grabfelder's pleas for his favorite institution will be sadly missed at the conventions of District No. 2.

From Vienna the death of Adolf von Nassau, at the advanced age of 86, is reported. Herr von Nassau, whom the catastrophe of 1918 deprived of this so much coveted little word "von", was, years ago, one of the editors of the Neue Freie Presse. His wife was the daughter of Hazan Fisher, assistant to the famous Sulzer, who was quite proud of the fact that he probably was the only Hazan in the world who could boast of an ennobled son-in-law. A genuine tribute to Jewish achievement is the appreciation of the late Moritz Benedikt, published by the viciously anti-Semitic Vienna Reichspost, which calls Benedikt a man of rare information and one of the most prominent figures in Austrian politics. Benedikt, whose death was briefly referred to in the last issue of the B. B. "News", died March 18.

He Paid His Dues

The bulletin of an eastern B'nai B'rith lodge contains the following story, which is good enough to reprint:

"Rebbe" Isaac Goldzwicker was an active member of his "school" and the secretary of Akiba Lodge, I. O. B. B. As an ardent Ben B'rith and secretary, it was his duty to look after the lodge dues from members, which worried him a great deal. Particularly delinquent was Jacob Quellwasser, one of the well-to-do men in the community.

One day "Rebbe" Goldzwicker met Jacob Quellwasser's son, Schmul, and addressed him as follows: "I will ask you a question, and if you cannot answer it, ask your father. Why did Abel kill Cain"?

Schmul could not answer, and reported this to his father. The latter soon met the "Rebbe" and said: "Rebbe, bin ich meshugge, oder bist du meshugge. Abel did not kill—"

"Aha, aha," said the "Rebbe", "it's already over 3,000 years since Cain killed Abel and you have not forgotten it, but that you owe for last year's dues to the lodge, you have forgotten".

Salt Lake City, Utah

The Intellectual Advancement Committee of Peixotto Lodge No. 421, has selected a number of well known local speakers who will appear on a lecture program. The first lecture was delivered on May 4 by Harry Rosenbaum who, for fourteen years was connected with R. G. Dun & Co. Mr. Rosenbaum spoke on "The Moral Basis of Credit". That the subject was vitally interesting to his audience was shown by the large number of questions asked of him by the members and the interesting general discussion which followed. The membership drive of Peixotto Lodge is making good progress and has been assisted materially by the interesting programs which the Intellectual Advancement Committee is providing.

Memorial Services for Samuel Grabfelder

Memorial services, in honor of Samuel Grabfelder, former President of the National Jewish Hospital for Consumptives, were held April 30 in Temple Emanuel of Denver.

The temple was crowded with admirers of Samuel Grabfelder, who were eager to pay him honor. The Board of Managers of the National Jewish Hospital for Consumptives, the Medical Advisory Board and staff, the nurses, and other hospital employes, in solemn procession, marched down the middle aisle of the Temple as the memorial services began. The entire congregation arose to recite the Kaddish prayer for Mr. Grabfelder.

Addresses were made by Dr. Robert Levy, Chairman of the Medical Advisory Board, who dwelt upon Mr. Grabfelder's great appreciation of the medical work of the institution. He spoke of Mr. Grabfelder's great generosity to the National Jewish Hospital, which was crowned by his gift of the Grabfelder Medical Building, in which the research work of the hospital is conducted.

Mr. Joseph S. Jaffa spoke of Mr. Grabfelder's perennial youth, and how he was alive to all human interests.

Mrs. S. Pisko, Secretary of the hospital, spoke of the early struggles of the hospital and of Mr. Grabefelder's prophetic vision in seeing, in the years to come, the establishment of a great national institution; and the pledge that his co-workers carry on until such a time when the great white plague shall be conquered.

Dr. Philip Hilkowitz, President of the Jewish Consumptives' Relief Society, brought a message of sympathy from the sister institution, and spoke of the imagination of Samuel Grabfelder in seeing the day when great results would follow the pioneer work of the hospital.

Dr. Wm. S. Friedman, Rabbi of the Temple and Chairman of the Board of Managers of the hospital, spoke of Mr. Grabfelder as a philanthropist, as a lover of all mankind, and urged emulation of his example and influence. Dr. Friedman said that Samuel Grabfelder was a type of the noblest manhood, because he was a loyal Jew. He said that financial success meant moral responsibility to Mr. Grabfelder, and prayed that the transfigured spirit of Samuel Grabfelder might descend upon countless thousands.

The choir of Temple Emanuel rendered appropriate music.

Albany, N. Y.

On April 18 the Degree Team of Springfield Lodge journeyed to Albany and initiated a class of candidates into Gideon Lodge No. 140. Several members of Pittsfield Lodge were also present and assisted in the degree work. The B'nai B'rith Live Wire, a publication issued by Springfield Lodge, states:

"Our boys will be ever mindful of the splendid welcome which the members of Gideon Lodge gave them, and will never forget the good time which they had in Albany. We hope that we will be able to reciprocate the excellent reception which the degree team was accorded and we record a vote of thanks to the brethren of Gideon Lodge for their appreciated and brotherly hospitality."

News from London

By Our Correspondent, DR. M. EPSTEIN

London, April, 1920.

THE Chief Rabbi has suddenly become the center of interest. Quite unexpectedly, he was taken ill some little while back, and had to undergo an operation at very short notice. Manifestly his work was left as it was, hanging in mid-air, and people all of a sudden recognized that the Chief Rabbi existed. Fortunately, he has some excellent assistants, and many a wag is asking why they could not do his work in normal times, and whether it is really necessary to keep up so expensive an office. But these are only wags; the majority of people, however, would not be happy without the consciousness of the existence of the Chief Rabbi. The whole community unites in wishing him a speedy recovery, not only because that in itself is a desirable thing, but also because in the autumn he has been booked to make a tour of the Empire. The United Synagogue authorities have decided in their wisdom to send the Chief Rabbi and Mr. Albert Woolf to various parts of the Empire in order to stir up interest in the War Memorial.

The Honor List

The life and soul of the War Memorial has just been honored by the grant of a knighthood, and Mr. Waley Cohen that was is now Sir Robert Waley Cohen. The honor thus conferred has been universally approved, for not only is Sir Robert one of the leading men in the community, but in the city he is regarded as a man of great promise. In that same honors list were also included the names of two other communal workers, namely, Mr. Albert M. Woolf, the Senior Vice-President of the United Synagogue, the Chief Rabbi's traveling companion around the world, and his own brother, Mr. Mortimer Woolf, who did so much for the Belgian refugees.

Palestine Report Awaited

Another name looming large on the horizon just now is that of Mr. Herbert Samuel. Mr. Samuel is expected home from Palestine shortly, and both the supporters and the opponents of the Zionist movement are eager to hear what his impressions are, and his views as to the future of that country. Needless to add, the recent troubles have created a stir among all sections of the community. Whatever may be the ultimate fate of the country, it is clear that the Arabs, by their conduct, have shown themselves incapable of carrying on a civilized government. No doubt Mr. Samuel will have much to tell us on the subject, and his report will find very many readers.

United Synagogue Report

The annual accounts of the United Synagogue show that the year 1919 has been prosperous. Of the 17 constituent synagogues, six only showed deficits. The gross revenue of the Institution was £71,000 and the expenditure £66,000. One of the most interesting facts in the report is that the number of charity funerals declined in 1919 to 229 from 423 in 1918. This fact is held to indicate a decrease in poverty, and the material improvement of the position of the poor is undoubtedly a welcome sign. Moreover, this is the fiftieth annual report of the United Synagogue, and the executive authorities are preparing a history of the Institution to be published in due course.

The Literary Revival

The literary revival, to which we have called attention on more than one occasion, is showing signs of permanence, and one of the indications of its reality is the revival of the Union of Literary Societies, a body which went to sleep at the outbreak of war. Years ago this Union was particularly helpful in giving an impetus to literary society work in the provinces by supplying lecturers and bringing the metropolis into contact with the outlying parts of the country. It is felt that the good work which the Union accomplished in the past might well be continued, hence the attempt to breathe life into the organization once more. It is a pleasing thing to observe that young people are the prime movers in this particular revival. Young people, too, are coming to the fore in literary output. There is a veritable renaissance, at least so far as publications are concerned. Besides the weeklies and the monthlies already in existence we are now to have a new magazine published by the orthodox wing under the style of Benzakkai. The young Zionists, again, are likewise putting forth literary fruit in a monthly to be called The New Judea, and lastly, we have to record the appearance of a somewhat curious weekly, The Jewish Journal of Commerce, which describes itself as "the new bi-lingual export and import trade paper devoted to the interests of manufacturers, merchants and agents." It is strange to observe this journalistic movement, which runs parallel with the literary outburst, not only in this country, but throughout the whole of Europe. If, as has been remarked, the war has resulted in making our young people more seriously inclined, that, at any rate, is something to be grateful for.

Jewish Libraries

Not only is there this revival of interest in literary output, but there appears also to be an increased demand for books, and the Union of Jewish Women has just opened a library of its own, which was founded some years ago by the late president of the Union, Mrs. Nathaniel Cohen (the mother, by the way, of Sir Robert Waley Cohen). The library is intended primarily for the guidance of parents and teachers in choosing books for children, the cause which the late Mrs. Cohen had very much at heart. A catalogue has been prepared, classified according to subjects and according to the ages for which the books are suitable, and comments are included showing the character and tendency of each book. Unquestionably a library of this kind, comprising, as it does, prayer-books and novels, sermons and poetry, philosophy and biography, is a rare acquisition which deserves special notice. Teachers are also receiving attention from the Union of Religion classes, which have long felt the want of adequately trained teachers. The Union is arranging a summer school at Oxford, which will be conducted by Mr. Herbert Loewe, of Exeter College. The aim of the summer school is to combine a holiday at Oxford with intensive training in Hebrew and religious subjects. If the experiment proves successful there ought ought to be great scope here for further growth. The promoters of the summer school were greatly encouraged by the reports of the success of similar institutions in America.

Palestine Visitors Return

Two visitors from Palestine have just left London. One is Mr. Norman Bentwich, who holds a high judicial position under the present administration, and has enjoyed a well-earned rest; the other is Mr. Ittamar Benavi, whose sparkling eloquence has delighted many audiences, and whose winning personality has gained not a few supporters of the cause which he has at heart—a Jewish Palestine. It is good to welcome visitors of this character from abroad; it tends to lessen the feeling of insularity which comes naturally to those who live in this island of ours.

The Book of Honor

An interesting publication has just been announced, "The British Jewry Book of Honor," edited by the Rev. Michael Adler, who was Senior Chaplain to the Forces during the war. The book contains the names and photographs of over 50,000 Jews from the United Kingdom, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, and elsewhere, who fought in the war. Field Marshal Earl Haig writes of this book, "the British Jewry Book of Honor is a striking testimony to a fact which every soldier will gladly recognize, namely, the loyalty with which British Jews of every class came forward to fight." Mr. Winston Churchill, our War Minister, says, "I can truthfully say that this record is a great one, and British Jews can look back with pride on the honorable part they played in winning the Great War." Mr. Herbert Samuel speaks of the book as "a record for ourselves and our descendants of those who fought and suffered, of those who won honorable distinctions by their service, and of those who, through their sacrifice of life itself, are the most honored and distinguished of all."

Official Exoneration

It has been suggested in several quarters, some of them official, that Jews were concerned in the murder of the Czar. This has been categorically denied by Mr. Starinkevich, who was Minister of Justice in the government of Omsk. This gentleman declares that the official report on the inquiry into the murders instituted by the government of Omsk established the fact that, while the number of persons directly or indirectly concerned in the case of the assassination of the imperial family was rather considerable, there was not among them a single person of Jewish descent.

The Conquering Jew

Another anti-Jewish legend is thus dissolved like smoke. Mr. Israel Zangwill recently dispelled the legend of the "Conquering Jew." At the service of the Free Religious Movement for World Religion and World Brotherhood, Mr. Zangwill preached a sermon in which he said that, as the blood accusation had become too grotesque for the more cultured anti-Semites, and as religious persecution is out of date, it was necessary for those who nursed hatred for the Jew to invent some new accusation, and so they had recourse to the legend of the "Conquering Jew." As a matter of fact, Mr. Zangwill said it was not the Jew who had aimed at the conquest of the world, but the world had aimed at the annihilation of the Jew. "The old prophetic power that had manifested itself in the race in Babylonia and Jerusalem is not yet dead. Both France and America, as well as England, have recently produced Jewish poets who are carrying on the tradition, who behold with righteous horror the deeds of the Gentile nations, and who still feel that it is Israel's mission to bring about a Holy League of Nations, a millennium of peace. In that sign Israel will conquer, and that is the true legend of the conquering Jews."

Settlement Activities

The Jewish Settlement in St. George's in the East is now an established fact, and Mr. Henriques, the warden, can cogratulate himself on the success of some of the public lectures which has has provided for the residents in the neighborhood of the Settlement. It is reported also that quite a large gathering celebrated the Seder evening during the recent festivals, and the little synagogue attached to the Settlement was fairly full at the services. What with this settlement and the re-opening of many old Boys' Clubs, as well as the establishment of several new ones, the youth of the East End should find ample scope for spending their leisure in surroundings which are cheerful and attractive. We cannot have too many of these social movements in our midst, and we are glad to see that one of the most energetic members of the London Lodge, Dr. Israel Feldman, is connected with the most successful of these new clubs for young men.

London Lodge, I. O. B. B.

It is pleasing to report that the membership of the London Lodge shows signs of increase, and if we go on at the rate of the last few months it ought to be possible to look forward to the day when more than one lodge will be established in London. Still, this is somewhat distant; and if the solution of another problem likewise lies in the future, at any rate the realization of this may come comparatively soon. We refer to the possibility of the Lodge inhabiting a building of its own. As yet this may be a dream, but many a reality has had to start in the realm of dreams, and we hope this will be one of them. So far, one can chronicle this year a great revival of interest in the work of the Lodge, and we believe that all members are filled with a zeal for the ideals of the Order. But Rome was not built in a day, and our plans may take some time before they reach realization.

Mobile, Ala.

Col. Nathan Horowitz, U. S. Army, has been notified by the Adjutant-General of the Army of his admission to the National Order of the Legion of Honor of France.

Col. Horowitz, now stationed at Fort Strong, Mass., is a member of Beth Zur Lodge, No. 84, of Mobile, joining years ago when he was a lieutenant, and stationed at Fort Morgan, near this city.

Col. Horowitz was one of the first officers to be sent overseas, having 28 months' service there to his credit. After the armistice, he served in the Army of Occupation in Germany, and later was sent as a member of the American Military Mission to Hungary, with headquarters in the city of Budapest.

Jewish Relief Fund

Since the American Jewish Relief Committee inaugurated its non-sectarian appeal for Jewish war sufferers in Eastern Europe in January, 1919, $13,631,004.03 has been raised from Jews and Gentiles alike throughout the country Henry H. Rosenfelt, director of the committee announced. Campaigns pending or now going on will raise the total past the $20,000,000 mark, Mr. Rosenfelt reported.

Included in the recent contributions, toward all of which Gentiles were liberal donors, were the following state campaign totals:

Georgia, $350,000; Louisiana, $130,000; Delaware, $155,000; Ohio, $1,438,000; Pennsylvavnia, $3,198,508; Rhode Island, $230,000; North Dakota, $75,000; Maryland, $760,000; Indiana, $700,000; Illinois, $2,300,000; Colorado, $240,000; Mississippi, $55,821.

Southern California, which is just beginning a campaign for $500,000, has already raised $250,000. A campaign for $1,000,000 begins the latter part of April in Canada.

Palestine National Library

Hitherto the National Library in Palestine has been in the possession of the Jerusalem Lodge of the I. O. B. B., but an arrangement has now been made by which the collection has been transferred to the Zionist Organization while the building continues in the ownership of the Jerusalem Lodge.

Books have been collected in London, Brussels, Berlin, Amsterdam, Rome and also in Russia, and it is urgent that these should be forwarded to Palestine as quickly as possible.

Loan Fund for Foreign Members

The Ben B'rith and His Liberty Bond

NO CLASS of citizens in the United States responded more loyally to the Government's appeal for money to finance the war than did the Jew. They set a high example by purchasing Liberty Bonds to the full extent of their means. The present market price of the bonds is causing many to feel that they did not make a wise investment and influencing others to trade their Government securities for stocks of doubtful value. It is, therefore, very important that, at this time, when so many are throwing their holdings on the market, that we call to mind the facts in regard to Liberty Bonds and Victory Notes.

It should be borne in mind, at the outset, that there is no suggestion in the present price decline that the Government has failed to live up to its bargains with the investors of the nation when it sold the Liberty Bonds and Victory Notes. The Government has paid, and will pay, the stipulated interest on the par value of the securities and will pay dollar for dollar on them when they mature. The security behind these obligations is the honor and faith of the United States and the whole wealth of this great nation. Our present national debt of approximately $25,500,000,000 (against which we hold some $10,000,000,000 of obligations of foreign governments) is the barest fraction of our national resources.

The causes for the present market depreciation of the bonds and notes are not far to seek, and they hold no menace to the permanent value of the securities.

The Bonds and Notes were issued in such stupendous amounts and within such a comparatively short period of time that their absorption by the investors of the country necessarily requires time, with temporary prejudice to their sale value. Like other bonds, Liberty Bonds are subject to market conditions, including the law of supply and demand. When the demand for a commodity is great the price rises; when supply exceeds demand the price falls off. The market quotations on Liberty Bonds have declined chiefly because of the failure of the investing public to have in proportion to the enormous expenditure of capital during and since the war, and particularly for the reason that, of the twenty million Americans who patriotically subscribed during the period of the war, large numbers have been unwilling or unable to retain their bonds after the cessation of hostilities. Many patriotic people bought Liberty Bonds under the impulse of patriotism who have been unwilling since the war was over (although the intrinsic value of the bonds had obviously increased, owing to the successful conclusion of the war) to continue to lend their money to the Government and they forced their holdings upon the market more rapidly than others could save funds to invest, with consequent depreciation in market prices. While some bonds undoubtedly have been released because of the necessities of their owners, it is also very obvious that many have been sold from the prevailing tendency to extravagance and reckless spending for luxuries. Other bonds have been sold in order to provide funds for the purchase of speculative stocks of alluring promise but highly uncertain performance. That selling has been created in considerable volume by the systematic and widespread efforts of get rich-quick promoters and other rascals of like ilk, who have seen a most fertile field among inexperienced investors who became security holders for the first time in their purchase of the war issues of Government bonds.

The present market depreciation notwithstanding, Liberty Bonds and Victory Notes are the best securities in the world to hold and to buy and among the poorest to sell. The sure and unmistakable indication of that fact is the character of the purchasing which goes with the present selling. Bonds of the small denominations are, in large numbers, being taken over from the small investors by those best informed and most experienced in investment matters, the large buyers. Looking at the buying from another angle, a pertinent question is this: Why is it that the bond sharks the country over are spending thousands of dollars for advertising and for office expenses in their campaign to gather to themselves the bonds which are held by people of limited means and experience in investment matters? Obviously, in both instances, the bonds are bought because the buyers realize their present worth and their future possibilities.

The buyers have a true appreciation of the security behind the bonds and of the facts which make for their bright future. The buyers also have in mind the course of other war issues of Government bonds. Take the Civil War bonds, for example. The United States 6's of 1881 were marketed in 1861 at par, and by 1866 they sold for 106⅞ currency. In 1877 they were selling at the equivalent of approximately 110 in gold. The loan of 1862, the first of the so-called "Five-Twenties," were sold at an average price of 100.35 currency, the equivalent, at that time, of about 88 gold. In 1871 they sold at 101.8 gold. The loan of March 3, 1864, the "Ten-Forties," were marketed from 100 to 107 currency. The currency dollar, during this period, averaged in value 49.2 gold. In 1869 they sold at 81.2 gold and in 1878 at 108.1 gold. While it cannot be said that the factors in the cases of these Civil War bonds and the United States issues of the recent world war period are precisely the same, the historical fact is not without its significance. It is certain that the Liberty Bonds and Victory Notes will go to par at maturity, and those best informed in investment matters are firm in their conviction that the Liberty Bonds will go considerably above par long before their maturity.

Our people should hold their Liberty Bonds and buy more as opportunity offers, because it is obviously to their self-interest to do so. These Government obligations afford a good return upon a security which is unmatched for safety and which needs no worry or watching. To unnecessarily part with them now at a sacrifice is the height of folly and, as a business proposition, can be excused only on the ground of ignorance.

Personal welfare in holding and buying the bonds coincides with patriotic duty. The job is not yet finished. We should be willing to lend our money to the Government until the last war bill is paid, for, until it is paid, the war burden is still with us. To throw our bonds on the market not only prejudices the present prices of the bonds which our patriotic partners in the Government's undertaking are still holding, but it also tends to make it harder for the Treasury to solve the financial problems created by the war. For our own interest, as well as that of our Government, we should determine to hold its obligations above barter.

London, England

The following extracts from a letter written by Dr. Max Epstein, the London correspondent of the B'nai B'rith News, demonstrates the interest being taken in B'nai B'rith work in the United Kingdom and presages the wide expansion of activities in that country:

"In the first place, you will be glad to learn that our efforts to increase the membership are being crowned with success. Every month we are enrolling ten or twelve new members, and I need hardly add that they are of the right kind. This, in itself, is very heartening, and holds out prospects for the future. Personally, I should like to see at least three lodges in London. The community here could well stand that. But, of course, it is very slow work, though I am not by any means without hope that one day, and that not so very long hence, we may achieve this wished-for result. Another thing we are aiming at, and are already talking about, is the possibility of having a building of our own. We have appointed a sub-committee to go into this question, and this I regard as a first step of great value.

"We have collected for the Loan Fund some £100, and this is at your disposal. We feel that it would not be financially wise to send the amount to America, since there would be a loss on the exchange, but we are keeping it here, and will allocate it on the Continent on your instructions. In this way we should insure a maximum result from the adverse exchanges in Austria and Germany. Please let me know what you would like us to do with this sum, and your instructions shall be carried out.

"With regard to propaganda, we decided to limit our work to three main objects. The first is to increase the membership in London—of this I have already written to you above. The second is to revive the lodge in Manchester, which, I am sorry to say, seems to have gone to sleep. The third is to make a strong effort to establish lodges in Liverpool, Leeds and Birmingham. We hope that before long the resuscitation of the Manchester lodge will be an accomplished fact, and as for establishing the three lodges named, we are already in touch with prominent people in each of these localities, and we shall not rest content until we achieve something.

"I may say that there is a keenness about all our members in London, and, with proper leadership, this should to utilized in the best interests of the Order.

"I had hoped to be able to accept your very kind invitation to be present at the Convention at Cleveland on May 9, but I fear that, in view of my engagements here, there is little chance of my being able to come. Be assured, however, that I shall be with you in spirit, and that in the name of the London Lodge I send the Convention our very cordial and fraternal greetings.

"Our Kraus celebration took the form of an 'at home' at one of the West End hotels in London, and the function was voted on every hand a great success. Its purpose was two-fold: One, to celebrate the excellent work of President Kraus, and the other, to increase the membership of our lodge. I think we succeeded in both."

Food Drafts for Europe

"It is absolutely certain that during the early summer months there will be an acute food shortage in Poland."

This is the warning which Dr. Boris D. Bogen, director of the relief work in Poland of the Joint Distribution Committee of the American funds for Jewish War Sufferers, sounds in his last report to the Committee. From the report it appears that there is actually an insufficient quantity of food in Poland. This may not be apparent to many, because the fact that the poor have no money with which to buy supplies means that there is enough food left over for those who have the wealth to purchase what they want. But the greater the number of people who are able to buy food, the more keenly the shortage of various articles will be felt; and during the first months of summer, before the grain is harvested, the food scarcity will be felt even under the present conditions. Dr. Bogen, therefore, points out the necessity of sending even more food parcels from America, and of sending them as soon as possible, so that the famished Jews may be able to tide over the lean months. The prevailing belief that food is cheaper in Poland than it is here is a complete mistake, also based upon the fact the masses have not the wherewithall to purchase food, so that enough has been left for the more fortunate. Now, however, as the shortage becomes constantly more acute, prices in Poland will be no less than they are in this country.

Food Parcels

To meet the imminent danger, the Joint Distribution Committee is now selling food drafts at $12.50 each, which will enable the Jews of Poland to obtain parcels of nourishing foodstuffs, which can sustain a family for some time. Some of these articles, such as cocoa, condensed milk, and oil, which the Polish Jews were not accustomed to use in quantities, are now being used more and more on account of their nutritive value, and serve instead of other fats, which are hard to get. The flour, rice, and beans which every parcel contains, may suffice a family for several weeks.

The Joint Distribution Committee has recently perfected a plan for sending to Poland both food and the necessary machinery for its distribution. The food is now in Warsaw where it is packed into separate parcels and shipped to the provincial towns and cities. To receive a parcel abroad, one must present a coupon. These coupons are purchased in this country, and then mailed to the perosn in Poland who is to get the food package; a duplicate of the coupon is given to the buyer here, and retained by him to serve as a receipt.

The packages have so far been despatched to the leading cities of Poland, to be ready when the coupons arrive. One thousand of them have been sent to Bialystock and an equal number to Lemberg. Shipments have also been made to Vilna, Rovno, Minsk, and Brest-Litovsk. The motor trucks which the Joint Distribution Committee has in Poland are able to carry these parcels to the remotest towns with the greatest possible speed, and the food coupons now being sent out will within a few weeks bring food to whomever they are sent. It must be definitely understood, however, that delays may occur in delivering parcels in certain sections, either because of the military situation, the badly neglected roads, or some other cause equally impossible to avoid.

Every food parcel contains 24½ pounds of wheat flour; 10 pounds of rye flour; 5 pounds of rice; 5 pounds of dried beans; 5 pounds of cocoa; 4 quarts of vegetable oil; and 10 fourteen ounce cans of sweetened condensed milk. The price of a food parcel is $12.50.

The motor trucks of the Joint Distribution Committee in Poland are used for various purposes in the distribution of relief. Floating the American flag, they visit every community in Poland and deliver money, clothing, tools, and whatever other commodities are destined for that place. They are contending successfully with the handicaps imposed by the unfortunate shortage of trains, horses, and wagons, and the poor communication facilities in Poland generally.

Where the Food Coupons May Be Purchased

There are eleven places in New York where one may procure coupons for food parcels to Poland. They are: Joint Distribution Committee, 20 Exchange Place; 98 Second Avenue; 1321 Boston Road, Bronx; 1878 Pitkin Avenue, Brooklyn; the Hebrew Free Loan, 108 Second Avenue; 69 East 116th Street; Municipal Bank, 171 East Broadway; and 1873 Pitkin Avenue, Brooklyn.

In the country at large, coupons may be obtained in the following localities:

Toronto, Canada, Toronto Conference, Anna Selick, 206 Beverley Street.

Toledo, Ohio, Mrs. Anna Dallett, Federation of Jewish Charities.

Newark, N. J., People's and Central Relief Committee, Wolf B. Zwillman, 196 Springfield Avenue.

Syracuse, N. Y., Federation of Jewish Charities, Mrs. B. Stolz, 339 Onondaga County Savings Bank Building.

Milwaukee, Wis., Mr. Nathan Sand, Milwaukee Joint Relief Committee, 562 Fifth Street.

Michigan City Lodge

On Sunday, April 18, 1920, Leonard H. Freiberg, secretary of District Grand Lodge No. 2; Adolph Biccard, Indianapolis Lodge; Lou M. Frank, Toledo Lodge; members of the General Committee, District Grand Lodge No. 2; and Sam Lipp, of Cincinnati Lodge, instituted Michigan City Lodge, No. 851. The charter list contained twenty-five members, fourteen of whom were members of South Bend Lodge, and the others were initiated in a most impressive manner by the degree team of South Bend Lodge.

The Jewish Peril

In 1903, one of the leading anti-Semites of Russia, Mr. Serge Nilus, wrote a book entitled "Magnum in Parvo, and the Anti-Christ as a Proximate Political Possibility." We have no means of knowing to what extent this book circulated in Russia, but it it reasonably certain that its circulation was entirely local and that it was not regarded as containing anything of value outside of ecclesiastical and anti-Semitic circles. It seems that a copy, however, found its way to the British Museum, and that the defendants in the recent successful libel action brought by Sir Arthur Mond in London vented their spite by translating the last chapter and publishing it as a pamphlet under the title, "The Jewish Peril."

The circulation which these instigators of anti-Semitism in England were able to give to the pamphlet was very small. Through our representative in London, the Anti-Defamation League was advised early in January of this year of the impending publication and immediately took steps through the London Lodge of the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith to prevent any possibility of its distribution in America and to suppress as far as possible its distribution in England. In so acting, the League was carrying out its program adopted in 1913 of adopting preventive measures even though the possibilities of danger were not large. Under date of February 26, we were advised by the Secretary of London Lodge that "we have taken steps within the Anglo-Jewish community to combat attacks of this nature." The steps so taken are clearly evidenced by a perusal of the February and March issues of the two leading Anglo-Jewish publications, the Jewish Chronicle and the Jewish Guardian. An effective answer and expose of the origin and purpose of the pamphlet appeared in the London "Nation" under date of March 27, which was reprinted in the Jewish Chronicle of April 2. This expose was of considerable value in England because of the fact that the Morning Chronicle had previously printed a review of the pamphlet in which the editor gave serious consideration to the ridiculous charges made in the pamphlet, thereby insulting the intelligence of his readers and demonstrating without question his own anti-Jewish policy.

On April 29, the correspondence with reference to this whole matter was closed by a letter addressed to the office of the League by its London representative, Dr. Max Epstein, who in part wrote as follows:

"I owe you many apologies for this long delay in replying to your letter of March 10. I understood that the Secretary of the London Lodge sent you a communication in reply to your first letter on the whole subject, dated Jan. 12. Yet since that letter was written I have been making further researches, and I feel that I cannot do better than enclose for your information a number of cuttings from the Jewish papers. You will see that the subject of the circular receives full attention, and the publication to which you refer is amply dealt with.

"My own impression is that the book has fallen quite flat, and that no serious consequences are likely to ensue from its publication. . . . I am endeavoring to purchase a copy, which I will send to you with all speed. . . .

"I am anxious to do what I can to further your very excellent work."

It appears that in May of this year, four months after the League first took cognizance of the matter, it came to the attention of the American Jewish Committee which sent a letter dated May 10, 1920, to the Jewish newspapers of the United States, enclosing a copy of the article which appeared in March in the London "Nation." The letter of the American Jewish Committee suggests "that this article be published at an early date in the columns of your publication in order to nullify any unfavorable effect which the importation of the book in question may have upon public opinion in this country."

To date, we are certain that the book has not been distributed in America. The only notice that has been given to it has been in the case of one newspaper published in Kansas which reprinted in part the review from the Morning Chronicle of London. The book, according to Dr. Epstein, has fallen flat in England, and he has even experienced difficulty in securing a copy there.

It is hoped that the publicity given to this matter by the American Jewish Committee has been confined to the Jewish publications, otherwise an egregious blunder has been committed in giving unnecessary publicity to a pamphlet in which nobody in this country has as yet exhibited any interest.

We have no desire to find fault, but express regret at the unfortunate tendency exhibited by certain Jewish organizations in this country, even by those of high standing, in interfering in the recognized field of effort of other Jewish organizations.

Our Mistake

In the March issue in the news item captioned "Detroit, Michigan," a mistake was made in the name of the president of Pisgah Lodge. Of course nearly everybody in District No. 6 knows that Leon Goldsmith is the worthy president of that lodge, but for the information of those in other districts it should be stated that our proofreader was evidently feeling in a creative mood and made a "man" out of a "smith".

In the February issue of the B'nai B'rith News, the name of Mr. O. H. Rosenbaum of Pittsburgh was given as O. H. Rosenthal. We regret the error.

News from Oscar Leonard

In a letter from Bucharest, Bro. Oscar Leonard, of St. Louis, who is representing the Joint Distribution Committee in Rumania, mentions the banquet in honor of the President of the Order, which he attended in that city. He writes:

"Yesterday I went to the B'nai B'rith banquet in honor of Mr. Adolf Kraus. There were more than 250 persons present, even though it cost $100 per plate, besides tips, and tips go everywhere here. They tip servants even in private homes in this land, I understand, when you are invited for dinner. Well, there were many speeches and everyone took himself seriously. No, indeed, there was no joking or joshing—entirely different from similar banquets in our beloved America. There was much food and still more drink—this is a wine country, you know. It was pleasant to be with the crowd amidst plenty, for I knew that there would be many sad scenes awaiting me soon enough in connection with the work."

We stand in the dawn of a new day. Our mistakes of the past furnish instruction for building the achievements of tomorrow, fully as valuable as that which may be drawn from our successes. Let us choose carefully from among both; and then let us build in a fashion worthy of us, as the Master Architect of the Universe would have us build, for peace, security and brotherly love. We can do no less and still be faithful to our God, ourselves and the country to which we owe so much.

ADOLF KRAUS,
President.

"Shylock" and "Christ"

DURING the last few months there have been remarkable representations placed before the public Jews. Each of them has in its way been a revelation, and as such has claimed a large share of popular attention. Epstein's ''Christ'' was an exemplification by a Jew of his conception of the Founder of Christianity. As has been remarked, the work reveals an impression of Christ as superman. It is the figure of a great impelling leader, strong of purpose, earnest, indomitable, of the man who conquered men as all men have conquered their fellows, because he had first subdued himself. For Epstein's ''Christ'' is the representation of a human being whose whole power was attuned to the one purpose of drawing men to his doctrine, and who, in pursuance of that object, made of his own life a sacrifice—of a man who remained strong in his faith, uncowed, divine, because his cause was a sacred one to him, and rising from the grave still supreme, although there had been placed upon him the degradation of the punishment meted out to the lowest and most venal of criminals. As the Man chiselled by the great artist seems to look out across the world, he appears to breathe disdain upon the poor creatures who, possessed of material power, have exercised it to his hurt because they were denied the spiritual comprehension which would enable them to appreciate and understand the value of a ''Christ'' when compared with a Barabbas.

Epstein's Conception

That is one revelation of an altogether unconventional conception by a Jew of a Jew. Epstein's ''Christ'' is, however, something of a revolution as well as a revelation. It placed within the region of the piteous, if not the comic, the average notion of how Jesus of Nazareth really appeared in life. How absurd beside Epstein's masterpiece are the puny, tawdry figures representing ''Christ,'' produced for the most part in the German toy shops, and largely conceived in the besotted ignorance of the Greek Church! I make bold to say that Epstein's ''Christ'' will be recognized some day, as having done more than anything else to disentangle Christianity from the cerements in which superstition and bigotry and sentimentality and pusillanimity have threatened to bury it, any time during its existence as an organized religion. It will have done more to make people understand something of the true greatness of the Nazarene than all who have proclaimed themselves his followers. It will not thus only help immensely to invigorate the whole idea of Christianity. That there are Christians who acknowledge this is not surprising. A writer—presumably an adherent of the dominant faith—remarked the other day:

''It would be difficult to conceive a finer service to his fellows that any great artist could perform than to create for us a vision of Jesus with the record of His acts and His words. And that is exactly what Jacob Epstein has succeeded in doing. . . .

''If wisdom reigned in the tents of our rulers and if they really cared for the spiritual well-being of the people, this wonderful thing would be set up in Trafalgar Square (cleaned, of course, beforehand of its stone and marble absurdities), and the achievement of an inspired Jew would be among the chief glories of a professedly Christion city''.

But it is not difficult to see that in thus endowing Christianity with a true ''Christ''— a true conception of its central figure—Epstein has done a wider service than his contribution to Christian revelation. He has helped enormously to advance the status of religion by ridding a great faith of a silly conventionality. Those who are privileged to see Epstein's sculpture will have the means given to them of realizing by concrete lesson how religion worth the name is a means of strength and power, of self-reliance, making for moral stamina, and not as Christianity has been constantly represented, weakness, dependence, self-abasement making for moral anaemia. That is what Epstein's ''Christ'' proclaims to the world, and that is the message which it is the mission of Judaism to propagate among mankind.

Moscovitch's Representation

The other representation to which I allude is one to which I have on a previous occasion referred. It is also the work of a Jew. It was, too, the representation of a Jew, but a Jew the creature of a poet's imagery. Moscovitch's ''Shylock'' was in its way a great histrionic revelation, as Epstein's ''Christ'' is great in the realm of the plastic art. Like Epstein's ''Christ'' Moscovitch's ''Shylock has been severely canvassed. But I believe it was mainly by those who either pay regard to non-essentials, or by those who accept the conventional and look upon any departure from it as an offense. Here and there, to be sure, Moscovitch introduced little pieces of by-play or slightly overdid this or that point, just as Epstein's sculpture is surely open to criticism upon some minor detail or the other. But, as in the case of the sculpture, the representation of ''Shylock'' by Moscovitch was in the nature of a gospel. Because it offers to the world a great message —a message of infinite value, if the world will see and understand—about a character that has been as much and as persistently misunderstood as was the subject of Epstein's ''Christ''. The representation of ''Christ'' as a benevolent weakling upon whom premature senility had fallen, no more grossly parodied the real Jews than did the representations of ''Shylock'' which actor after actor presented to audience after audience. Sometimes ''Christ'' was represented as the bleeding martyr, suffering the extreme agony of pain and death against which he rebelled, instead of, as we instinctively gather from Epstein's great work, welcoming his torture and even his execution as the crowning exemplification to which the whole of his life led up, naturally and in inevitable sequence. Sometimes he was represented as a man superstitious rather than courageous, the well-turned out customer of a fashionable coiffeur rather than the sturdy, self-centered character who troubled not about such trifles as the exact parting of his hair, or the precise set of his beard. ''Shylock'' has similarly been represented in various guises —as a booby, a clown, as a harsh, venomous, bloodthirsty villain, and anon as quite the benevolent, kindly man who almost apologized for being a Jew and pleadingly begged his haters to recollect that he had like them, ''hands, organs, dimensions,'' that if they pricked him he, like them, would bleed. But none of this was, I believe, the Jew that Shakespeare drew. None of this would have added a laurel to the immortal wreath of the finest spinner of stage character which the world has ever seen. It has been left to Moscovitch, the Jew, to present ''Shylock'' exactly and precisely as Shakespeare conceived his Jew. Thus has the actor incidentally removed from the memory of the Bard of Avon the stigma of having been influenced by hate of the Jew in his portrayal of ''Shylock,'' and moreover has redeemed the character itself from being a mere anti-Jewish representation.

Overdoing Good

What do we gather as Shakespeare's real meaning of ''Shylock'' in the interpretation which Moscovitch has placed upon the character? We see it as part and parcel of a great object lesson which the whole play of the Merchant of Venice seemed designed to render. It is part of a remarkable mosaic which would have been spoilt, or would have been of no effect if ''Shylock'' had been other than Shakespeare conceived as Moscovitch renders him. That lesson—the red thread which runs through the whole of the piece—is that in life what is innocent, commendable, and even good, is frequently turned to evil by being run to excess, and it is this excess which the dramatist pillories. Thus Antonio, though a merhant engaged in speculative enterprises, is relieved by a kindly heart from being of the harsh and grinding nature of the mere getter of wealth, so he is willing to help his friend, Bassanio, over a little financial difficulty in which the latter found himself. That is all very well and all very admirable, but it presents a totally different aspect when we find him helping his friend by resorting to a professional money-lender, and actually patronizing the man whom he oft upon the Rialto had rated because of his usance. The name, indeed, cuts an absolutely absurd, ridiculous, and contemptible figure when, in order to do a friend a good turn, he, a merchant, knowing the risks that must attach to argosies afloat upon the wide seas liable to disasters at the mere turn of the wind, is so certain that his ship will come home that he enters into a bond for due payment with a forfeit, if he fails, of a round of his flesh cut inconveniently near his heart. Here we have virtue transmuted into vice, kindliness into folly, amiability into sheer recklessness. Shakespeare drew Antonio as a warning of the irrationality, if not the wicknedness, of so overdoing kindliness to others as to render it cruelty to oneself and those for whom he holds responsibilities. In much the same way, Shakespeare laughs at the too ardent lover who carries his passion to the extent of elopement and conniving at a vulgar robbery, while, on the other hand, he gibes at the suitors who are willing to take or leave Portia upon the mere chance of choosing the correct casket. The wooing of Portia is the antithesis of the wooing of Jessica. The one is lovemaking so passionate that it abandons reason and involves crime and violence. The other is profession of affection which has no more depth than the mere hazard of a die. The affections of men and women can be roughly divided between the sort that subsists between Jessica and Lorenzo and the kind that was set up as a standard for the obtaining of Portia's hand. Each of them, however, is of a kind in excess, and Shakespeare draws them to warn men and women against following impulse and passion, either to be so shallow or superficial as to be content to be determined by lottery, or so all-engulfing as to blind the power to discriminate between right and wrong, which was the case with Jessica and her lover. If we read between the lines of the remarkable characterization of Gobbo, we can discern a constant gibing at the overdone and the excessive; and so there is in the law of Venice, and in the judgment of the Duke, which know no humanizing equity but only stern legalism, which was so obviously immoral and unjust as the one that Antonio entered into with ''Shylock''. And, with telling irony, Shakespeare upsets the whole of this apparent unyielding stone-wall of hard, cruel legalism by a mere silly quibble raised by a young woman who, for the nonce, disguises herself as one learned in the law; Here, again, is the same lesson, the monition against excess. Surely law and the strict letter of the law are good. Upon them, as the Rabbis have put it, the world itself is founded. But even that sort of thing can overleap itself, so that law becomes injustice, and the rightful desire for order, when pushed to the extreme which ignores surrounding circumstances and shuts out all thought of prevailing conditions, becomes no better than the merest chaos.

What ''Shylock'' Means

Now, then, let us turn to the character of ''Shylock'' as Shakespeare conceived him and as Moscovitch faithfully represents him. What do we find? We find the Jew with his supreme idea—the essentially Jewish idea—of Justice. We find the Jew cleverly perceiving the chink in the armour of his adversary. We see the Jew—in obedience to the Jew's domestic affection—loving his daughter, devotedly, fondly. We see the Jew thrifty and saving. We see the Jew claiming his rights upon his bond, refusing to go outside the ambit of the written document. We see the Jew willing to take no small risk of losing his money so that he shall place his old competitor—the man who had ''blacklegged'' the money-lending business—under obligation to him and so in his power. Well, in moderation, all these are either virtues or, if not commendable characteristics, are at least venial. It is when they are driven to excess that they become damnable or disastrous. If ''Shylock'' had not so unyieldingly relied upon Justice, as absolutely to parody justice; if he had not remorsely taken advantage of the position in which Antonio had placed himself, his putting his competitor at a disadvantage would have passed muster as merely business. Who will say that the doting devotion which Shylock showed for Jessica was not love turned to folly, the care of a parent transformed into the hurt of the child? If again, Shylock had not made a god of his money, his safe binding, if it had not resulted in safe finding, would not have made of him an object of ridicule, and his loss might have drawn upon him some sympathy. If Shylock had not insisted upon the absolute ipsissima verba of his bond, his reliance upon the document as evidence of his claim would have been altogether admirable. In all of these things what Shakespeare meant to draw, at least, so I venture to suggest, was the parodying of what otherwise would have been amiable qualities that had become unamiable, detestable by being run to excess.

''The Great Misunderstood''

Whether or not this view of the Merchant of Venice is a new one, or whether it is one that has been previously put forward and discarded, I know not. It is one, however, that occurred to me as I saw Moscovitch's representation of Shakespeare's great play, and the charm of Moscovitch's interpretation that struck me is that he sees what Shakespeare really conceived and acts accordingly. His ''Shylock'' is the man who otherwise would have been not at all an unamiable sort of character transformed into a very demon, a devil incarnate because he has allowed his predilections and his passions, which in moderation would have been innocent, to run to excess. He has not modified them by reason. It was not that Shakespeare desired to present as a character a Jew harsh, venomous, bloodthirsty, rapacious, because—as has been said—that was the notion of a Jew, which Shakespeare had the oportunity alone of gaining. How the Warwickshire playwright obtained his knowledge of character it is next door to impossible to determine; because there is no measure that the average man or woman can apply to such genius. But it would be remarkable that all his stage representations with which he endowed drama for all time being so true to life, ''Shylock'' should be such a hideous parody of a Jew as hitherto he has been represented to be. To play ''Shylock'' as if he were a clown, or to play him as if he were a noble Jew struggling with adversity, or eloquently pleading for fair consideration for his race, is to misrepresent what Shakespeare intended. The poet, as I say, wished to show how the virtues, even the conspicuous virtues, of the Jew become vices when you run to extreme without restraint, without the saving grace of

Some Backhanded Compliments

THE British Secretary of War, the Rt. Hon. Winston S. Churchill, published the following article in the "Sunday Herald" of a recent date:

"Some people like Jews and some do not; but no thoughtful man can doubt the fact that they are beyond all question the most formidable and most remarkable race which has ever appeared in the world.

"Disraeli, the Jew Prime Minister of England, and the leader of the Conservative Party, who was always true to his race and proud of his origin, said on a well-known occasion: 'The Lord deals with the nations as the nations deal with the Jews.' Certainly when we look at the miserable state of Russia, where of all countries of the world the Jews were the most cruelly treated, and contrast it with the fortunes of our country, which seems to have been so providentially preserved amid the awful perils of these times, we must admit that nothing has since happened in the history of the world has falsified the truth of Disraeli's confident assertion.

Good and Bad Jews

"The conflict between good and evil which proceeds unceasingly in the breast of man nowhere reaches such an intensity as in the Jewish race. The dual nature of mankind is nowhere more strongly or more terribly examplified. We owe to the Jews in the Christian revelation a system of ethics which even if it were entirely separated from the supernatural, would be incomparably the most precious possession of mankind, worth in fact the fruits of all other wisdom and learning put together. On that system and by that faith there has been built out of the wreck of the Roman Empire the whole of our existing civilization.

And it may well be that this same astounding race may at the present time be in the actual process of producing another system of morals and philosophy, as malevolent as Christianity was benevolent, which, if not arrested, would shatter irretrievably all that Christianity has rendered possible. It would almost seem as if the gospel of Christ and the gospel of anti-Christ were destined among the same people; and that this mystic and mysterious race has been chosen for the supreme manifestations both of the divine and the diabolical.

"National" Jews

There can be no greater mistake than to attribute to each individual a recognizable share in the qualities which made up the national character. There are all sorts of men—good, bad, and, for the most part, indifferent—in every country, and in every race. Nothing is more wrong than to deny to an individual, on account of his race or origin, his right to be judged on his personal merits and conduct. In a people of peculiar genius like the Jews, contrasts are more vivid, the extremes are more widely separated, the resulting consequences are more decisive.

At the present fateful period there are three main lines of political conception among the Jews, two of which are helpful and hopeful in a very high degree to humanity, and the third absolutely destructive.

First there are the Jews, who, dwelling in every country throughout the world, identify themselves with that country, enter into its national life, and, while adhering faithfully to their own religion, regard themselves as citizens in the fullest sense of the State which has received them. Such a Jew living in England would say, "I am an Englishman practicing the Jewish faith". This is a worthy conception, and useful in the highest degree. We in Great Britain well know that during the great struggle the influence of what may be called the "National Jews" in many lands was cast preponderatingly on the side of the Allies; and in our own army Jewish soldiers have played a most distinguished part, some rising to the command of armies, others winning the Victoria Cross for valor.

The National Russian Jews, in spite of disabilities, have managed to play an honorable and useful part in the national life even of Russia. As bankers and industrialists they have strenuously promoted the development of Russia's economic resources, and they were foremost in the creation of those remarkable organizations, the Russian Co-Operative Societies. In politics their support has been given, for the most part, to liberal and progressive movements, and they have been among the staunchest upholders of frienship with France and Great Britain.

International Jews

In violent opposition to all this sphere of Jewish effort rise the schemes of the International Jews. The adherents of this sinister confederacy are mostly men reared up among the unhappy populations of countries where Jews are persecuted on account of their race. Most, if not all, of them have forsaken the faith of their forefathers, and divorced from their minds all spiritual hopes of the next world. This movement among the Jews is not new. From the days of Spartacus-Weishaupt to those of Karl Marx, and down to Trotsky (Russia), Bela Kun (Hungary), Rosa Luxembourg (Germany) and Emma Goldman (United States); this world-wide conspiracy for the overthrow of civilization and for the reconstruction of society on the basis of arrested development, of envious malevolence, and impossible equality, has been steadily growing. It played, as a modern writer—Mrs. Webster—has so ably shown, a definitely recognizable part in the tragedy of the French Revolution. It has been the mainspring of every subversive movement during the nineteenth century; and now, at last, this band of extraordinary personalities from the underworld of the great cities of Europe and America has gripped the Russian people by the hair on their own heads and has become practically the undisputed master of that enormous empire.

Terrorist Jews

There is no need to exaggerate the part played in the creation of Bolshevism and in the actual bringing about of the Russian Revolution by these international, and for the most part, atheistical Jews. It is certainly a very great one; it probably outweighs all others. With the notable exception of Lenin, the majority of the leading figures are Jews. Moreover, the principal inspiration and driving power comes from the Jewish leaders. Thus Tchitcherin, a pure Russian, is eclipsed by his nominal subordinate, Litvinoff, and the influence of Russians like Bukharin or Lunacharski cannot be compared with the power of Trotsky or of Zinovieff, the Dictator of the Red Citadel (Petrograd), or of Krassin or Radek—all Jews. In the soviet institutions the predominance of Jews is even more astonishing. And the prominent, if not indeed, the principal, part in the system of terrorism applied by the Extraordinary Commission for Combating Counter Revolution has been taken by Jews, and in some notable cases by Jewesses. The same evil prominence was obtained by Jews in the brief period of terror during which Bela Kun ruled in Hungary. The same phenomonen has been presented in Germany (especially in Bavaria), so far as this madness has been allowed to prey upon the temporary prostration of the German people. Although in all these countries there are many non-Jews every whit as bad as the worst of the Jewish revolutionaries, the part played by the latter in proportion to their numbers in the population is astonishing.

"Protector of the Jews"

Needless to say, the most intense passions of revenge have been excited in the breasts of the Russian people. Wherever General Denikin's authority could reach, protection was always accorded to the Jewish population, and strenuous efforts were made by his officers to prevent reprisals and to punish those guilty of them. So much was this the case that the Petlurist propaganda against General Denikin denounced him as the Protector of the Jews. The Misses Healey, nieces of Mr. Tim Healey, in relating their own personal experience in Kieff, have declared that, to their knowledge, on more than one occasion officers who committed offenses against Jews were reduced to the ranks and sent out of the city, or to the front. But the hordes of brigands by whom the whole vast expanse of the Russian Empire is becoming infested, do not hesitate to gratify their lust for blood and for revenge at the expense of the innocent Jewish population whenever an opportunity occurs. The brigand Makhno, the hordes of Petlura and of Gregorieff, who signalized every success by the most brutal massacres, everywhere found among the half-stupefied, half-infuriated population an eager response to anti-Semitism in its worst and foulest forms.

The fact that, in many cases, Jewish interests and Jewish places of worship are excepted by the Bolsheviks from their universal hostility has tended more and more to associate the Jewish race in Russia with the villainies which are now being perpetrated. This is an injustice on millions of helpless people, most of whom are themselves sufferers from the revolutionary regime. It becomes, therefore, especially important to foster and develop any strongly marked Jewish movement which leads directly away from these fatal associations. And it is here that Zionism has such a deep significance for the whole world at the present time.

A Home for the Jews

Zionism offers the third sphere to the political conceptions of the Jewish race. In violent contrast to international communism, it presents to the Jew a national idea of a commanding character. It has fallen to the British Government, as a result of the conquest of Palestine, to have the opportunity and the responsibility of securing for the Jewish race all over the world a home and a center of national life. The statesmanship and historic sense of Mr. Balfour were prompt to seize this opportunity. Declarations have been made which have irrevocably decided the policy of Great Britain. The fiery energies of Dr. Weitsmen, the leader, for practical purposes, of the Zionist project, backed by many of the most prominent British Jews, and supported by the full authority of Lord Allenby, are all directed to achieving the success of this inspiring movement.

Of course, Palestine is far too small to accommodate more than a fraction of the Jewish race, nor do the majority of national Jews wish to go there. But if, as may well happen, there should be created in our own lifetime, by the banks of the Jordan, a Jewish State under the protection of the British Crown, which might comprise three or four millions of Jews, an event would have occurred in the history of the world which would, from every point of view, be beneficial, and would be especially in harmony with the truest interests of the British Empire.

Zionism has already become a factor in the political convulsions of Russia, as a powerful competing influence in Bolshevik circles, with the international communistic system. Nothing could be more significant than the fury with which Trotsky has attacked the Zionists generally, and Dr. Weitsman in particular. The cruel penetration of his mind leaves him in no doubt that his schemes of a world-wide communistic state under Jewish domination are directly thwarted and hindered by this new ideal, which directs the energies and the hopes of Jews in every land towards a simpler, a truer and a far more attainable goal. The struggle which is now beginning between the Zionist and Bolshevik Jews is little less than a struggle for the soul of the Jewish people.

Duty of Loyal Jews

It is particularly important in these circumstances that the national Jews in every country who are loyal to the land of their adoption, should come forward on every occasion, as many of them in England have already done, and take a prominent part in every measure for combating the Bolshevik conspiracy. In this way they will be able to vindicate the honor of the Jewish name and make it clear to all the world that the Bolshevik movement is not a Jewish movement, but is repudiated vehemently by the great mass of the Jewish race.

But a negative resistance to Bolshevism in any field is not enough. Positive and practicable alternatives are needed in the moral, as well as in the social, sphere, and in building up with the utmost rapidity a Jewish national center in Palestine which may become, not only a refuge to the oppressed from the unhappy lands of central Europe, but which will also be a symbol of Jewish unity and the temple of Jewish glory, a task is presented on which many blessings rest.

reason. And it is because this is the revelation of "Shylock," which Moscovitch has given, thus showing that "Shylock," instead of an insult, as has been hitherto supposed, is in truth a compliment to the Jewish race, that I place his representation of Shakespeare's Jew side by side in its epoch-making importance with the representation which Epstein drew of another Jew who, like Shylock— characteristic of his race—has been the great misunderstood of the ages.—From the Jewish Chronicle (London).

"Combine the Y. M. H. A.'s and other Jewish institutions with the Synagogue and thereby not only preserve the Jewish atmosphere and family relations, but also avoid wasting further effort and money in surplus institutions which ought not to occupy quarters by themselves," said Rabbi Herbert S. Goldstein, of New York, who is termed the "Jewish Billy Sunday," in a stirring address before a record attendance at Horeb Lodge at Hiram Hall last night.

His title, "Pep and Synagogue," led him to state that a combination of both would make a successful Jewish university idea.

"That the institutional synagogue spells religious revival and that a synagogue of manifold institutions is along the line of solution of communal activities," was a statement made by him.

"In that way you will impart positive religion in the minds of the youth, which would prove a rejuvenation of American Jewish life. It will religionize the whole of social life. It will go further than that, it will tend to keep intact the Jewish ceremonials," the rabbi concluded.

Horeb Lodge unanimously voted to participate in the demonstration next Sunday to be held in honor of the restoration of the Jewish homeland, Palestine. John Thall was appointed marshal and as delegate to the meeting to be held at the Zionist headquarters tomorrow night, together with H. Goldman.

Donations to the Jewish Consumptive Relief Society at Denver and the Hebrew Sheltering and Immigrant Aid Society of New York were increased to $50.00 and $35.00 respectively. Ten dollars was donated towards the new King Solomon Hospital.

What Our Lodges Are Doing

Detroit, Mich.

Five hundred members of the "Community Class" were initiated into Pisgah Lodge, No. 34, Independent Order of B'nai B'rith, Sunday evening, May 9, at the Shaarey Zedek Synagogue with the most elaborate ceremonies staged by any Jewish fraternal organization in the city's history.

Of all Pisgah's social enterprises, perhaps none was carried out with a greater faithfulness to detail, a more marked consideration for the comfort and entertainment of its guests, than was the last initiation, banquet, entertainment and dance, arranged under the direction of Nathan E. Rosenberg and a large staff of enthusiastic workers.

The "Community Class," rendering the local lodge the second largest in the country, was sworn into the Order by the excellently-trained degree team consisting of Milton M. Alexander, Rabbi Samuel S. Mayerberg, Charles Rosenthal, Harold Rosenthal, Leon Goldsmith and Morris Garvett. One of the most interesting features of the ceremonies, and enhancing inestimably the beauty and effectiveness of the ritual, was the splendid singing of the Pisgah Glee Club, under the direction of I. Leonard Braun.

While the initiation was in progress, a varied entertainment, under the direction of Nathan J. Gould, was presented in the vestry rooms for the ladies who accompanied members and prospective members. An unusual treat was the splendid six-reel photoplay, "Judith of Bethulia," shown by Max Rubin, who was also in charge of the lighting effects used throughout the evening.

Due to the excellent arrangement that characterized the activities throughout the day, the entertainment for ladies and the more solemn and impressive ceremonies for the members concluded simultaneously at 6 o'clock. An informal reception followed, lasting until the opening of the banquet halls at 7 o'clock. Because of the opportunity given members and candidates to make reservations early, the two banquet halls filled rapidly and with little confusion. As many additional guests as possible were accommodated, but many were turned away because of lack of room.

The banquet opened with an invocation by Rabbi Harry Z. Gordon. The prayer for the continued growth of the Lodge in service and usefulness was silently joined in by the vest assembly. An orchestra played at intervals throughout the banquet. The Glee Club again took prominent part in the entertainment, winning the plaudits of the gathering with their rendition of clever parodies of popular songs.

Samuel J. Rhodes, past president of Pisgah Lodge, filled the position of toastmaster with consummate ease and grace. Mr. Rhodes kept his audience amused and entertained to the last moment of a rather long program. His more serious introductions of the individual speakers were marked for their eloquence and propriety.

Dr. Rudolph I. Coffee, of the Collingwood Avenue Temple of Toledo, the principal speaker of the evening, was given a rousing welcome by B'nai B'rith members. Ever an enthusiastic worker for the Order, having served as Social Service Director and being largely instrumental in initiating the "Big Brother" and other valuable social service movements sponsored by the Order, Dr. Coffee's spirited address proved of unusual interest and timeliness.

He declared that Pisgah Lodge might well serve as the beacon by which hundreds of other lodges might be illuminated, yet lose nothing of its brilliance. The Order, he said, was destined to be the spiritual mother of the Jew, the one common bond which united every camp and faction and obliterated every difference.

Leon Goldsmith, president of Pisgah Lodge, in his address of welcome, paraphrased a dream in which he walks up the stairs of a wonderful building. Above him are the words "B'nai B'rith Community Building." In the hallway is a Menorah. A wonderful, modern building with banquet halls and reception rooms, with gymnasiums and shower baths—just such a building as has been the dream and inspiration of the local lodge.

President Goldsmith sounded the keynote of the initiation into the Order of the "Community Class," so termed as it paves the way to the building of a Jewish Community Building, for the housing of B'nai B'rith and kindred activities. It is proposed to sell each member of Pisgah Lodge a $100 Building Bond, and with the membership close to 2,000 as it is, the raising of an adequate sum to erect such a building, will be an easy task.

Rabbi Franklin, while congratulating the members of Pisgah Lodge on their splendid achievement, sounded a warning note. A three-fold danger, he said, menaced the future prosperity of the organization.

"Do you realize that we are menaced by the temptation just to grow big, forgetting that bigness and greatness and usefulness are not necessarily the same," said Dr. Franklin. The dream of having the largest lodge in the world, he declared, should not lead the members of Pisgah Lodge into making the mistake of seeking only the men of highest caliber and character. Popularity, too, he said, would inevitably lead to disaster, unless every effort were made to deserve the praise bestowed upon the organization.

"The third menace is that of self-delusion," said Dr. Franklin. We are a magnificent gathering tonight, but this is no test of our strength or of our usefulness. All gather here to enjoy these festivities, but will we come together unitedly and serve and do our individual share of the work in the building of the great community house of which we have dreamed?"

The Community House, said Dr. Franklin, must be endowed with the true spirit of the Jewish home—a source of inspiration and new idealism to the young men and women for whom it was intended.

Speaking of the projected Community House, Rabbi Samuel S. Mayerberg said:

"We must have community building to house the great and growing activities of a wonderful Jewish community, and if each one does his share, ere two years have passed, we shall have a building of which we shall be proud.

"We can do it only by selling the idea to every Jew in the City of Detroit. We must make them see that it is just as imperative to have a building for social needs, as well as for spiritual needs."

The final festivities of the "Comminity Class" initiation came in the dancing, which folowed the banquet, and lasted until midnight with unabated enthusiasm. There was dancing in both the gymnasium and the vestry rooms.

Minneapolis, Minn.

Minneapolis Lodge No. 271 is actively engaged in preparing its plans for the B'nai B'rith Boys' Camp. Tho chairman of the committee, Brother C. David Matt, writes as follows with reference to the need for a boys' camp in that community:

"There is much to say about The Boys' Camp—and little need to say it. The value of summer recreation is attested by the growing habit of taking vacations. How long is it since only the plutocrat indulged in a vacation? But nowadays, who that can afford it does not take one?

"Similarly, it is now an accepted fact that the boy must have outdoor activities as a legitimate outlet for his pent-up energy. Exercise and sports are better than mischievous pranks; game, club and camp are better than the uncontrolled gang-spirit.

"Even the most religious admit that the Jewish lad need not be a weakling, and that the commandment 'tom-im tee-h'yeh', 'Thou shalt be perfect', while referring to moral perfection, need not exclude the physical.

"We expect our boys to do their best and to give us their best. Then even the best should not be too good for them.

"Hence a camp where the Jewish lad can go for a few weeks to rest, play and grow strong, away from the city's swelter, will be a God-send. If we in our youth enjoyed summer outings shall we not afford to the lads who need it a similar opportunity? And if we were not thus favored, realizing what we had missed, we should be anxious to make the present lads more fortunate.

"That the camp will be Jewish, that we will be caring for our boys in our own way, among our own, should make the 'B'nai B'rith Boys' Camp' all the more desirable and welcome".

Spokane, Wash.

A most impressive and inspiring spectacle was the class of sixty-eight candidates, as they were initiated as members of Abraham Geiger Lodge on April 15.

This large class was a result of a membership drive put on in honor of the grand president of the Order, Honorable Adolf Kraus.

They were led by the Ark of the Covenant, carried by four soldiers in uniform, followed by the honor guard in uniform.

Appropriate melodies and marches were played during the entire ceremony.

The degree team was in charge of Bro. N. J. Silberstein, and to him much credit is due for the successful and impressive work done.

The ladies' auxiliary were guests of the lodge for the evening.

There was a record-breaking attendance, and altogether it was a pleasant affair. The membership of the lodge is now about two hundred and twenty members in good standing.

Seattle, Wash.

Before a large gathering of enthusiastic members that assembled to pay tribute to the name of Adolf Kraus, Rainier Lodge No. 627, initiated with impressive ceremony 22 candidates of its Kraus Honor Class on April 21, at the Educational Center.

The ceremony of initiation was conducted by the Rainier Degree Team consisting of Past President Myer Cohen, District Deputy I. C. Lewis, Past President S. B. Asia, Vice-president S. G. Spring, Assistant Monitor Martin Pick, B. Harwitz, Sam Clein and Harry Becker. President Sam Schwabacker presidod at the meeting.

Dr. Samuel Koch read an essay on Americanization written by Rabbi Eli Myer. Mr. Nathan Eckstein delivered an address on a timely topic, stating that good Judaism is good Americanism. He declared that the ideals of America completely harmonize with those of Israel, which serves as their very source and foundation. Judaism has given to the world a fine appreciation of the value of freedom and this is one of the fundamental principles of Americanism.

The meeting was concluded with refreshments. The recent drive for new members in honor of Adolf Kraus resulted in the addition of 38 members to the rolls of Rainier Lodge and has promoted great interest in the activities of the local B'nai B'rith.

Bay City, Mich.

More than 600 people, representing large delegations from Detroit, Flint, Lansing and Saginaw, attended the "Adolf Kraus" class initiation of the Bay City B'nai B'rith Lodge on Sunday, April 25.

Specially chartered cars brought the visitors to the city. Festivities began at 3 o'clock at the Winona Hotel, where the visitors were officially welcomed.

A class of 31 candidates were sworn into the Lodge during the afternoon by the Detroit Degree team, headed by Milton M. Alexander. A reception for the visitors was followed by an elaborate banquet at the Colonial Club at 6 o'clock.

Addresses were given by Leon Zolotkoff, of Chicago, and Rabbi A. M. Hershman, Milton M. Alexander and Rabbi Samuel S. Meyerberg of Detroit. Edward Lichtig of Bay City served as toastmaster.

Mr. Zolotkof, who is at present engaged in organizing a local Zionist district in Detroit, spoke on the need of a national homeland for Jews. "We must make America safe for the Jews," he said, "for the world is not safe as long as any nation is not safe." Rabbi Kershman also took the subject of Zionism for his address, discussing its present aspect.

Rabbi Mayerberg was given an ovation by the diners when he arose. He spoke upon the "Destiny of the Jew," and uttered a strong plea for tolerance.

Mr. Alexander dwelt upon the influence which the B'nai B'rith wielded upon the Jew in removing factionalism and creating better understanding among them. He paid tribute to the founders of the Order and extolled their wisdom and far-sightedness. After enumerating the achievements of the Order Mr. Alexander read a poem written for the occasion by Mrs. S. K. Slobin.

Sam Mandell and Wilfred Goldman, of Pisgah Lodge Glee Club, were soloists during the banquet. Mr. and Mrs. L. D. Harris, of Bay City, contributed to the musical program.

Brother Edward Lichtig of Bay City who forwarded the above report states:

"I might add, now that it is all over with, that nothing has occurred in Bay City, in the Jewish circles, in the past fifty years, that has brought the Jews together in harmony like this meeting, and we hope to benefit by the enthusiasm created.

"We are on the point of organizing a social club, a degree team, and glee club, for the benefit of our members."

Toledo Lodge

The largest crowd in the history of Toledo Lodge turned out for the meeting of April 27, Coffee night.

Over 350 members were present to welcome Dr. Rudolf I. Coffee as a member of Toledo Lodge and of District No. 2.

The coming of Dr. Coffee to Toledo marks an era in Toledo Lodge, as his work as the head of the Social Service Department of the Order is too well known to need any further comment here.

Rabbi Coffee spoke eloquently on the Order, its aims and objects, and addressing his remarks particularly to a class of fifteen, which had just been impressively initiated by Toledo Lodge's degree team.

King Balak and Professor Bileam

Human mind, if we look for spiritual instead of material achievements, is not so very inventive after all. Some three or four thousand years ago—the actual figures are not very important—the Israelites, after enduring centuries of tyranny under the Czar of Egypt, managed to escape to a place where they could pick the manna, provided by Divine Providence, without being obliged to give most of it to a vicious idiot whose only claim to the fruit of their toil was that he was the heir of the body of some Amenemhat, professing the religion of Osiris. They had been used to hard labor and frugal living. Consequently they "made good" under the opportunities furnished by the undeveloped land of Kadesh. The older settlers, themselves immigrants of a few centuries ago, became chary. His majesty Balak, although he had laid enough aside for his old age and provided for his family without even requiring a life insurance, feared—not in his own interest but merely for the sake of the ideals preached by the religion of Chemosh—that these starved Israelites would clean out the land of Kadesh, even as the ox licketh the grass of the field, and so he sent for the great political economist Bileam, that he swear at the people and so ruin their prospects of ever rising above the state of slaves, exploited, oppressed, and denounced as idlers by Pharaohs who as far as they were concerned had never done a decent stroke of work during their whole lives. With some little change of verbiage this is exactly what Werner Sombart has done in his "Jews and Modern Capitalism", and what an anonymous disciple of his expounded in "The Ford International Weekly, The Dearborn Independent", beginning May 29.

Ammon, Moab, Basan, Etc.

Privilege and narrowness go hand in hand. They become international because they are fighting for the same reactionary principle of preserving injustice. About six years ago a clerk in the Prussian mail service, discharged for some act of dishonesty, took to writing yellow novels. This "gentleman" whose real name was Herman Goedsche, but who preferred to write under the pseudonym of Sir John Retcliffe, presented a council of international Jewry which meets every year on the grounds of the ancient cemetery of Prague at midnight sharp and discusses the problem how the whole world shall be made tributary to the Jews. This typical yellow novel plot has been rehashed over and over again, and one of the latest to scour and press it was a Russian by the name of Sergius Nilus—if this is not a pseudonym—working on the imagination of that vicious idiot, Nicholas II, with the scare of an international Jewish plot for the control of the universe. This stupid fake is taken seriously by Count Reventlow in the antisemitic "Deutsche Tageszeitung" and by the Northcliffe papers with the London "Times" demanding an investigation (May 8). It is a disheartening sign of the reactionary tendencies in British public opinion which is being emphasized by Lord Stanhope's motion in the House of Lords (May 19) to tax all employers of foreign labor and to add further restrictions on the chances of naturalization. Similar is the sentiment in France, where the police raided the foreign quarter of Paris and in Belgium where such measures against inoffensive foreigners, mostly, as in Paris, Polish and Russian Jews, are taken. While in this way police measures are taken against Polish Jews, seeking a refuge abroad, their sufferings at home are ignored by international politics for the sake of expedience. Various interpellations in the House of Commons by Shaw (May 7) and Kenworthy (May 11) why the report on the Polish atrocities by Sir Stuart Samuel has not yet been published, were met with evasive replies by Under Secretary Harmsworth. Equally evasive were the replies by the secretary of war, Winston Churchill, on the outrageous sentence of 15 years' imprisonment for Lieutenant Wladimir Jabotinsky and of three years each for nineteen of his followers whose "sedition" consisted in arming themselves against the Arabs who had organized a bloody pogrom with nearly 200 casualties, when the authorities failed to act. (April 25 to May 3.)

Cheating Death

An old Jewish custom gave to a person in dangerous sickness a different name so that the angel of death appearing with a warrant should be confused. The Jewish Congress which convened in Philadelphia May 29-30, voted itself out of existence on the ground of an agreement with the constituent societies, and reconvened immediately as a new and permanent congress. To a future historian this fact will present an insoluble puzzle, exemplifying the difficulty of interpreting facts, no matter how well established. The situation seems to indicate a shifting of leadership from the older representative class of American Jews to the more recent element, or, to use the handy and popular designation, from the German to the Russian Jew. The same phenomenon is evident in the growth of the Zionist movement manifested in the convention with the subsequent parade, held in New York, May 9-11. A negative fact attracts our attention first. The convention received greetings from Lloyd George and from the British Ambassador in Washington, even Governor Coolidge of Massachusetts sent a message, but the White House and the Department of State remained silent in remarkable contrast to the New Year's greetings by President Wilson on Sept. 4, 1918. London Times (May 14) published a letter of the ex-minister, Mr. Barnes, criticizing in words to strong to be quoted verbatim, the American Zionists for their wild statement, mentioning in particular Rabbi Stephen S. Wise, who thanked the British Government for liberating Palestine from Mohammedan yoke. Meantime, it was announced, though to the knowledge of the present writer not officially, that Herbert Samuel was appointed high commissioner of Palestine, and that General Allenby, Colonels Storrs and Bols had resigned.

Progress and Prospects of Zionism

The first international Zionist Congress to be held after the war was originally called to meet in Karlsbad. It has now been changed to London. We shall in our next review have an opportunity to give exact information on the condition of affairs. So far the British Government, in spite of demands made in the House of Commons, has refused to divulge the exact text of the mandate, a somewhat discouraging interpretation of the promise that secret diplomacy shall be a thing of the past. Contrary to the report, chronicled in our last review of the soviet governments sympathetic attitude to Zionism, an Associated dispatch of May 18 informed us that 75 delegates to a convention of Russian Zionists, held in Moscow, were arrested. A later dispatch informed us that the British foreign office prevailed upon Gregory Krassin, unofficial representative of Russia in London, to intercede on behalf of these men. The British military administration in Palestine, however, acts still—and probably for good reasons—on the principle of court-martial proceedings. Zionist meetings are not allowed, and while the sentences of Jabotinsky and his followers were considerably reduced, the sale of Jabotinsky's picture was prohibited. The Arabs in Syria show decided hostility to European administration, especially to the French, and the colonies in Galilee were repeatedly attacked. Even the inveterate hostility to the Turks seems relaxing, for it is reported that the Arabs reintroduced the prayer for the Sultan, Feisal, the "King of Hedjas", blames the Jews for the pogrom of Jerusalem, and the Turkish grand vizier attacks the nationalists who established an independent government in Angora with the rather typically occidental weapon that their leader, Mustapha Kemil, is a Jew, a somewhat incredible story, hardly any better founded than the similar charges against von Helfferich and Erzberger in Germany. The civilization of the Arabs showed another progress toward occidentalization by the establishment of an Arab bank in Palestine. The gravest menace which does not appear on the surface is the rivalry between Great Britain and France, noticeably in the attitude of Cardinal Debois, who protested against the "disgrace" that the tomb of the "Savior" be defended by Jewish "sectaires". His views are indorsed by the Jesuit "Etudes", which speak of "pretensions injustifies" tending to evict the Syrians from a soil which is theirs. Rabbi Marcus of Constantinople, who visited this country as delegate to the Constitutional Grand Lodge, I. O. B. B., brought the startling statement that the "Dunmah" (the followers of the Messianic pretender Shabbetai Zebi, whose ancestors, together with their leader, embraced Islam in 1666) show sympathy for the Zionist movement. Meantime there is considerable strife within the Zionist camp which in one case resulted in the murder of the Zionist Korngold in Cracow by a fanatic socialist.

An Eye Witness

Without giving undue weight to this document the present writer feels that an abstract from the letter of an old-fashioned Halukah-Jew in Jerusalem, written to an American relative, deserves publication because it was written without any desire of publicity, and probably represents the sentiment of the old-fashioned orthodox population of Jerusalem which even now is in the majority. The man writes: "I dare not write much on local conditions. The censorship is very strict, martial law prevails. The population lives in a state of terror. The court martials pronounce very severe sentences. The Zionists assume a provoking attitude to the government, and caused great bloodshed of which only the orthodox population was the victim. Today (April 21) conditions are somewhat more assuring. The loss of property is indescribable. May the Lord soon have mercy on us and send us the true redeemer".

The Jewish Heaven

The mot of a papal delegate in the 16th century, who called Poland 'coelum Judaeorum", has repeatedly been quoted in these columns. In the absence of the official report of the British commission whose retardation is significant, we are restricted to the newspaper reports which are rather commonplace. Jewish beards are pulled once in Lemberg, once in Nowogorudok, soldiers display their bravery occasionally in the ghettos of Praga or Bialystok, and while unable to win decisive victories against the Bolsheviki in Ukraine, they demonstrate their valor by butchering those who survived the heroic deeds of Petlura's and Denikin's armies. Their civil officers show that they fully mastered the lesson that henceforth international treaties shall not be scraps of paper, and the guaranteed rights of religious national and linguistic minorities are just occasionally forgotten. In Drohobycz, the center of the naphtha industry, which owes its importance exclusively to Jewish enterprise and to Jewish labor, Hebrew and Yiddish speeches at a Zionist demonstration were prohibited, and in Polotzk the home of Mary Antin, Yiddish letters are not delivered.

When Popolski is sick a saint he would be. In Teschen, a German city, where a plebiscite shall decide whether it shall belong to Czecho-Slovakia or to Poland, the Jews are promised recognition of the Jewish nationality, if they will vote for Poland. For the present the Jewish nationality is insofar recognized as Professor Barnes, who held the chair of pharmaceutics in the University of Warsaw, was discharged. A similar motive inspired a new attempt of our old friend Dmowski to establish a bank which will practice "Swoj doswegu". For the present this emancipation from Jewish control of the finances has not resulted in an improvement of Poland's low credit, and the minister of finance blames the failure of a new bond issue on the Jews, although the assimilated Jew, among them the (Austrian) noble, Nathan von Lowenstein, son of a Lemberg preacher and son-in-law of Schmelke (formerly Edler von) Horowitz, tried their best to persuade a meeting of Jews to practice the left and right cheek theory. Polish finances are squandered in wars on all fronts, while according to the report of Dr. Harry Plotz, the discoverer of the typhus bacillus, typhus and tuberculosis have raised the mortality in Poland to the appalling figure of 25 per cent.

Another of the Seven Heavens

A letter of Hungarian Jews, published in the New York ''Vorwaerts'' (May 17) says: ''Our lives and our property are outlawed. The sword reigns from without and death within. Hundreds of Hungarian and thousands of Galician Jews are disappearing every day without leaving a trace. Many people are literally burned alive. Children are killed by crushing their heads on the pavement, women are raped in the presence of their husbands and parents. The jails are filled with Jews. Conditions surpass those of the Ukraine in horror. Brethren in America, save us from hell. Use your influence on your government. Do it quickly, or it will be too late''. The individual facts reported in the papers fully bear out the accuracy of this heart-rending description, but only one case shall be quoted because it is found in ''Pester Lloyd'', the organ of the Magyarized Jewish bourgeoisie and was published under the eyes of Horthy's government: Heinrich Schapira, traveling salesman for a Vienna house, went to Transylvania. He disappeared, and the only trace left of him was a newspaper mailed in Komorn, on the margin of which were scribbled with lead pencil the words: ''Was arrested, save me''. Investigations proved that Schapira had been arrested in Komorn, but was no more in the jail. The report significantly adds: It is feared that he may no more be among the living. One more act of Attila heroism must be quoted: A Galician Jew was tried for profiteering in the court or Sopron and discharged. Soldiers who did not like this result grabbed him on the street and branded a ''Magen David'' and the word ''Schleichhandler'' (underhanddealer) on his forehead. For such acts the government is not directly responsible, but it indirectly encourages them by constant reiteration of the Christian character of the nation, by taking up the wildest rumor of misdeeds of Jewish organizations seriously, as that synagogs are used as shops for making counterfeit money, and above all, by its inability or unwillingness or both to protect the plainest civil rights of the Jewish population. The most typical case of this kind is the occupation of the University of Budapest by armed bands who will not allow a Jew to register. The authorities were even willing to meet these highwaymen half way by the promise that only veterans of the war and similar categories be admitted, but the ''flower of the nation'' refuses any compromise. An amusing incident is that the dean of the university is the ''Christian'' Aladar Ballagi, the son of Moritz Bloch, one of the pioneer workers for the Magyarization of the Hungarian Jew, translator of the Pentateuch into Hungarian and author of Hungarian text-books, who afterwards ''shmadded'' both himself and his name.

Family Fate

A Talmudic sage says: the fate of the fathers is a symbol to their sons. Leopold Loewe (1811-1875), a native of Moravia, and therefore a Czecho-Slovak by nationality, became as rabbi in Hungary a zealous advocate of Magyarization. An enthusiastic supporter of Kossuth, he was imprisoned after the latter's fall, and the dictator Haynau, who, according to well approved methods, still in use, hoped to discredit the revolution by denouncing it as Jewish, was determined to hang him. Through hard efforts and lavish expenditure of money Loew was finally liberated. He remained a zealous Magyar and inherited his principles to his son and successor, Immanuel. The latter was evidently made the victim of a plot to rescue the present government from its hopeless situation. The country, near the verge of ruin, due to the vicious botch made of the map of Europe, is governed by a coterie of reactionaries who got into power through the inability of the preceding soviet government to maintain order. They are no more able to give to the people a workable government than their predecessors. Their sentimental phraseology of Christian nation and Christian morals give to the people neither food nor employment and to the money no value. A scapegoat is urgently needed, and a Jew always is handy. Unfortunately the breeder of such schemes is also usually a Jew. Some Meshummad, going by the pseudonym of Alexander Hollosi, correspondent of a Dutch paper, selects Immanuel Loew as the victim for the clerical plot. He calls on him with a Dutch journalist, and interviews him on the situation of the Jews, masquerading as one who wishes to inform public opinion on the actual situation of the Jews in Hungary. Rabbi Loew is careful, says that from his own personal experience he knows only of one case of the murder of a Jew arrested, but on the next day a Magyar paper, ''Nemzeti Ujsag'', publishes a whole story of the denunciation of Hungary by Rabbi Loew, given to the representatives of a foreign paper, and calculated to injure Hungary's reputation in foreign countries. Now, it is clearly proven why the Hungarian money is depreciated. The Jews have done it, because they wish to take revenge for the dethronement of Bela Kun, who has been selected as Messiah by the council of Elders, assembled on the ninth of Ab at midnight sharp in the old cemetery of Prague, or inasmuch as most of it was condemned years ago, perhaps in a huge Zeppelin hovering over it. Well, Loew was arrested for treason to Hungary, as was his father before him for treason to Austria. He was finally liberated, but declared unfit to hold office. The ministry of Simonyi-Samadam was unable to weather the storm by its yellow novel politics. At this writing (June 11) we learn of its resignation. It was powerless to cope with the Bolsheviki of the right, and to establish law and semblance of order.

The Difficulties of Higher Criticism

The elections to the first Reichstag of the German Republic have been held (June 6). The apprehensions of a pogrom were fortunately not realized. The advice of Isaiah (26, 20), referred by some smart Biblical critic to the time of Alexander the Great, ''Go, my people, into thy chambers and hide a little while until the storm shall have passed'', might just as well have been pronounced a week before June 6, and it might have been repeated June 7. The storm has not passed. The results of the election, so far as we can survey them, prove that the radicals of both wings, of the socialists as well as of the reactionary, have gained considerably, while the moderates of all parties sustained severe losses. For the present the moderate socialists, together with the old middle class liberals and Catholics, command a majority. The open antisemites, the German Nationalists, have more than doubled their strength, and the German People's Party, the practical antisemites, have almost trebled it. These reactionaries, in order to overthrow the present government, may join hands with the extremists, and will surely do so, if they believe to be able to gain their end. It is less likely that the other side will be willing, but politics make strange bed-fellows. One thing is apparent. The majority socialists polled 5,500,000 votes, the independent socialists 4,800,000. There can be no more than 200,000 Jewish votes in Germany. Judging by party leaders, some of them must have gone to the liberal bourgeois parties, but if all should have gone to the socialists, they could have been only a fraction of the total vote cast for these candidates, which is complete refutation of the usual charge that the Jews as a mass are responsible for political radicalism.

Facts Without Figures

The platform of the Deutsch-Nationale Volkspartei announced before the election that it will fight the ''un-German spirit, Jewish or otherwise, and the control of public affairs (Vorherrschaft) by the Jews''. The Deutsche Volkspartei does not state this plank expressly in its program. An organ of the former party, the ''Deutsch-Voelkisches Jahrbuch'', prescribes all societies which admit Jews to membership, even the ''Boden-reformer'' (single taxers). This publication is heartily endorsed in the ''Literarisches Zentralblatt'', a high-class literary review (No. 13-14) as a sign of the reawakening of the German spirit which will reassure a constitution adapted to the needs of the German people. An anonymous author who publishes a book entitled: ''Rudolph the Last, Diary of a German Prince'', and who is supposed a duke of Saxe-Weimar, laments the fact that the old bond of union between the German people and its princes could have been broken by a Jew of Galician descent, the scion of a people who always considered discretion the better part of valor. On the other hand, Prince Joachim Albrecht, who was tried for an assault on French officers, when asked whether he had said, ''kill the Jews'', emphatically denied the allegation, declaring it would have been illogical. His defence was indeed conducted by two Jewish attorneys. The fact remains that the ''Edeln'', as the kaiser in his medieval cant used to call the privileged caste, are on the antisemetic side. Practically this had no tangible effect as yet. The Bavarian government yielded to the clamor against the ''East-Jews'', and ordered their expulsion on short notice without being able to carry the order out. Premier von Kahr defended the measure rather honestly as a concession to growing antisemitism. On the other hand the antisemitic organ ''Voelkischer Beobachter'' was suspended because on the anniversary of the overthrow of the Munich communist government it openly advised pogroms. The fact is, conditions in the German Republic are far from satisfactory, but neither are they as critical as a sensational press makes them appear.

Austria Irredenta

Ever since the Vienna Congress of 1815 redrafted the political map of Europe, and more especially since 1848, when the national self-determination became the political program for liberalism, the Italian parts of Austria called themselves Italia Irredenta. We have now an Austria or Germania Irredenta, and Italy has helped to make it. The present ''Republic Austria'' can neither live nor die.

Kenneth Roberts demonstrated it in a brilliant essay, entitled ''Husks'' (Saturday Evening Post, May 1), and the scholarly economist, John Maynard Keynes, an expert serving with the British Peace Commission, did the same in his profound book, ''The Economic Consequences of the Peace''. A famished population is a dangerous maniac. A mass meeting, held in Vienna April 26, cheered Kapp and Horthy and yelled for the overthrow of the Jewish yoke. The first practical application of this call was an attack by the ''Aryan'' students of the university on the ''Mensa Academica'', a charity kitchen for indigent Jewish students, where Semitic tables and Jewish plates were gloriously annihilated by the lineal descendants of Herman the Cheruscian. The matter was discussed in the National Assembly where the Jewish member Stricker demonstrated the economic domination of the Jewish masses by the official figures from the Jewish cemetery, which show that 80 per cent of the funerals are furnished free of charge, or to make it absolutely clear: 80 percent of the Jews of Vienna are so poor that they can not pay the cost of the simplest funeral when a death occurs in their family.

Mehorsho in Czech

When the Talmud was still part of the equivalent of a high school education among the Jews, the interpretation of a difficult passage in the glosses of Samuel Edels (called Mehorsho) a Polish rabbi of 17th century, was the equivalent of what today is highest honors in Latin composition. This famous dialectician is the hero of many anecdotes. When a boy, so the story runs, his teacher prepared his public discourse, always interrupting himself with the question: suppose Shmeel should say ''asoy''? Shmeel was meantime hiding behind the big tile oven and listened quietly, until finally when the old man thought he had erected an impregnable barricade he poked his head out, and said: but suppose Shmeel should say asoy? whereupon the teacher had to admit that he knew no answer. The situation in Czecho-Slovakia presents a puzzle a la Mehorsho. Well-meaning Jews, among them those representing the Jews at the Peace Conference in Paris, demanded minority rights for the Jews. They claimed it is impossible for Jews in polyglot countries like Czecho-Slovakia to vote with one national section without risking that their co-religionists in another section, or even they at a subsequent election, would be made to suffer. In Czecho-Slovakia the constitution of March 4, 1920, gave to the Jews recognition as a nation. They therefore could, in the election held in April, register as Jews by nationality, just like Germans and Czechs. The idea was that formerly they were dependent on the good will of one party or another to nominate a Jew, while now they would have a legal right to such a representative. The electoral law of Czecho-Slovakia is very complicated. It can only be explained here in its fundamental principles bearing on the Jewish situation. The voter does not vote for an individual delegate, but for a party, so that if a district were entitled to five delegates, the ballot is counted after election. If 100,000 voters have cast their ballot, and 60,000 had voted the Czech and 40,000 the German ticket, three Czechs and two German delegates having received respectively the highest vote of their party, are elected. The Jews had in the whole republic cast 79,600 votes, but in no district did their candidate receive 20,000 votes. They will therefore be without representation, while in former times each party tried to obtain Jewish support by placing a Jew on its ticket. Mehorsho had presented a ''Kashya'' which no one had previously thought of. The greatest trouble is that even the division between Germans and Czechs is not the sole difficulty. The Czechs and Slovaks are in the opinion of Clemenceau, Lloyd George and their associates only one nation. A Slovak bureau in Budapest appeals to Slovaks all over the world to throw off the yoke of the Czechs, and not a small item in this struggle is the religious problem, because the leading section of the Czechs with Masaryk at the head is liberal, while the Slovaks, mostly peasants, are clerical. ''Shmeel'' may have some more problems behind the oven.

The High Priest's Plea

Old-fashioned Jews prayed on Yom Kippur against time from their bulky Mahzor, and yet some parts had to be omitted. The high priest, so the Talmud informs us, when reading the Torah on that day, introduced the service with the remark: There is more written in this book than I can read to you. The events in Russia, Ukraine and Rumania have to be passed by. From the first country they are uncertain, from the two others as tragic as they have been for the last four years. A few items of interest shall follow, disconnected like the old-fashioned spice box (verschuottete Bessomim Buechs) reminiscent of the parting of the Sabbath.

The Armenian Mandate

From all appearances the few carpet

weavers and American trained missionaries will, as heretofore, form our only direct connection with the people of Armenia who repeatedly have been presented as the only analogy of the Jews. Like the Jews, they are connected by religious as well as national bond. They are also said to be racially related to the Jews, not merely on the ground of the Ten Tribes fad, but on supposed physiological characteristics, and on linguistic and archeological grounds through the Hethites, the common ancestors of Jews and Armenians, as the excavations of Amarna are said to have proven. Professor Aptowitzer of Vienna found striking analogies between Armenian and Talmudic law. Like the Jews the Armenians had no country of their own, and while most of them are living in contiguous localities, many are also scattered in Galicia, Bukowina and Transylvania. It is strange that between them and the Jews there was not much love. They are called in Jewish literature Amalekites, and in the parlance of the Turkish Jews Achbar (an uncomplimentary reference to Is. 66, 17) which is the Armenian word for master.

Honor Roll

The articles in the Ford paper, previously referred to, repeat among others the charge that Jews lack constructive genius. It therefore may be registered that Professor Albert Einstein lectured at the University of Leyden, and was invited to a permanent chair to which he responded with the promise that he would come every year for a three weeks' course. It will be remembered that he also lectured with great success in London, where the newspapers for some reason converted him into a Swiss, although he was born in Ulm, Wuertemberg, and is professor at the Kaiser Wilhelm Institute in Dahlem and the University of Berlin. The papers report the appointment of George Cohen, an orthodox Jew, as head of a department in the foreign office of Denmark.

The first Italian cabinet which counted two Jews as members, Luzzatti as secretary of the treasury and Mortara as minister of justice, was of short duration. It began its career March 13 and resigned May 11. Its successor, which had no Jews in its midst, lasted only four weeks. Conditions in Italy are evidently very critical, but the situation does not seem to affect the Jews. Italian Judaism lost a most remarkable man in the death of Leone Ravenna (March 21) at the age of 82. A prominent member of the bar in his native Ferrara, member of the city and the provincial councils, both the bar and the press paid the highest tribute to his honesty and his learning. Leone Ravenna was also a zealous Jew, for over forty years president of the congregation and vice-president of the union of Italian congregations, for more than sixty years a regular contributor to the Jewish press, a rabbinical scholar and devout Jew who considered it his highest privilege to read Musaf and Neilah service on Yom Kippur and acted occationally as honorary rabbi. Leone Ravenna was born at the time when the home of Savonarola was still under papal rule and therefore could not practice law until Ferrara was incorporated into the united kingdom of Italy. He was one of the last survivors who witnessed the destruction of the ghetto gates in 1848. These gates were removed during the short time of the French rule in 1796, but re-erected at the expense of the Jews under Leo XII (1823-1829). Pius IX allowed the removal of the gates but the pillars with the inscription "ghetto" remained until 1848. Ferrara was one of the most prominent seats of rabbinic learning in Italy. It was the home of the pioneer of Talmudic criticism, Azaraiah dei Rossi (1511-1567) and of the author of the stupendous encyclopedia of Talmudic law, Isaac Lampronti (1679-1756).

The Rabbinical World

Hayyim Nahum, the first Turkish Haham Bashi of modern training, has now definitely resigned, or was retired—these things are hard to know from a distance—and in his place Hayyim Bedjerano, since 1909 chief rabbi of Adrianople, was appointed. Rabbi Adolf Hannover of Cologne was elected rabbi of Wuerzburg after the dynasty of Bamburger had occupied the post for nearly 80 years, and although it has quite a number of eligible men in the profession who according to orthodox tradition ought to have preference. Rabbi Bruno Lange of Essen resigned to devote himself to literature and politics and bought an estate in Upper Bavaria. Did the prosperity of the Krupp works turn the rabbi from sword to plowshare?

Obituary

Dr. Wolf Zederbaum, son of the Hebrew publicist, Alexander Zederbaum, prominently connected with the sanitarium of the J. C. R. S. in Denver, Col., died in Los Angeles (May 1). Clarence I. de Sola, the Zionist leader of Canada, son of the late Rabbi Abraham de Sola of Montreal, died in Boston (May 11). Salo Schottlaender, a prominent publisher and one of Germany's leading philanthropists, died in Breslau. Nathan Zuntz, professor of physiology in the agricultural academy of Berlin, Moritz Cantor, an authority on the history of mathematics, and retired professor of Heidelberg University, died at the age of 90. Moritz Benedikt, not to be confounded with the recently deceased editor of the Neue Freie Presse by the same name, professor of psychiatry at the University of Vienna, died at the age of 85 (April 14). He created a sensation some fifty years ago, when he publicly attacked Israel Hildescheimer, then rabbi of Eisenstadt, who insisted that his wife, a convert from Christianity, should undergo the obsolete ceremony of immersion in the presence of three men. It is worth recording that Benedikt's daughter, Clotilde, is an enthusiastic Jewess and writer on Jewish subjects. Should we not mention, according to Talmudic principles (Ta'anit, 21a) the death of the first Jewish cab driver of Jerusalem, Hayyim Jacob, whose highest pride it was that he drove Theodore Herzl?

Closing in the old-fashioned way with something pleasant, it is surely a thing to be proud of to record that at a meeting in New York (May 8) the princely sum of $416,000 was collected for war sufferers in which Nathan Straus, the prince of givers, contributed $100,000. "Israel is not widowed".

Jews Under Soviet Regime

DR. REUBEN BLANK, who recently arrived in London as Delegate of the Jewish People's Union of Russia, and who was formerly editor of a Petrograd paper, writes as follows in a letter to the London "Times":

"Of the eighteen People's Commissaries, only one, so far as I know, is a Jew, that is Trotzky. Lenin, often represented as a Jew, is not. Neither is Tchitcherin. Apart from this fact, the Jews, with few exceptions, have never favored Bolshevism.

"It is true, the Soviet Government has swept away many racial distinctions, but the Jews have suffered worse under their regime than most of the other sections of the Russian populations because of their connection with industry and commerce.

"All this has been destroyed and they are consequently ruined. By far the most prosperous people in Russia today are the peasants. But the Jews were never allowed to hold land.

"Not all the 7,000,000 Jews in Russia could go to Palestine, even if they wanted to. In many respects they are the steadiest and hardest working people in Russia. There is no doubt that a vast majority of them are looking forward eagerly to being delivered from the Bolshevist regime and allowed to work out their future in peace.

"The new war in Eastern Europe is a hard trial to the solidity of the barrier against Bolshevism formed by the border lands of the former Russian Empire. The strengthening of that barrier, which M. Clemenceau aptly termed the "Cordon Sanitaire" of the West, presents therefore an imperative duty for all who realize the terrible meaning of Bolshevism to European civilization, whatever their attitude may be towards the new war itself. Any tendency to weaken this barrier must be avoided by all means.

"Such a weakening will, however, be brought about by anti-Semitic agitation that is ever increasing in those regions, causing a wide split between the Jews and the other population.

"In all the regions of the sanitary cordon the Jews form a considerable part of the population—about 10 to 15 per cent. These Jews are moreover mostly concentrated in the towns, and this means the most vital parts of the political organism, forming 30 to 60 per cent of the towns' people. The whole-hearted participation of the Jews in the work of saving these regions from Bolshevism therefore becomes essential to success. True, the anti-Semites maintain that it is the Jews themselves who are chiefly responsible for Bolshevism. They point to Russia proper, the victim to Bolshevism, according to them, through the Jews.

"These assertions, however, irrefutably fail from the fact that Russia proper hardly contains 1 per cent of Jews—viz., under a million out of over 100 millions (only in Petrograd and Moscow about 2 to 3 per cent), whereas the regions of the Cordon Sanitaire—Lithuania, Poland, Ukrainia and Bessarabia—contain six million Jews. Should the indictment of the anti-Semites be true, these regions that composed under the Tsars the Pale of Jewish settlement, would have become the hot-bed of Bolshevism. Instead of that the Jewish Pale has in fact become Europe's Cordon Sanitaire against Bolshevism.

"The Jews have nothing to gain and all to lose by Bolshevism; they constitute a substantial element which the anti-Semitic campaign threatens to dissolve. I therefore crave permission to address to the public opinion of Great Britain, through the medium of the Times, universally recognized as its most important leading organ, the urgent request to use its vast influence in order to restrain that fatal campaign which amounts practically to nothing else than playing with fire at an hour of supreme peril".

Synagog Pension Fund

The application and justification of the Synagog Pension Fund is set forth in a neat little brochure of twenty pages prepared in accordance with the report and resolutions adopted by the XXVI Council of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations held in Boston May, 1919, and now being distributed by that organiaztion. The present publication contains the details of the plans that a committee of the Executive Board worked out. It is tentative and subject to changes but the main purposes of this Synagog Pension Fund are explained in full and the method of its operation carefully detailed.

The Pension Fund has long been recognized as a necessity. No Jewish Congregation should permit its old and venerable teacher to be cast as rubbish to the pile when God has made complete his years of service. Industrial organizations recognize the moral claims of its employes on the employer and are providing pensions for its workers. Surely a religious organization can not afford to be less ethical than business or industry.

The reasonableness for a fund to pension the teachers of religion has been recognized by all denominations as well as the congregations of the Jewish faith. A start has been made towards the creation of a Retiring Fund of $1,348,700, which will be devoted to pensioning of aged rabbis and their dependents.

All rabbis of congregations and professors of theological seminaries will be entitled to a pension. The Synagog Pension Fund will not discriminate between orthodox and reform. Each congregation, by contributing every year a definite percentage of the rabbi's salary, will be enabled to provide for the old age of its rabbi.

By this system a pension is provided at cost. The supplementary fund that is being solicited is designed to provide a pension for those rabbis who are about to retire and are entitled to a pension. There are also cases where congregations cannot assess their percentage. The Union proposes to raise its Synagog Pension Fund by general subscription to meet the deficit wherever it exists.

According to this brochure the system is very simple. In the table of congregational assessments it is shown that in case a rabbi starts his employment in a pulpit at the age of twenty-seven, his congregation will contribute eight per cent of that salary each year towards his pension fund, for his retirement at the age of 68. As the age of the rabbi increases the percentage increases. In case congregations are unable to meet this increasing percentage this deficit must be met by other sources and for that reason the Pension Fund is being solicited.

Special cases, the reason for the Union to participate in this measure since our government can not appropriate taxes from the public treasury for religious purposes, the history of the fund, the financial statement of the present fund and all other matters involved in this very necessary movement are given in this pamphlet. It is written in a clear, simple style, and will enable every reader to grasp the working plans of the Pension Fund and the basis of the appeal which is now issued to rise before the aged and honor the face of a venerable teacher in Israel whose unselfish labor has deprived him of sustenance in old age.

The House of Lords Discusses Palestine

At the session in the House of Lords on June 30 considerable time was devoted to a debate on Palestine and its future development. Lord Leamington sharply criticized the government's Zionist policy and declared the appointment of a Jew to the post of High Commissioner to be a serious blunder.

Lord Curzon, Minister of Foreign Affairs, replied to the government's critics and assured them that there was no cause for anxiety in so far as the Zionist problem is concerned. It is possible, Lord Curzon said, that some hot-headed members of the Zionist Commission had been careless in their conduct but in the choice of Sir Herbert Samuel, Britain had secured a wise, most experienced and impartial administrator.

No large immigration from Russia or other parts of Eastern Europe was likely to take place in the immediate future, Lord Curzon continued. Only the best Jewish elements from all countries will unite in a common effort to rebuild Zion. There was no likelihood whatever of a Jewish minority governing a non-Jewish majority, and all elements on the part of the Arabs no less than that of the Jews would be given an opportunity to aid in the development of the future Palestine.

The London County Council has resolved to open Hebrew Classes in all its Public Schools in London. This is the first instance of English public schools taking up the study of Hebrew.

We are informed from Warsaw that large posters agitating for pogroms are placarded all over the city. The posters call for the organization of a volunteer force to exterminate the Jews in Poland.

Constitution Grand Lodge Convention

THE Eleventh Quinquennial Convention of the Constitution Grand Lodge of the Order assembled at Cleveland, May 9th and adjourned May 13th. Five days of intensive labor on the part of the delegates assembled from the American and European Districts brought forth several radical changes in the organization of the Order and a wide expansion of its field of endeavor.

The Convention opened at 10 o'clock Sunday morning with an invocation by Rabbi Dr. Markus of Constantinople, representing District Grand Lodge No. 11.

In his address of welcome to the delegates, Major W. S. FitzGerald of Cleveland said:

"I want to say at this time to those who are our guests that while we are proud of Cleveland because of its manifold industries and its commercial industry, proud of our success, we are more proud of the spirit of our citizens and the civic spirit of our citizenry. It is getting to be recognized that cities must have a civic conscience, the sick and the poor must be cared for. Those are the feelings that animate the B'nai B'rith. For over seventy-five years your Order has fought the cause of the oppressed throughout the world. Wherever the cry of the oppressed sounded, the B'nai B'rith has answered. I congratulate the Order on its magnificent achievement in the cause of humanity".

President Eugene E. Wolf of Cleveland Lodge, in welcoming the delegates to Cleveland, pointed out that the opening of the Convention took place on Mothers' Day and declared that Cleveland was proud to be hostess at such a gathering. He emphasized the fact that the Order at the present time has before it not only American questions but a world problem.

The following is a brief synopsis of the amendments to the laws of the Order, adopted during the Convention:

Section 2, Article 1, Part 3 was amended so that delegates to the Constitution Grand Lodge be elected at the ratio of one delegate for every five hundred members and one for a majority fraction of five hundred.

Section 1, Article 2, Part 3 was amended by adding at the end of the first paragraph of the section the following:

"The Presidents of the American Districts shall by virtue of their office and while holding the same, be members of the Executive Committee".

Article 2, Part 3 was further amended by adding the following new sections to the article after Section 1:

"Section 1—a. There shall be and is hereby created a Central Administrative Board which shall consist of not less than five nor more than seven members of the Executive Committee, according as such committee may determine, and appointed by the President within thirty days after his election and annually thereafter; such members to be selected by him as nearly as practicable from different localities nearest the seat of the Order.

Section 1—b. The Central Advisory Board shall act in an advisory capacity to the President and shall be vested with such administrative or other functions as the Executive Committee may from time to time determine.

Section 1—c. The said board shall meet not less than three times during the year, and at such dates and places as it shall determine, but upon application of a majority of its members or upon call of the President may meet at any time. Full minutes of the proceedings of the board shall be kept.

Section 1—d. The traveling expenses of the members attending such meetings shall be defrayed out of the fund of the Constitution Grand Lodge appropriated for that purpose".

Section 9, Article 2, Part 3 was amended to read as follows:

"Section 9. It shall meet at least once a year, at the call of the President, or at the request of a majority of the committee, and the expense of the members attending such meetings shall be defrayed out of the fund of the Constitution Grand Lodge, except as otherwise provided in Part 2, Article 6, Section 3".

Article 6 was added to Part 1 of the Constitution as follows:

"Section 1. There may be established from time to time by District Grand Lodges, auxiliary lodges composed of women with such rights, duties and powers and under such rules and regulations as the Executive Committee may prescribe".

Section 3, Article 4, Part 2 of the Constitution was amended to the effect that the Constitution Grand Lodge dues be payable in quarterly payments on January 1st, April 1st, July 1st and October 1st, in advance.

Many matters of great importance to Jewry came before the Convention. The following is a brief resume of the results of the gathering:

The Executive Committee was authorized to create a B'nai B'rith Bureau of Enlightenment which shall conduct the work of collecting and disseminating data touching upon notable, charitable, philanthropic, scientific, artistic and past and current worthy deeds, actions and accomplishments of Jews.

Recommendation of the President for co-operation of the Order in efforts to combat, by campaign of education, the false and dangerous economical, industrial and social theories responsible for the prevailing social unrest, was adopted.

Americanization work was indorsed and it was ordered that a director of such work be appointed.

Resolved, That a Standing Committee on Social Service be appointed to consist of a chairman selected by the President of the Order and the chairman of the Social Service Committees of each District, to have supervision of such work.

The proposition to establish a Lyceum Bureau with a list of selected speakers in each district to be designated to visit lodges and deliver lectures on various Jewish topics, was referred to the Executive Committee with a favorable recommendation.

The establishment of a Bureau of Publicity to supply the general press throughout the country with items of news for the information of the general public was authorized.

The creation of an Intellectual-Advancement Committee, to consist of the chairmen of the Intellectual-Advancement Committees of the Districts and a general chairman designated by the Executive Committee, was approved and referred to the Executive Committee.

The Convention approved the dissemination of Jewish classics in cooperation with the Jewish Publication Society of America and authorized the Executive Committee of the Order to take such action as it will deem proper.

The Anti-Defamation League was authorized to enter a campaign of publicity; to secure the best talent obtainable to aid in the work of the League; that a correct interpretation of the story of the Crucifixion be widely distributed; that in institutions of learning lectures be given on the history of the Jews.

The activities of the Leo N. Levi Memorial Hospital at Hot Springs, the National Jewish Hospital for Consumptives at Denver, and the Educational League at Cleveland were commended, and the lodges of the Order and their members were urged to continue their support of those institutions.

The care and support of Jewish war and pogrom orphans abroad was referred to the Executive Committee of the Order with instructions to secure the co-operation of kindred organizations in this work and to try to establish a joint organization for that purpose.

The creation of a District Grand Lodge in the Republic of Austria was authorized as soon as two more lodges are established in that Republic.

The Constitution Grand Lodge unanimously adopted the following resolution:

"That the present ritual be retained and that all words whereby the candidate is pledged to secrecy, as well as all reference in the ritual to secrecy, be stricken out; that the candidate be admitted to membership by ballot as heretofore, and that signs and passwords be retained for the purpose of identification". The Convention further directed the appointment of a committee to make the necessary changes in the ritual of the Order in accordance with the above resolution, and to make such further changes in the ritual as shall tend to make the initiatory work elaborate and impressive.

The issuance of uniform membership cards to the members was authorized.

The Convention expressed its lack of sympathy with the tendency wholly to inhibit immigrants, whether good or bad, from entering this country, and resolved to co-operate actively with the Government of the United States in all its efforts towards preparation and education of immigrants for the duties of American citizenship.

Ordered that the following be inserted in the ritual:

"Do you promise faithfully to discharge the duties devolving upon you as a law-abiding citizen or resident of your country"?

Rituals submitted for B'nai B'rith Mothers' Day, Victory Day and Flag Day were approved.

The per capita tax for the American Districts was fixed at $2.00 per annum, beginning and effective as of June 30, 1920, payable in quarterly installments in advance.

The laws governing the Emergency Relief Fund remain unchanged.

The following were elected as officers and members of the Executive Committee for 1920-1925:

Adolf Kraus, Chicago, President.

Lucius L. Solomons, San Francisco, 2nd Vice-President.

Archibald A. Marx, New Orleans, 2nd Vice-President.

Jacob Singer, Philadelphia, Treasurer.

Simon Wolf, Washington.

Charles Hartman, New York.

Sidney G. Kusworm, Dayton, Ohio.

Dr. E. N. Kalisch, Richmond.

Philip Stein, Chicago.

Dr. B. Timendorfer, Berlin.

Dr. Adolphe Stern, Bucharest.

Dr. M. Hammerschlag, Prague.

J. Niego, Constantinople.

A. B. Seelenfreund, Chicago, Secretary.

Some of the reports of the committees to the Convention, which are of special interest, are reprinted.

Committee on State of the Order

Your Committee on the state of the Order begs leave to report as follows:

There has been submitted to this committee certain portions of the most admirable Message of our President, and a number of resolutions, touching many subjects pertaining to the Order and its work.

The Committee approves that part of the message referring to the American Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare League of the B'nai B'rith, and desires to especially commend the President for the diplomatic course of action in this trying situation.

We approve of the President's attitude in relation to our afflicted co-religionists abroad and are impressed with the statesmanlike manner in which the Executive of our Order has presented to our government the ideals and aspirations that actuated him in his altruistic efforts on behalf of our Order, thus exemplifying to the highest degree in a most practical manner the necessity of our existence.

The splendid co-operation of our Chief Executive of our Nation and his ready response to our appeal, together with his genuine interest in all things which tended to the uplift of humanity surely signalized him as the one individual who during that year did most to deserve the meritorious recognition of our Order, and we commend President Kraus and the Executive committee for having so wisely shown by the bestowal of the gold medal to President Wilson, the sound judgment which, if perpetuated in the future, is bound to bring renewed laurels to our cause.

The diplomacy of President Kraus in dealing with an acute situation prevalent at the time of the Polish pogroms indicated in no uncertain manner the astuteness of those who were responsible for selecting him for our leadership. We particularly commend his effectual manner of settling in a most dignified way a matter which might have been of serious consequence to all the people of our faith.

The efforts of President Kraus and his associates are again indicated by the alertness which was demonstrated in connection with the Ukrainian outrages.

The democracy of our Order, the broad-mindedness of its officers were typified in a most practical way by the willingness and eagerness with which they accepted the advice and assistance of other organizations. Dignified at all times and imbued only with the highest motives, the officials of our Order undertook to handle the problem affecting the future of our people, mindful at all times that success might redound to the cause which they represented and subjugating the individuality of our officers for the welfare of the common good of all concerned.

The detailed report of the state and membership of the Order in the several American and foreign districts contained in the Message of the President, shows not only a steady, substantial gain in members, but also shows the greatest numerical increase in the history of the Order. The ratio and volume of increase indicate conclusively that we are entering upon a new era and that a period of remarkable activity, progress and accomplishment, lies immediately in our path. The report of President Kraus, delivered at Washington, showed a total membership on Jan. 1, 1910, of 40,083, the report submitted to us for consideration shows 55,371 members on Jan. 1, 1920, and on April 1, 1920, a combined membership of 62,377. The initiation last Sunday of a large class by Pisgah Lodge No. 34 of Detroit, at the present time probably the most virile and progressive lodge of the American Districts, brings this total up to 63,000, a formidable array of intelligent and zealous workers in the interests of our co-religionists the world over. A very substantial part of the recent increase in membership is a direct personal tribute to the service of Adolf Kraus as executive of the Order, and appreciation upon the occasion of his seventieth birthday, of his conscientious and faithful administration of the affairs of our fraternity. We desire to record here the presentation of over 8,000 new members to President Kraus upon this anniversary and trust that this increase may long remain a living monument to his efforts and to our high regard.

Every one of the seven American

Districts, except No. 5, reports a net gain in the last five years. No. 2 and No. 6 with net gains of 5,038 and 5,177, respectively, lead all the Districts. Conditions in the several Districts vary as to area, accessibility, population, concentration in cities and towns, and material wealth, and it is only natural results should differ, but it has been demonstrated again and again that our ambitions for strength and influence quantity and quality can be realized by the application of intelligent effort and systematic and persistent service. There have been in recent years several brilliant examples of the resurrection of dormant lodges by the proper use of this single formula, and we are proud of the part that they have contributed to the history of the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith in the quinquennial period last year.

Since the last Convention, eighty-eight new lodges have been instituted, Districts No. 2 and 7 leading in this direction. A survey of conditions in the Eastern and Central states leads us to believe that there is a wonderful opportunity for the organization of many smaller cities and towns where the Jewish population is adequate. We believe this to be one of the most inviting and fertile fields for immediate B'nai B'rith endeavor, and we recommend that the Executive Committee cause an investigation or survey to be made, preferably through the District Grand Lodge, of every city or town of sufficient size, where no lodge exists, with a view to propaganda and prompt organization.

We are gratified to note the activity and condition of our lodges in Europe and the Orient, and those under the jurisdiction of the Executive Committee, notwithstanding the ravages and demoralization resulting from the war.

The detailed report of humanitarian services rendered by these foreign lodges in furnishing hospitals, feeding and relieving refugees and victims of the great conflict, in establishing homes for widows and orphans, is a splendid tribute to their benevolence and a practical demonstration of brotherly love. The emergencies of the situation have been met in such a manner as the ideals and the principles of the Order required and the circumstances permitted and we have nothing but praise for our European brothers.

District No. 10, now comprising Czecho-Slovakia, with headquarters at Prague, formerly containing all of Austria and Hungary, seems to have done especially good work, and conditions there apparently afford an opportunity for great growth and expansion, and we heartily concur in the recommendation of our President that a District Grand Lodge be created in the Republic of Austria as soon as two more lodges are established there.

Believing that the distress and disturbance resulting from the war must continue for many years and that during this period the demand for assistance, relief and sustenance will be unparalleled in our history, that it is our mission as the greatest international agency of Israel to administer to these wants, that the prospects and prosperity of the Order in America amply enable us to undertake this beneficient labor, we suggest and recommend that the Executive Committee give their special attention to the good and welfare of all the European lodges. With equality of rights, civil, religious and economic, the possibility of a European development is extraordinary.

Committee on Propaganda

Your committee begs leave to report that they have carefully considered the various recommendations and resolutions submitted to them, and beg leave to concur the Recommendation No. 10, that uniform membership cards be issued to all members, but believe that the proper planning of the same should be left to the incoming Executive Committee. The matter of adequate propaganda touches the very vitals of our Order. Money and energy may be quickly dissipated if efforts are directed in the wrong channels. At the very outset we are presented with a peculiar condition. The Jewry of America numbers in the neighborhood of 3,000,000 souls, and the membership of this, the only real democratic, international, Jewish fraternity, with a machinery that is unsurpassed for efficient work, has on its roster a membership of merely 30,000. The field of endeavor, therefore, seems to be wide and worthy. In what particular has the Order failed to grasp the wonderful opportunities presented by present conditions? Surely no record of achievement presents in more expressive and concise form a more comprehensive view of the needs and ambitions of the Jews the world over than does the report of the manifold activities engaged in and sponsored by our fraternity.

The wholesale dissemination of this mass of historical information in itself, not only justifies our struggle, but should be a most potent means of securing accession to our ranks. No one could have listened to the magnificent resume given by our distinguished President without feeling a deeper allegiance. The members of the Sovereign Grand Lodge, however, we take it, need no further incentive to work and action.

The democracy of our Order rests, however, primarily upon the individual lodges and it is there we must look for our strength or our weakness. The Constitution Grand Lodge may be faithfully trusted to function quickly and efficiently in the consideration of the larger problems confronting the Jew as a whole, but behind any appeal of any convention or body of men must be the demonstration of conscious power delegated to them by the members and the lodges of this Order. In the last analysis, guidance may properly come from above, but the real stimulating enthusiasm must come from below. Heretofore, it seems to your committee, we have worked from the top down. The time has come to work from the bottom up. Every effort should be made to strengthen our lodges and to make them what they ought to be—beehives of activity in the social and moral uplift of our people.

For that reason your committee views with extreme pleasure the tendency to consolidate the weaker lodges with the stronger in localities where more than one lodge exists, but hesitates to suggest the centralization of membership into one lodge elsewhere, feeling that in friendly rivalry there may be strength. This matter may safely be left to the wisdom of the District Grand Lodges.

Although recognizing the value of an increased membership, your committee unhesitatingly believes that the enlisting of the services of paid field secretaries by this body would be the adoption of a policy tending to commercialize the true spirit of fellowship and sacrifice that should prevail. The members of this convention should be the real active missionaries. With the knowledge of our past and a prophetic view of our future abilities, none are better qualified and none should be more willing to assume the burden of a real leadership. Their voices raised in hamlet and town in no uncertain tone will accomplish more certain results than any paid field secretary. The officers of the District Grand Lodges have garnered the honors and can, if they will, be the true apostles of a deeper and wider fellowship among Jewry which the thrill of a new travail has given to all of us.

An opportune moment is here. Will we grasp it? The lodges should be stimulated to action in every way possible. They should become in every locality the means of socializing and unifying the Jew. They should become the centers to actualize every moral and spiritual impulse, to improve the conditions of our people in particular and the community in general. They should co-operate with every worthy movement, seeking to enlist the active sympathy and aid of the Rabbi and everyone who stands for higher and better things. Give the lodges some definite constructive policy, give the Jew particularly in the smaller localities knowledge and information, and you will most efficiently blaze the way.

Committee on Anti-Defamation League

Your Committee on Anti-Defamation League herewith presents the following report:

Seven years have passed since the League was founded and a little over six years since its formal organization. Results have shown that what was at first looked upon with some doubt as to the advisability of instituting this department, is no longer an experiment but presents a record of magnificant accomplishment. Under the able guidance of its Chairman and the Administrative Committee, the work was begun with infinite tact and in such a diplomatic manner that offense was given to no one and the maximum of benefit obtained. As is well pointed out by our President in his Message, the need of continued vigilance is now more than ever clearly demonstrated and to that end provision should be made by this Convention for the authority and the funds with which the work of the League shall be carried on and extended.

The League has become one of the most important undertakings of the Order and its efforts carefully watched and the results eagerly looked for, not only by members of the Order, but by the Jewish community and others in every part of the country. The opportunity for constructive work is here and the extent to which it may go can hardly be foreseen. Its work results not only in tending to eradicate the evils of ignorance of and prejudice against the Jew, but necessarily as a corollary in uplifting conditions to the benefit of American life and American citizenship. Education is always a benefit to those who come under its influence and the work of the League is nothing more or less than a form of education. The deleting of objectionable matter in moving picture films, the elimination from schools of books tending to arouse religious prejudice, the co-operation of the daily press in preventing the publication of insulting or derogatory news items and advertisements, etc., are all a part of the campaign of education, possibly negative in character, while the dissemination of correct interpretation of matters of history heretofore inaccurately translated, constitutes affirmative action having potentiality for tremendous good. Publicity is the best means of carrying forward this campaign.

We therefore recommend:

1. That the League enter a campaign of publicity along the lines suggested in the message of the President and that the B'nai B'rith News in each issue, under conspicuous headings, contain a full statement of the work of the League and that general distribution, in such manner as the Administrative Committee deems wise, be made of pamphlets or other printed matter, calling attention to the principles and accomplishments of the League.

2. That the best talent obtainable be secured to aid and assist in the work of the League.

3. That a correct interpretation of the story of the Crucifixion be printed and very widely distributed.

4. That in the schools, colleges, college fraternities, courses for teachers, etc., lectures be given by competent persons under the direction of the League on the history and traditions of the Jews.

5. That funds to carry out the above and the objects of the League be raised from members and from non-members and by united efforts to increase the membership of our Order.

The gratitude of the Convention is hereby expressed to Bro. Philip Stein, Chairman of the Administrative Committee; Bros. Adolph D. Weiner, Hugo Pam, Jos. D. David, Benjamin Samuels, Sigmund Livingston, Chairman of the Executive Committee, for their active and able efforts, and to Bro. Leon L. Lewis, the efficient Secretary of the League, and to Bro. L. Edward Lashman, who acted as Secretary for a part of the time while Bro. Lewis was in service, and to Mrs. L. Edward Lashman, who acted as Secretary while her husband and Brother Lewis were both in service.

Committee on President's Message

Your committee has already submitted a preliminary report, referring to the appropriate committee. The various recommendations contained in the President's Message, and now presents its report on the message as a whole.

At the outset, the committee is of the opinion that the Order is to be congratulated upon the presentation of such ably prepared and splendid official document, replete with data of historic events in the highest importance to Judaism, in which the Order participated and took a leading part, and with consideration and luminous discussion, accompanied with wise advice and recommendations, upon various questions affecting the relations of our people with their fellowmen. And in order that knowledge of these matters may be diffused as widely as possible, the committee recommends that the Executive Committee be directed to have such parts of the Message as it may select printed and circulated, in such manner as it may direct, among non-members as well as members, of the Order.

In perusing the Message, we are impressed with the immensity of the labors entailed upon the head of our Order, in conducting the affairs during these years of stress and strife, and with the skill, wisdom and success with which they were handled. In these strenuous times the Order was confronted with situations and questions of the gravest concern to Judaism here and abroad. A mistaken attitude or move might have brought grievous harm to our people and irreparable injury to the Order. Every situation was met and acted upon with such wisdom tact and sense of right, that our efforts in behalf of our people, whether acting alone or in conjunction with other organizations were successful, and the power and prestige of the Order, in this country and other lands which its activities have been extended, are greater than at any previous time of its history. The tax and drain upon our leader's health and strength must have been enormous. It is cause for thankfulness that he did not succumb.

A brief reference to a few of the most important activities of the Order, particularly relating to or growing out of the World War, may be useful. Taking measures to secure the honest and enthusiastic co-operation of every district and every lodge throughout the country in supporting and furthering our government's various measures in carrying on the war; the organization of the Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare League with its club rooms and local welfare committees, and co-operation with the Jewish Welfare Board; raising funds for the work by special annual assessments upon the members; efforts in behalf of our co-religionists abroad; conferences and correspondence with the President and other high officials of our government; representations to and at the Peace Conference, conjointly with other bodies, resulting in the guarantee of equal religious, political, and all civil rights for our coreligionists in the lands where such rights had previously been denied to them; representatives to our government as to the outrages in Poland and Ukraine, and, through the intervention of governmental representations, preventing threatened pogroms; by tactful conference and advice putting an end to Polish agitation against our people in this country; successful meditation between conflicting bodies resulting in the convincing of American Jewish Congress, and concerted action at the Peace Conference in Paris; extending and supervising the work of the Anti-Defamation League, and, through proper propaganda, increasing the membership of the Order by over 22,000.

And while the above special work was being carried on, all the regular activities of the Order were conducted without abatement.

The committee notes with hearty approval the President's recommendation for co-operation by the Order in efforts to combat, by a campaign of education, the false and dangerous economic, industrial and social theories responsible for the prevailing social unrest, and takes the opportunity of expressing its earnest hope that this suggestion will be adopted and vigorously and thoroughly carried out, the necessary funds to be raised by voluntary contributions.

The facts set forth in the Message afford concrete evidence of the great and increasing power of the Order. Its activities reach every civilized country. Its influence may be exerted instantly by cable wherever a wrong is done or threatened against our people. The Order should be firmly established wherever our people may locate in the Orient or elsewhere, to guide and lead them, and, when necessary, to represent them upon matters affecting their relations with others.

The committee heartily seconds the President's warm commendation of the services of Bro. Simon Wolf, knowing it will receive the cordial endorsement of the Grand Lodge.

The committee recommends the adoption of the following resolution:

This Constitution Grand Lodge expresses its high appreciation of the able, successful and self-sacrificing services to the Order, to Judaism and humanity, rendered by the President, Adolf Kraus, wishes him many years of health, and trusts that the Order may long enjoy his valued advice and guidance.

Committee on Americanization

Your Committee has carefully considered all matters submitted to it. Its members are agreed that in harmony with the spirit of the time and the recommendations of President Kraus, our Order should endorse Americanization work. The difficulty that has confronted your committee was the problem of practical suggestions for carrying on the work. The only concrete plan referred to it was submitted through the General Committee of District No. 6.

In this connection it may be well to say that the scope and purpose of Americanization work is not yet so well defined as to be generally understood and universally accepted. Your Committee is agreed, however, that to us, it must mean the dissemination of that knowledge, the promotion of those virtues, and the inculcation of those ideals which shall make all Americans, whether of alien or native origin, better citizens. Any advocacy of force and violence under a government where progress is made possible by legal or parliamentary means is indefensible. Such doctrines, whether spread by Jew or non-Jew, by alien or native-born, merit unqualified condemnation. At least one method of combating such doctrines is by Americanization work.

However, Americanization is not confined to the combating of those who would overthrow the government by violence or unlawful means, nor to the teaching of the English language, nor to the spreading of knowledge of American customs. In its best sense, it is a movement to bring out the best that each group can contribute to the general welfare; to hope to permeate all groups with a common idealism and with a faith in a common destiny, without oppressing or suppressing any one of the many religious or racial groups that make up our people.

The rank and file of American Jewry present no problem in Americanization apart or different from the general population. This is abundantly approved by the 200,000 Jewish boys in uniform, who gave a full and overflowing measure of patriotism during the war. Those who were members of our Order are named in the President's report. These boys are a lasting testimonial to the civic virtues and courage, the loyalty, the sacrifices and the patriotism that have marked the Jewish people in all lands and in all times wherever and whenever they have been accorded even a modicum of freedom and justice. Your Committee believes that it would be in keeping with the traditions of the Order, and in line of Americanization, if the Order would cause to be prepared or erect some fitting memorial that would symbolize the contributions of American Jews to the cause of America in the late war, and further than that, symbolize the contributions of Jews to America from the time of its discovery—its growth, its progress, its institutions and its freedom. Your Committee is not prepared to recommend what form such memorial shall take.

Your Committee takes cognizance of the fact that there are, in America, some Jews who have not learned the English language; a number of them, like emigrants of other faiths, have not been naturalized and have no understanding of American institutions, Americanization. It believes that here is a fruitful field for useful patriotic effort in disseminating a knowledge of the English language, of American concepts of liberty, and an appreciation of American institutions, particularly in the safeguards provided for personal liberty, and the opportunity for progress through orderly and constitutional agencies. Your Committee is not unmindful of the unrest to which attention has been called. It believes that here is another field for Americanization work, applicable to every element in our population, which will do much to disarm those who preach hatred and revolutionary changes.

A general plan for work is herewith submitted. The plan is intended to be only tentative. Necessarily, the details will differ in each community and must be left to local initiative and judgment. The problems are bound to differ, depending upon the size of the city, the extent of its Jewish population, its nearness to the seaboard, and many other elements.

Your Committee considered the advisability of the undertaking of this work by the Order as a whole, by several districts, and by the individual lodges. The majority of the Committee believed that for the present, at least, Americanization work should be carried on through individual lodges rather than by the Order, or by the Districts. However, in order that the work may be given direction and supervision, your Committee believed that the President of the Order should appoint either a national director, or a national committee on Americanization, as his judgment may dictate. Of course, any plans for Americanization work must be confined to the United States.

It is difficult, if not impossible, to draw any hard and fast lines in the view which this Committee has taken of the purpose and scope of Americanization work, between what is Americanization, which is social service, and what is anti-defamation. To some extent, they naturally overlap. Consequently, if the Order shall engage upon any activities, or extend its activities along any of these lines, the necessity for the closest co-operation among those charged with the supervision of these activities, must be kept in mind.

Your Committee recommends:

(1) That this Convention endorse Americanization work.

(2) That it direct the President of the Order, as soon as practicable, to appoint a Director of Americanization, or a Committee composed of representatives of the Districts within the United States, in whom shall be vested authority to direct and supervise Americanization work. Your Committee is of the opinion and recommends that in this connection, no salaries but necessary expenses incurred, pursuant to proper authorization, be paid.

(3) It recommends that the lodges be requested to engage actively in Americanization work.

(4) Your Committee recommends that whenever the Executive Committee of the Order believes it advisable for the Order, as such, to engage in Americanization work, it shall be authorized to take whatever steps it deems expedient in that direction. Likewise, whenever any District Grand Lodge within the United States desires to engage in Americanization work as a Grand Lodge, it shall have authority to do so.

(5) It recommends that the accompanying plan of work,* or some other suitable plan be submitted to the several lodges in the United States as soon as practicable, by the Director of Committee on Americanization, for their guidance.

(6) It recommends that a suitable memorial be prepared or erected under the direction of the Executive Committee of this Order along the lines above suggested.

A Plan of Americanization Work

I. Appoint a Standing Committee on Americanization.

II. Cause a survey to be made of the conditions of the Jewish population with reference to their Americanization problems in the communities served by the lodge or council.

III. Confer with other Jewish organizations in the community doing Americanization work. Promote co-ordination and co-operation in these activities.

IV. Work with the General Committee on Americanization in your community. If possible, get representation on such Committee. See that in the general Americanization work the Jews get fair play. Try to combat prejudice, if any, by correcting erroneous opinions which often gives rise to it. Work along the lines approved in your community. The Communal Americanization Committee may finance your activities.

V. See that the work along the following lines is done: Jewish men and women who do not know English should be given an opportunity to learn it, the men by evening classes, the women by day classes; American history, traditions and ideals and the principles of the American Government should be presented to immigrants both in English and in their mother tongue by classes, lectures, pamphlets or any other educational means; Jewish citizens should be trained for better citizenship; Jewish aliens should be encouraged to become citizens; the non-Jew, citizen or alien, should be taught, on every occasion, the truth about the Jew; and this country of ours should be made an increasingly better place to live in for all without distinction as to class, creed, race or color.

VI. As means to the end: help to improve housing conditions; combat child labor; establish recreation camps, employment bureaus, study circles, boys' and girls' self-government clubs; encourage the Big Brother Movement; co-operate with the Anti-Defamation League; do not sympathize with criminals because they are Jews; help to enforce law; promote communal good-will.

VII. Keep this department informed of what you have done, are doing, or plan in doing. Feel free to ask for help. Don't think this pogrom is too big for your lodge or council. You are not expected to do it all. Do that which suits your community, your committee, your interested members.

Committee on Intellectual Advancement

Your Committee on Intellectual Advancement begs leave to submit the following recommendations:

1. That the publication of the B'nai B'rith News in its present form be discontinued and instead thereof a periodical in magazine form be issued monthly by the Order, setting forth:

(a) B'nai B'rith activities in districts and in lodges; excerpts of correspondence between the Executive Head of the Order and the Heads of the Departments of our own Government; excerpts of correspondence between the head of the Executive of the Order and representatives of our own or foreign governments in other countries bearing upon the condition of the Jewish people in these various lands, together with such other information and articles as may be necessary to stimulate interest in the condition of onr brethren the world over.

(b) Reports as to the activities of Anti-Defamation League and other bureaus so that the membership in general may be continuously informed and may regulate their conduct and patronage with regard to pictures and plays accordingly, and other matters coming within the purview of such bureaus.

(c) That they publish each month a syllabus of studies in Jewish history with directions as to chapters or passages in certain specified works which can be read for information required on the subject.

(d) Each district shall appoint a committee, preferably the Intellectual Advancement Committee, who shall furnish the editors and publishers of such magazine with news items and accounts of activities in the various districts by the lodges or members thereof.

2. There shall be established a Lyceum Bureau with a list of selected speakers in each district, who will be designated periodically to visit lodges and hold lectures on various Jewish topics of the day, on Jewish history and on the condition of our brethren in various parts of this and other lands, and on the work accomplished by the various bureaus.

3. A Bureau of Publicity, whose duty it shall be to supply the general press throughout the country with proper items of news under proper headings so that the general public may be informed from time to time on such matters as the Executive Committee may deem necessary and proper.

4. That an Intellectual Advanceent Committee, consisting of the chairman of the Intellectual Advancement Committee of each district and a general chairman designated by the Executive Committee, shall be appointed to meet once a year, and under the supervision of the Executive Committee, outline a program for the ensuing year for the lodges in America.

5. Brother Dr. Markus of Constantinople appeared before this Committee and stated that there were 15,000 children of the school age in Constantinople, a very large percentage of which number was without any school accommodation. He stated previous to the war, the Hilfs-Verein maintained a school at a cost of $10,000 per year, but that now—assistance having been withdrawn, it becomes necessary for the B'nai B'rith Lodge in Constantinople to provide education for the children formerly in that school. He estimates that $20,000 per annum is needed to carry on the work of education, and

By Our Correspondent,
DR. M. EPSTEIN

London, May 18, 1920.

THE last month here has been dominated by the Palestine mandate. The news of the incorporation of the mandate in the Turkish treaty was all the more welcome, coming as it did, after a fortnight of great gloom, when what appeared to be reliable information was being circulated that Great Britain was thinking of giving up all her ventures in the Near East. Almost unexpected, therefore, was the arrival of the historic telegram from San Remo which brought the good news. It acted like an electric shock. The Zionist center gave one the impression of rejuvenation. Everybody seemed to walk on air, and the masses and the classes joined, on this occasion, in genuine expressions of gratitude and delight. Truly the occasion was great. It was one of those red-letter days, as rare as they are welcome, of which Jewish history records a number. Even those Jews who have been termed super-British (the implied scorn requires no explanation) also expressed their gratitude, possibly not so much that Palestine was to be placed under a mandatory as that the mandatary was to be Britain. For the majority of Jews, the cause of rejoicing was two-fold. It was good that Palestine should be placed under a mandatory. It was better that the mandatary should be Britain. The "liberal" Jews expressed their approval of the Palestine Restoration Fund, for which, indeed, great efforts are being made throughout the community.

The incorporation of the mandate in the Turkish treaty has undoubtedly brought the Zionists into their own again. Zionism is at present enjoying the success which success itself generates, and strenuous efforts are being made to include in the executive of the movement some of the prominent leaders of Anglo-Jewry. Truth to tell, there will be ample room for the activities of these men, trained as they are in the business methods current in western Europe and America. It must be confessed that one of the weaknesses of this great national movement is that, while it must inevitably now be centered in London, which means in the Western World (and this term includes America), those who are guiding its destinies are not quite at home in the outlook which is accepted by the Western World. We would not be understood to be speaking critically; we have every sympathy and comprehension for what may be termed the East European outlook. This has its justifications. It has a great deal of strength. But, practically, it is out of place in the Western World; and, speaking only from the practical point of view, it is necessary for the smooth working of the business of the movement that its hopes and ideals and demands should be expressed in terms of the market-place understood in western Europe. That is why most observers agree that it would be an excellent thing for the movement if prominent leaders of Anglo-Jewry were to lend their weight in the boat. As a matter of fact, it ought not to be impossible to arrive at some satisfactory working arrangement, and it is undoubtedly the duty of all Jews to do their utmost to make the Palestine venture a success. For good or for evil, the world will regard, and rightly regard, the Jews in Palestine as the special object of the care and devotion of Jews the world over. It is up to the whole of Jewry, therefore, to determine to make Palestine a flourishing country. That, no doubt, will be the appeal that the Preparation Fund will make in the future. We are confident that that appeal will be adequately answered.

Philanthropic Activities

On more than one occasion we have pointed out that Jews are good givers. No matter what the appeal, if only a good cause is behind it, Jews respond adequately. At the present moment we have in this community, besides the Palestine Preparation Fund, the Great War Memorial Scheme, an appeal for the Jewish Hospital, the perennial appeal for the various existing charities, which have done so much good in the past and which will be called upon to do still more in the future, appeals for building new synagogues and for renovating old ones, and appeals for Vienna, the Ukraine, and Poland. One sometimes marvels at the intrepidity of the people who launch these various appeals, knowing, as they must, that there are already many in the field. No doubt, some appeal to some people, others to others. Professed Zionists and semi-Zionists will, no doubt, give liberally to the Palestine Preparation Fund. That, at least, can claim that it is engaging in positive work, and money contributed for the purpose may be regarded as "fixed capital." On the other hand, the appeal of the War Memorial cannot be neglected, for, if the Palestine Preparation Fund deals with one aspect of the Jewish problem, the War Memorial deals with another. Both will be necessary, both will call for a great deal of thought and energy and wise counsel.

The Return from San Remo

We ought not to leave unmentioned the unique, unprecedented scenes that marked the return to London, on May 5, of Dr. Weizmann and Mr. Sokolow, from San Remo. An enormous crowd gathered at the station where the train was due to arrive, and there Dayan Chaikin and Dayan Feldman formally welcomed the leaders on behalf of the whole community, and offered them a Scroll of the Law. The stolid English policemen, who kept excellent order in the crowd, must have wondered greatly at the ceremony, which, undoubtedly, was impressive. Dr. Weizmann reported Mr. Lloyd George's statement to him at San Remo, which was in these terms: "Now you have a start; it is up to you to make good." So far, nothing has been done to put the terms of the mandate into actual words, but one thing, apparently, does seem certain, and that is the appointment as Civil Commissioner, or Governor, or whatever his title may be, of the Right Honorable Herbert Samuel. No official announcement has yet been made to this effect, but it is one of those open secrets which has even found its way into one of the daily papers. Moreover, the Zionist organization has sent a messenger of its own, in the person of Mr. Israel Cohen, to Australasia, India, and the Far East. He is there to explain the significance of the peace conference's decision concerning Palestine and to collect money from all sorts and conditions of men.

The Mizrachi.

One other aspect of the Zionist movement in this country deserves special notice. We refer to the growing strength of the Mizrachi, which is putting forth determined efforts to form the backbone of the movement, if it can. So long as this spirit of compromise characterizes the relationship between the various sections of Jews who hope to settle in Palestine, there is nothing to fear from the strength of the various groups within the general body. Every group is bound to contribute something to the wellbeing of the whole, and, therefore, must form a source of strength.

Home Affairs

If all this represents the doings of the Community in what we term "foreign affairs", a good deal of activity must also be recorded in what may be described as "home affairs". Here the outstanding fact of the last month has been the Communal Elections in the constituent Synagogues of the United Synagogue. Every other year each Synagogue elects its representatives to the central body. Then the elections are exciting. But this year was the off year, when only the local governing bodies are chosen. In the main, therefore, the elections went off very quietly, with the exception only of one or two Synagogues where attempts were made to introduce charges. One place of worship in the West End, one of the so-called fashionable congregations, presented the picture of a difference of opinion among the members on such small matters as the introduction of more English into the services, the adoption of the triumphal cycle for the reading of the law, and an increased amount of congregational singing. These may seem little things to the great world on the other side of the Atlantic. In these islands of ours, however, they represent great questions of policy and, ever constructive, we look askance at them. It would have been wonderful if these suggestions had been adopted; needless to say, they were not. But they are significant of the dissatisfaction beneath the surface which is manifesting itself here and there against the dead-hand of the United Synagogue. Possibly we may see changes in the near future. At present there is little sign anywhere that the changes will be carried through.

The Jewish Peril Again

It is possibly sixty or eighty years since the Jews in this country were publicly accused of this or that. Three generations ago it was the Blood Libel, an absurd indictment. Today we are accused in this country by a small group of fanatics of being the cause at once of Bolshevism, Liberalism, Democracy, Capitalism, Socialism, and any number of other "isms". In particular a book has just been published under the style of "The Jewish Peril". There is no name on the title-page, and the book purports to be a translation of the lunatic ravings of a Russian spiritual revivalist. The whole thing is very mystericus; perhaps that is why it is so dangerous. It makes wild accusations, never once specifying exact dates or places or names; the accusations are left vague. Moreover, it is impossible to test the exactitude of the English translation. Hence, the view borne out by scholars acquainted with Russian that there has been introduced into the English version a word here and there, sufficient to make the difference between a harmless statement and a poisonous insinuation. Many reputable authorities, including Dr. Hagbert Wright, of the London Library, have pronounced the whole thing a huge fraud, full of lies, imaginary dreams, groundless accusations, and a farago of nonsense. It is suggested that the Russian original was written some fifteen or twenty years ago to convince the Czar of the excellence of autocracy; and that the English Edition has been put forward by the assistance of some of the Russian reactionaries who are at present in exile in London, who wish to kill two birds with one stone. On the other they want to have a whack at the Jews. These gentry little realize that what was a sport for them in darkest Russia will hardly be effective in a country which stands in the forefront of the democracies of the world, which is famous for its liberal institutions, and where free speech and free opinions are rooted in the constitution of the land. The stupidity of these people is beyond bounds. They actually attempt to make a point against the Jews that the Jews were responsible for the Darwinian theory. One wishes they were. It would certainly have been a fine feather in their cap. But how any sensible people may expect to be captured by stuff and nonsense of this kind passes comprehension. Yet there it is, and seeing that the unthinking in every community outnumber those who think, it is bound to do a certain amount of damage in the anti-Jewish direction. To attempt to answer this conglomeration of lies and stupidity would be folly. What is necessary is to discover those who are engineering this wicked campaign against their fellow citizens. Presumably these evil minded people profess the Christian religion, and one cannot help wondering how they can square the teachings of Christian charity, than which there can be nothing nobler in any ethical system in the world, with a course of conduct which is inspired by hate. Is the Kingdom of Heaven made up of such as these?

Davis Memorial Lecture

The Chief Rabbi is gradually improving in health, and it is expected that he will be able to enter on his journey to the Colonies and Dominions in the autumn. His presence was missed at the third Arthur Davis Memorial Lecture, which was delivered by Dr. Israel Abrahams on "Religion and Poetry". The Chairman was Sir Arthur Quiller-Couch, who, as might be expected, gave expression to some excellent things. We cannot forbear to quote his brief reply to the vote of thanks that was recorded to him. That reply was delivered quietly, deliberately, slowly, and when the speaker sat down one felt as if one had had an electric shock. It was one of the most effective things we have ever heard in our experience. Here it is: "However we might distinguish between religion and poetry, the preponderant mass of both was a fine pedestal for human charity and should be a heavy stone in time to lay on the grave of persecution. There was an intolerable deal of persecution abroad in the world just now, and an intolerable deal of it was, through the eminence of the Jewish nation, directed against the Jews. Of however little importance a man might be, if he sincerely detested persecution and had detested it all his life, if he be allowed to add his voice to the chorus of protest against it and if he be allowed to testify to his hatred of it, the occasion was a great privilege".

London B'nai B'rith

The London Lodge is making headway this year in two directions. It is first of all clearing up arrears of work and neglect, both the result of the war years when things had to be allowed to drift; and secondly, it is preparing to lay the foundation of activities in the future. There is much to be done in both directions. Among other things the lodge is thinking of a home of its own which might at the same time become a center of communal activities. But in the present state of building in London this dream seems to be a little far off. Yet it is good to be alive to its need and to be on the look-out for possibilities to realize it. The membership is steadily growing, and, what is perhaps more encouraging, the interest in the lodge is growing too. Possibly when our next letter is printed we may have some interesting things to report.

The Cleveland Convention

It was a notable meeting which the Constitution Grand Lodge held in Cleveland. It was notable from the point of view of the number of delegates, testifying to the growth of the Order. The delegates from abroad brought to mind the ramifications of the Order and the great work accomplished in those lands where our organization has taken root. Still, it may be said in this connection that the proposition to change the name of the Order was not carried. We are linked to our brethren in faith wherever they may dwell; especially are we concerned in the fate of those who unlike ourselves forego the blessings of a government which does not discriminate between creed and creed; but we never have superimposed ourselves upon the internal affairs of the various Jewries each of which must naturally share in the problems and aspirations of the nation of which it forms a part. The address of the Order's head, now entering upon a new term of office in obedience to the mandate of the Convention, led the way. First in importance stands out the abolition of secrecy. It was pretty well known, even by outsiders, barring the naturally malevolent who for reasons of their own chose to misrepresent the truth, that in practice the Order has ceased to be a secret organization. Still it is well that the last vestige of it has been brushed aside. When the Order was founded, the element of secrecy was understood to be just a means to enhance the interest of the initiate. It was play and no more, exactly as in other fraternal organizations. But we Jews, who are unfortunately made the object of all sorts of slander, cannot afford to countenance any pretext of misrepresenting us and our aims. Our works, our institutions, our activity, speak for themselves. Nevertheless there must not be the least misunderstanding, the least ground for cavil. And our capacity for accomplishing the very objects of the Order is increased a hundredfold by the removal of all secrecy and of all obligation thereto. Naturally we are entitled to our privacy. But so long as none is bound by oath to refrain from divulging what passes at a lodge meeting, the lodge meetings can no longer be called secret. Then there was that important step for enlarging the scope of the activities of the Anti-Defamation League and for affording greater publicity to an account of its doings. At no time did the Jew stand in greater need in nipping in the bud the dastardly attempts to slander his fair name. It is not an academic question, but an eminently practical one. In these times of discontent and upheaval the Jew is everywhere exposed to being made the scapegoat. The Jew is fought by fair and foul means. Nothing is too despicable to fasten upon us the odium of our neighbors. The Jew wishes to live in peace with the world. He wants to be judged squarely and fairly. But all manners of libels are attached to the Jew. Some are merely annoying, others are exasperating. We must endeavor, of course, to grasp with the most difficult of all which ingrained in children of impressionable age is responsible for much of the hostility of the mob and the aloofness of the better classes. It will not be an easy task and will require much wisdom. But let it be said that signs are not waiting of good-will on the other side. Ours can be merely the duty of presenting our case, calmly, judiciously, with offense to none. In singling out the outstanding achievements of the Cleveland Convention we do not lose sight of the many other measures discussed, recommended, and to be acted upon after due deliberation by the Executive Committee. There is a new breath stirring. Men are eager to help. Members are becoming conscious of the Order's power for good and its constructive Jewish work.

Mass and Class

In these days of revolutionary ferment it cannot be astonishing that in the little world of Jewry there is a repercussion of the noises heard in the great world. The rumblings were perceptible to him that had ears to hear even in the years antecedent to the happenings in Russia. We have had among us a body ever increasing which has pleased to look upon itself as the spokesmen of the masses. Dissidents there have always been; Jews have always turned their back upon the synagogue. It happened in high and low quarters. Those below chose to affiliate themselves with larger movements and parties of the proletariat. The loss was regrettable, but was unavoidable in the general disintegration of belief and authority. We have no quarrel with those who leave us for pastures new. But for some years we have had those who would not be of the synagogue and yet claimed an allegiance to Jewry and asserted their right to be heard in the conclaves where Jewish interests were uppermost. They are still a small number. But they are exceedingly noisy. They proclaim themselves as the protagonists of the Jewish masses against the Jewish classes and their program is to wrench the administration of Jewish affairs from the hands of the supposedly few to be placed into those of the many. As a matter of fact, Jewish organizations meeting in combined sessions have admitted those spokesmen to their councils. But they are not satisfied with that part; they want the whole control of Jewish destiny. Now, Jewry today is admittedly in a most precarious condition, nay, at a critical moment in its history. To handle the many questions that confront the Jewish people requires the steady hand of the trained and experienced leader. We have had the self-appointed variety, it is true. But over against them there have not been wanting high-minded men, standing at the head of national and international organizations, men who have dealt for years with similar problems, men who have grown gray in the service of the Jewish cause, men of unimpeachable honesty, who served neither themselves nor any partisan organization, men imbued with love for their people, and in short, men of class. By saying that we do not mean that a leader must necessarily be of the aristocracy; be it of descent or of wealth or of intellect. But wheresoever true democracy reigns, not the counterfeit article, it is just men of that type that by popular vote are elevated to high office. Statesmanship is not acquired in a day. It is based primarily upon high character, and the men we put into office must be marked by a high degree of responsibility. Over against them stands the mass of irresponsibles. They lack, above all, self-repression. From their petty conventicles, of which no one hears and from which little gets into the large world, they carry their wonted methods of obstruction and above all of irresponsible talk into the larger gatherings, perfectly indifferent to the impression that the world receives and to incalculable damage which an unmeasured, unweighted word is bound to do. The true Jew whose every heart beat and whose very heart blood are for his unfortunate brethren so much in need of succor and moral support, must realize how the fate of Jewry cannot be intrusted to inferior men who contest the leadership of others merely because they are not of their own level. As it was, so it will ever be. Self-government is a great boon. It must be denied to no people or body of men. But democracy does not mean the rule of the mob. As Americans we believe in representative government, and he only may represent us who is truly representative of the very best that is in us. Not average intelligence, not lung-power, not the leaning upon one's own claque or clique, but the very highest intelligence, the most detached impartiality of judgment, and the greatest skill in diplomacy, must mark the spokesmen of any people. In this land there is none who cannot achieve in himself those prerequisite qualities and be he of the humblest origin. But rise he must. He then becomes a man of class. And thereby we all must abide. Our objects may be the same, we all may love our people; but to some of us it is given to lead, and to the vast majority to be led. Let those that are led willingly entrust the care of Israel in the hands of those who lead. There must be no question of mass or class.

A Communal Meeting-House

By DR. MAX L. MARGOLIS

The open-eyed observer of the spiritual conditions of Jewry in America must needs confess that somehow we have not had the vision to apprehend that which our communal life stands most in need of. The material needs of the community are well taken care of. We pride ourselves upon our magnificent hospitals, asylums, settlement houses of all sorts. Our charitable intutions are equipped with all the paraphernalia that modernity calls for; with high-priced directors or managers and their costly staffs. Education still lags behind; but schools of all varieties are maintained, though somewhat modestly, and not at all in proportion to the need of the community. The synagogue is not a communal institution. We are congregationalists in our synagogue management. The synagogue is built by and for the few. It could not be otherwise. The very structure imposes limitations. Moreover, for the last hundred years, the synagogue through innovation in ritual, has served to divide rather than to unite. The club and the lodge and the governing boards of communal institutions bring together those that go apart when they experience the need of worship. But all of these fail to take in the large mass that somehow, for one reason or another, is not of the synagogue. We cannot and should not exclude them from the body of the Jewish people or from the Jewish community. They claim that they have the Jewish consciousness and that they cherish it. What the community needs is a common meeting ground, nay, a communal meeting-house.

Far be it from me to question in any way the serviceableness of so venerable an institution as the synagogue. Nor will it do to hark back to beginnings and to insist on the fact that the synagogue at the time when the institution came into existence was, as its name indicates, a meeting house, not a house of worship. Only gradually did worship become a part of the synagogue institution. We must take an institution as it exists today, as it has existed for thousands of years. Still the synagogue as exclusively a house of worship, to be opened at stated intervals, is of recent date and born of modern conditions. In the ghetto, where old-time conditions survive, the synagogue is more than a house of worship. In European countries, at any rate before the war, every Jew belonged to community, unless he chose to withdraw. He belonged to community because rich and poor were taxed by the community. The synagogues, no less than the hospitals, belonged to this community. Naturally one's seat had to be paid for over and above the communal tax. But a Jew who entered any of the synagogues maintained by the community had a proprietary feeling; it was his as well as the next man's; he was not a guest in somebody else's house. I have wondered often why the Jews in this country have never seen the need of cathedral synagogues, situated in the heart of the Jewish settlement, which should be the property of the community. Of course, the obstacles are obvious. But even if such a structure arose, it would not attract large elements of the community that in one way or another must be brought into contract with the whole community of which they know themselves to be a part. Nor will the need be served by the institutional synagogues and the Jewish centers that are springing up in various large cities. For these still remain exclusive corporations. They are not built or maintained by communal tax.

Remember, it is the spirit of our belonging together that requires a place for its cultivation. All those who hold that they are Jews, who would have their children continue to be Jews, who evince a deep concern in all that pertains to the Jew in parts near or far, they must be brought together, to exchange views, to discuss in orderly manner Jewish questions, even to listen to exposition of the essence of that which for want of a better name we may call the Jewish spirit, ruah ha-Yahadut. Somehow the Hebrew term Yahadut is richer in connotation than the Anglicized Judaism. Jewishness, that modern translation of Yiddishkeit, does not express it. It has more reference to the Jewish life, to something tangible, not to the intangible spirit which is the creator of life and literature and religion alike. The present writer believes that Jewish religion covers the meaning of the Hebrew term, provided we take a large view of the term religion. In that sense many that consider themselves without it share in it unconsciously. But unfortunately religion is used by the average person in a narrower sense. It means doctrine, it signifies ritual. The thing that we are after has been called Jewish culture. But that smacks of the unreligious. After all we shall adhere to the Hebrew term, Yahadut, and each Jew is free to invest it with whatsoever meaning he likes best. Common to all must be the consciousness that it connotes that which not materially, but spiritually links Jew to Jew, that which thrills our hearts, that which we hold as the expression of our separate existence, which cannot be a thing material only, like race consciousness. For even race consciousness is not physical, but preeminently mental and spiritual. And it is rooted above all in Jewish thought, in the sum of Jewish thought, that which is neither in this book nor in that, but dispersed in them all.

Let the communal meeting-house, built and maintained by the taxes of each member of the Jewish community,

Report of the Anti-Defamation League

Summary of Seven Years Activities in Protecting Good Name of Jewry

To the President and Members of the Eleventh Quinquennial Convention of the Constitution Grand Lodge:

As Chairman of the Executive Committee of the Anti-Defamation League, I submit for your careful consideration the report of the Executive Secretary, Mr. Leon L. Lewis, which covers the activities of the league in its various phases.

I wish to express my deep appreciation of the splendid and untiring work of Judge Philip Stein, Chairman of the Administrative Committee and of the members of that committee. The Administrative Committee has met week after week, deciding upon intricate questions of policy, and directing the work. To the members of the Executive Committee of the League, I extend my sincere thanks for their co-operation and assistance. I appreciate that often these men were asked to perform services which were not pleasant and which demanded courage and manhood. The active members of the Executive Committee always responded when duty called. The untiring efforts of President Adolf Kraus in the work of the league cannot be overvalued. His calm and deliberate judgment has always guided.

In carefully perusing the report of the Executive Secretary, you will note that the work thus far has been confined to vigilance work—the correction of current defamation and abuses. That is, when a moving picture film was produced which was offensive, we were successful in having the objectionable features corrected or the entire film suppressed. In the case of objectionable magazine articles, as these cannot be refuted before their publication, our work necessarily had to be done after the publication, and therefore, after the injury has been done. In the case of books, we had to wait until they were published and then call for their correction which was done in future editions though here and there the current edition was withdrawn. To use a homely simile, we were like a fire department. When the alarm was sent in to us of some incendiary article, we would immediately rush to stamp out its flames and embers so that no great injury would result and no large conflagration develop. After we had performed our labor, we would return awaiting the next alarm.

Of course, we were also vigilant to see that in dangerous places, where incendiary possibilities existed, ways and means of installing safety measures were devised so as to minimize the danger of recurrence. Every one will agree that such a department is an absolute necessity, and must be maintained in the highest efficiency. Who can foretell how much injury would have been caused had not moving picture films been properly censored or how many minds would have been poisoned had not corrective measures been taken in that and other instances? The vigilance work must be continued with unabated energy just as long as current defamation appears and current defamation may be expected just as long as the mind is poisoned by the prejudices of the past.

You will also note from a study of the report of the Executive Secretary that practically no real constructive work has been done. It is true that there has been some constructive work accomplished, but this was merely incidental and growing out of the other branches of the work. The plan for constructive work heretofore outlined is one of large proportion and a serious undertaking. To uproot the prejudices of the past may seem so gigantic that it would bewilder the mind and yet, to accomplish the end which we have set for ourselves, it must be done. For centuries, it has been almost universally believed that the Jew was by nature a coward. What time has ever been so opportune as the present to show to the world the falsehood of this accusation? The red blood of the Jewish boys will not have fulfilled its complete mission until it is universally accepted that the Jew is as courageous and valorous as the bravest compatriot. It is almost universally accepted that the Jew the world over is first, a Jew, and then a citizen of the country in which he lives. No time has been more opportune to dispute this fallacy. For centuries, it has been universally accepted that the Jew is a materialist, that he controls the wealth of the world—great bankers of the world have been pointed to as Jews—and that the Jew cares nothing for the political, economical or social advance of human fellow beings, except insofar as such advance may serve his own selfish interests; that he is satisfied if he can be the money changer in the marts of the world. The very people who have so defamed him heretofore now charge with equal vehemence that the Jew is a Socialist, a Bolshevik, a disturber of the social and economic structure of the world, a revolutionist, a communist.

The inconsistency of these two antagonistic views concerning the Jew, if properly presented, should awaken the conscience of the world and shake from the mind the fetters of antagonism and prejudice. It is now high time, while the world is thinking new thoughts and opening its eyes to greater visions, to attack these phantoms of the past which have so long obsessed and deceived.

The thought naturally arises, why has not this obvious task been undertaken heretofore? You are entitled to a candid answer to this query. First: The vigilance and corrective work was of primary necessity. We attended to the current defamation, and this for many years required our entire energy. Second: During the war period, it was impossible to undertake this work. Third: Lack of sufficient funds would have prevented any labor along these lines even if the other facts had not opposed. The primary work of correcting current defamation is now well in hand. The war work has been ended. If sufficient funds can now be procured to undertake the greater work, then it should be undertaken.

I recommend therefore:

First: That the vigilance work be continued with undiminished effort.

Second: That ways and means be provided by proper action of this Convention to finance the league in a much wider program until the next Convention.

Third: That the constructive work as heretofore outlined be undertaken to the end that it should uproot the libels and antagonisms of the past and place the Jew before the conscience of the world to be judged by his conduct and his merits.

Fourth: That the members of the Executive Committee of the League be appointed annually by the President upon the nomination of the members of the Executive Committee for such district; and that other means be adopted by the Convention to assure closer co-operation and increased effectiveness.

In carrying on a constructive program, it is of primary necessity that the work be first carefully planned and charted and after the plan has been formulated and accepted that it be strictly adhered to.

For the purpose of illustrating some of the means that may be employed in carrying out the constructive work heretofore planned and the need for larger funds, I would suggest for your consideration and the consideration of the incoming members of the Executive Committee the following: There are six hundred thousand public school teachers in this country. Each one of them is forming the plastic mind of the young, who will be the men and women of the future. Constructive and corrective work can best be done by starting at the bottom and when we have cleansed the mind of the young from all poison and prejudice, we may then hope for a generation unbiased by the past. We can reach these teachers so as to inform them of the truth about the Jew. The advantages are manifold in picking out this particular class. An accurate mailing list can easily be procured; the literature is sure to reach persons who will in all probability not discard the same but who will read it; it may be fair to assume that if proper literature is from time to time sent to the teachers of this country, they will not only read the literature, but will think about the same; the teacher learns new thoughts and new facts, and in many instances will impart them to their students either directly or indirectly and particularly is this true if at various times they are requested so to do. The number of students of this country runs into tens of millions. Therefore, with a minimum of expense, we will be able to reach a maximum of result. In addition to this literature which may be thus transmitted, I would call to your attention that almost every state has a normal university which conducts summer schools for teachers. In the State Normal University of Illinois, for example, there are approximately six thousand teachers assembled every summer for a six weeks' course. Not only could literature be distributed to the teachers there assembled which they would undoubtedly treasure and keep, if put in attractive booklet form, but arrangements could also be made for five or six lectures to be delivered by competent men upon the subject of Jewish history, philosophy, ethics and allied studies. Such lectures unquestionably would be attended by a large number of the teachers there assembled.

Another class to be reached in the same manner and where literature could be of effective value is the preachers of the country, particularly those in the rural communities. Undoubtedly, there are many other special classes of persons who can be reached effectively in the same general manner.

I desire also to direct your consideration to the thought that our work should not be confined to the correction of conventional prejudice of the non-Jew against the Jew. Much to our regret, opportunity for this class of work can be found in our midst and in our own households. The conventional prejudices against the Jew have been so continuous and so almost universal, that they have even made their impression upon the minds of some Jews. It is a well-known psychological fact that an accusation against a class when continuously repeated, and almost universally accepted will eventually be accepted as true by some members of the accused class. Whenever this takes place, it engenders loss of self respect with all its concomitant evils. We all know that there is no fallacy which, under proper conditions and oft repeated, will not be universally accepted as true. When this has occurred, no one takes the trouble to establish the truth. Thus it is that there are, therefore, even Jews who either openly or secretly have been convinced that everybody hates the Jew and that therefore, there must be something wrong with the Jew. One of our philosophers has said with much truth in discussing this very subject: "But this state of things, if it continues, may do us a great moral harm. There is nothing more dangerous for a nation or for an individual than to plead guilty to an imaginary sin. When the sin is real, there is opportunity for repentance; by honest endeavor a sinner may purify himself. But when a man has been persuaded to suspect himself unjustly, how can he get rid of his consciousness of guilt"?

Closely allied to this subject is one further thought and that is the prejudice of one class of Jews against another class of Jews. We frequently are guilty of the same offense against brother Jews that we charge the non-Jew with being guilty of. The method by which these prejudices are created resembles in many respects the processes usually responsible for prejudice in the non-Jew, and its exhibition sometimes takes similar forms. The great evil is that we reason from false inferences; from the particular to the general and universal. A Jewish immigrant from "X" is uncultured and unethical. We have the same experience with one or more immigrants from the same country or locality. Then we conclude that all Jews from "X" are unethical and uncultured. We also fall into the same error as the general public and require a higher standard from particular persons or groups of persons than is justified. The immigrant Jew from "X" is required to have the same standard of ethics and culture as the Jew from "Y" has and if he fails, we conclude that he does not measure up as he should. We do not take into account, however, his previous environments and lack of opportunity. The true test should be, does the immigrant Jew from "X" possess at least as high a degree of culture, ethics and morality as the non-Jew immigrant from "X". If the Jews of this country would take the time and trouble to weigh the immigrant Jew from any country against the non-Jew from the same country and of the same stratum of society, then if the balance was unfavorable to the Jew, his brother Jews would have just ground for complaint. But his duty would not end there.

It is our duty both as citizens of this country and as Jews, if the immigrant from "X" does not measure up, in ethics and in culture and in morality, to the highest standard required by American citizenship, to elevate him to that standard. The condition of the attitude of Jew against Jew should receive the earnest consideration of the League and of the Jewish pulpit.

Respectfully submitted,
SIGMUND LIVINGSTON,
Chairman Executive Committee.

Report

To the Chairman, Executive Committee of the Anti-Defamation League:

In accordance with your request, I am submitting herewith a brief report of the history and activities of the Anti-Defamation League.

The League celebrates this year the seventh anniversary of its organization. Founded in 1913, the system of operation then perfected has remained practically unchanged, though the nature of the work itself has grown progressively in volume and variety. The Executive Committee of the League is represented in all the large cities of the country and many of the lodges have special Anti-Defamation Committees. The Governing Board, composed of the Chicago representatives of the Executive Committee, directed the executive work of the League until February, 1918, when it surrendered its functions to the Administrative Committee composed of five members under the Chairmanship of Judge Philip Stein, a member of the Executive Committee of the Order, with the President of the Order and the Chairman of the League's Executive Committee as members ex-officio. The other members of the Committee are Judge Hugo Pam and Judge Joseph B. David of the Superior Court of Cook County, and Adolph D. Weiner and Benjamin J. Samuels of the Chicago Bar, both of whom are Past Presidents of District Grand Lodge No. 6. In addition, the Chairman of the Purity of the Press Club of the Council of Jewish Women, Mrs. Moses L. Purvin, attends the meetings regularly as a representative of the organization. All of the members of the Administrative Committee have been actively associated with the governing body of the League since its inception. They all participated in the drafting of the principles governing the League's activities and have consistently maintained the continuity of the League's policies. Meetings are held every Monday noon throughout the year, almost always with full attendance. The present Secretary of the League has had charge of the Executive Office since its foundation in 1913, with the exception of the period from October, 1917, to December, 1919, during which he was serving overseas with the United States Army.

He was succeeded in the interim by Mr. L. Edward Lashman, and for part of the time by Mrs. Edith Deutsch Lashman. In December, 1919, upon Mr. Lashman's resignation to accept the position of Superintendent of the Jewish Orphan Home in Cleveland, the writer resumed the office of Executive Secretary of the League.

Authority in Organic Law

The legal sanction for the League is found in Part III, Article VIII, of the Organic Law:

"There is hereby created an Anti-Defamation League, which shall conduct the work of combating all phases of defamation of the Jew. Its plan of government shall be framed by the Executive Committee of the Order and it shall be headed by a Chairman who shall be elected by such Committee, be notified of its meetings and have the privilege of the floor at the same. Only members of the Order shall constitute the Executive or Governing Board of the League and its chief representatives in given communities shall be members of the Order. The Executive Committee is empowered to appropriate, from time to time, out of the general funds, such sums as it may deem necessary to carry on the work of the League, which sums shall be expended under the direction of the Governing Board by and with the consent of the Executive Committee".

Previous Reports

Since 1913, the League has published many informal reports in the columns of B'nai B'rith News, and in the form of special circulars sent to the members of the Executive Committee. Only two official reports have been issued thus far. The first of these was the report to the Constitution Convention of the Order in San Francisco in 1915. The report contained in ninety-six pages a complete statement of the history of the League, its aims and objects and a description of its modus operandi. It also contained many pages of correspondence covering typical cases in the various fields of activity. The policies outlined in the report have in the main continued to govern the League's activities. The correspondence from this office is of the same general character, though there have been radical changes in the scope and character of the League's work. It was proposed to publish another official report in the early part of 1917, but the entry of the United States into the war and the concentration of attention on the Soldiers' Welfare work caused it to be put off. It was not until September, 1918, that the second report appeared. It was devoted very largely to the special work of the League arising out of war conditions and omitting any mention of the operations of the League from May, 1915, to January, 1918.

Practically the entire report was devoted to reprints of correspondence in typical cases arising during the first eight months of 1918.

General Policies

In the introduction to the 1915 report, Mr. Sigmund Livingston, the Chairman of the Executive Committee of the League, stated:

"We realized from the beginning that many delicate situations would arise; we knew that we would be subjected to the charge of supersensitiveness; we appreciated the fact that we were undertaking a Herculean task to realize the hopes of the American Jew. In planning the work, we laid upon ourselves at the very beginning certain rules and requirements which had to be enforced to make the work one of enduring success. The most important requirement was that in the treatment of every subject conservatism must be the keynote; that fairness with those with whom we had to deal was a prime essential and that only such demands would be made upon those who had the shaping of public opinion as seemed practicable and just; that we had to keep in mind the conditions with which we had to deal and to face each problem manfully and consistently. We found it necessary at all times to guard carefully against the visionary and the radical. We have not attempted reforms that could not be practically carried out. We have, however, combated by honorable means every source of defamation which could, in our opinion, be remedied".

The Convention of the Order in 1915 endorsed the work of the League and its approval of Chairman Livingston's wise management, in the following words:

"We especially approve the draft of "Principles" adopted by the League, as constituting a fair, non-partisan platform upon which all persons—Jew and non-Jew alike—may stand. We regard the work already done by the League as one of the most beneficial accomplishments that have been furthered by the Order, and for that reason strongly recommend to the Finance Committee that adequate appropriation of necessary funds be made with which to carry on the work of the league. We approve the special recommendations of the Executive Committee of the League, viz.:

"(1) That the campaign against every form of scurrilous attack and defamation of the Jew be energetically continued.

"(2) That every publication which tends to defame the Jew be properly and manfully answered by a publication setting forth the truth in such manner as to reach the same reading public.

"(3) That every cause of unjust discrimination against the Jew be carefully investigated and combated by honorable means.

"(4) That the campaign to eradicate from the curriculum of our public schools all literature which tends to poison the minds of children be continued.

"(5) That a conservative educational plan be undertaken so that the general public may know the facts concerning the Jew. Such a campaign should include among others the following media: (a) By furnishing for publication articles on the status of the Jew in its various phases. (b) By encouraging the circulation, through public and university libraries, of books which truthfully set forth the history, religion, traditions, ethics, culture and philosophy of the Jew.

"As to the recommendation No. 6 (c) reading as follows: 'By providing ways and means of supplying the smaller colleges and universities and other educational bodies with courses of lectures on Jewish subjects, and by these means educating the future teachers and ministers to the truth of and concerning the Jew'—we recommend that the work therein outlined be carried out and that the Executive Committee of the Anti-Defamation League be requested to invite co-operation in this particular branch of its work".

Educational Program

It will be noted that in this endorsement, the Convention laid great stress on the educational work of the League and it is equally clear from the "Principles" that the founders of the League realized that only in that way could the roots of prejudice be reached. All the other work of the League, however successful in removing the external indicia of prejudice, would be without avail unless at the same time every possible effort is made to reach the causes of prejudice. But the resources at the command of the League have never been sufficiently large to make it possible to carry out the educational program in its entirety. The field is still largely unexplored. To be sure, we have assisted libraries throughout the country in preparing a proper Jewish bibliography. We have requested libraries to withdraw objectionable books from circulation. We have been able through committees in various cities closely associated with library administration and with the American Library Association to prevent objectionable books from being purchased by the libraries. We have to a limited extent disseminated literature in various forms designed to educate the public to a true understanding of our people. We have induced publishers in scores of cases to change the plates of standard books so as to eliminate prejudicial matter. We have secured the co-operation of the various local Councils of Jewish Women in removing from sale in their localities all those nursery rhyme books containing the "Rogue of a Jew" stanzas, which remained in the bookstores prior to receipt of the changed editions. We have had a very large measure of success in eliminating the use of certain textbooks, especially the "Merchant of Venice", in the public schools of the country. The League has done a great deal to carry out the educational program, but a tremendous amount of work remains to be done—work which can only be accomplished by marshalling far larger funds than have ever been at the League's disposal.

No serious consideration for example has been given to the religious phase of anti-Jewish prejudice—the Crucifixion legend—which has been the keystone in the arch of hatred of our people throughout the ages. The President of the Order has covered this phase in his message to the Cleveland Convention in so powerful a manner that it would be presumptuous for the writer to more than mention the possibilities for serious endeavor in that connection.

In contrast with the limited activities in that field, it is generally appreciated that the League has in its other activities exceeded the expectations of those responsible for its foundation, and has done much to educate the general public to a proper appreciation of our position. The League's vigilance work has been conducted through a closely knit organization covering every State of the Union and centralized and directed through the Administrative Committee and the executive office in Chicago. It has created a revolution in the method of portraying the Jewish character before theatrical audiences. Objectionable vaudeville acts and motion pictures have now been reduced to a minimum. In the field of legislation, it has succeeded beyond its expectations in providing proper censorship legislation throughout the country and has secured the co-operation of all public authorities in preventing defamation on the motion picture screen. Six states have passed Anti-Discrimination Acts to prevent schools, hotels, summer resorts and other places of public accommodation, resort or amusement, from advertising discrimination against our people.

Motion Pictures

The first phase in the League's operations was naturally that which covered the perfection of the administrative machinery and the carrying out of plans designed to eliminate the most flagrant exhibition of prejudice and discrimination. For nearly three years, thereafter, practically all the energies of the League were aimed at the campaign against defamation on the stage and on the screen. A careful survey of the motion picture situation was made. Negotiations were carried on with the National Board of Censorship with satisfactory results and members of the Executive Committee of the League and special Anti-Defamation League committees in nearly every lodge called upon all the managers of motion picture theaters in their respective communities and explained to them our purpose and aims. The executive office of the League conducted direct negotiations with producers and film exchanges. It encouraged the passage of censorship ordinances. Its representatives co-operated effectively in the actual censorship of the films. It issued bulletins on all objectionable films already in circulation, and at the same time, strained every effort to educate all those engaged in the production, distribution and exhibition of pictures to a proper comprehension of our position. The result is known to everyone. The Jew no longer is defamed and caricatured in the cinema as in the past. All producers are properly wary of violating what has become a fundamental ethic of the industry. It is no longer necessary for the League to concern itself with censorship ordinances, with the distributor or with the exhibitor. The League from time to time still has negotiations with producers, but for a very different purpose; for the producers are now consulting the League whenever they are called upon to produce a picture involving a Jewish subject. The executive office of the League has always been ready and to aid such producers. In the appendix of this report, will be found two contrasting accounts of negotiations conducted by the League in 1916 and 1919. The first was that in which the famous Griffith production "The Mother and the Law" was finally changed at a tremendous expense because of the determined stand taken by our organization and the second, that in 1919, involved the co-operation of the League in the production of a series of religious films. In the latter case, the producer requested us to assist him in preparing a scenairo.

Vaudeville

The success of the League was equally pronounced in the vaudeville theaters. The fact that during the past several months but few valid complaints have been received and the further fact that during 1914, 1915 and 1916, hardly a week passed without some complaint of an objectionable vaudeville act being received, speaks for itself. The manner in which this was accomplished also speaks volumes for the close co-operation of all the representatives of the League and of the lodges. The final quietus resulted from direct communications established with local managers of all the vaudeville theaters in the country. The League had previously obtained the co-operation of the booking agencies and had attempted to obtain the assistance of all actors. In spite of these efforts, and in spite of instructions from the booking offices, many acts continued to depict the Jew as a sneak, a mercenary egoist, a crafty materialist or a disreputable character of one kind or another. The defamation which was practiced was coupled usually with an attempt at humor. Witticism in regard to fires, bankruptcies and mercenary marriages constituted the foundation of many of these acts. Vulgar, indecent and scurrilous dialect songs were usually employed. A dirty misshapen suit of clothes or a vulgar overdisplay of jewelry or finery were frequently employed. Our appeal to the managers of theaters brought astonishing results. We made it clear to them that we did not object to those acts in which the actor merely refers to the Jew or impersonates the Jew, but we did object most strenuously where it was evident from his act that his principal purpose was to slander a whole people, where he ascribes ignoble characteristics or disgusting mannerisms to the Jew, ridicules Jewish customs and makes the Jew appear as a sneak, a coward, a schemer, a defaulter, a firebug, a fence or a mental defective. We urged the managers if they believed we were justified in our attitude, to send a letter to the booking agencies supplying their theaters, requesting them not to book acts for their theater which came within the above category. The many replies received indicated a thorough willingness to co-operate and assist and an intelligent appreciation of the necessity for our activity in that regard. During the war, the notice reprinted in the message of the President was posted conspicuously behind the scenes in all vaudeville theaters of the country in compliance with a request made by the League.

The final result from the direct negotiations with the booking agencies, the indirect requests made to the agencies by theaters, the enforced elimination of objectionable portions of acts by the theater managers themselves prior to local exhibition, the direct appeal made by the League's office to the actors involved and the advance information furnished by our representatives to vaudeville theater managers of the impending arrival of one whose act was considered objectionable—all these resulted in an almost thorough cleansing of the vaudeville stage.

Of course, from time to time acts will continue to appear which are defamatory and injurious in their effect, but the co-operation which has been secured with the booking agencies and theater managers makes it a simple matter, after the League has convinced itself of the validity of the complaint, to enforce compliance with the new standard which has been established. No small part of the success has resulted from the co-operation of some of the Jewish actors themselves who have volunteered their services to the League in tracing down and putting a stop to such objectionable acts as they may personally come in contact with in their travels on the circuits. One of the difficulties encountered, of course, was the fact that so many of our coreligionists were prone to see insult where insult was never intended, and the League, therefore, found it necessary to adopt the policy of securing verbatim transcripts wherever there was any question to validity of the complaint. In this way it has made certain of the impregnability of its own position before taking any action.

Other Activities.

Although the major part of the League's activities were concentrated up to 1917 in the above two general lines of activity, it was still found necessary to handle hundreds of complaints of all sorts involving objectionable articles in newspapers, magazines, trade journals and books, and many cases of individual discrimination and oppression. The report of the League published in 1915 contains many pages of transcript of correspondence involving typical cases falling within the above categories which occurred prior to that date. It would be useless repetition to go into this phase of the League's activities at this point.

In the appendix will be found an account of the more interesting cases which have been handled in the past few months. Hundreds of cases of the same nature and description are handled annually.

Anti-Discrimination Laws

In 1916, the abatement of the motion picture and vaudeville films made it possible for the League to concentrate on another important line of activity, namely that involving the passage of legislation in certain states to prevent the publication and distribution of discriminating advertising matter.

It had been found that personal appeal to the managers of summer resorts and schools had been productive of very small results. A bill had been prepared and sent for the purpose of introduction in the state legislatures to prominent members of the Order in about fifteen of the states holding regular legislative sessions commencing January, 1917. The support of the lodges in the various states was sought and secured and the Council of Jewish Women through its local organizations co-operated most effectively. The sole object sought to be attained was the prevention of the publication and distribution of discriminating matter. What the Order had in mind in entering upon this campaign and what the League most earnestly wished to prevent and prohibit by law was the spreading broadcast throughout the land of leaflets, posters, folders or circulars containing such language as ''Jews and dogs not wanted'', ''Jews and consumptives not wanted'' and similar phrases. No attempt has ever been made by the League to force hotel keepers to accept Jews as guests. When this position was made clear, the legislatures of the following states, Illinois, Colorado, New Hampshire, Connecticut, Pennsylvania and Maine, placed the act upon their statute books in practically the same form as drawn up by the League. In Minnesota, an additional act was passed making it unlawful in written instructions relating to or affecting real estate to discriminate against any persons or class of persons because of their religious faith or creed.

Merchant of Venice

In 1917, the League also concentrated its attention on the discontinuance of the use of the Merchant of Venice as a text book in our public schools. During the war the necessity of coping with more dangerous forms of defamation caused the temporary abandonment of the educational work and it is only within the past few months that the League has given renewed attention to the use of objectionable schoolbooks. In the past few months, a new campaign has been going on centering in those cities not previously investigated.

(A recent issue of the B. B. News contained a full statement relative to the Merchant of Venice, and the balance of this section is therefore omitted).

Defamation During the War

The various activities above described constitute the first phase in the development of our organization. All of them are being continued in a more or less intensive manner. But with the entrance of the United States into the war a new situation confronted us. The great work then before us was the refutation of the ever-recurring charges that the Jew was unpatriotic, a slacker and a coward. I am not in a position to present a personal report of the work done during this phase, as I resigned as Secretary of the League in October, 1917, and during the two years I was overseas was entirely out of touch with the activities of our organization. But such a report on my part in any event would be unnecessary, as a large portion of the interesting report of the League published by the Acting Secretary, Mrs. Edith Deutsch Lashman, in September, 1918, is devoted to the activities during this period, especially emphasizing the steps taken to counteract the slanderous charges above mentioned. The 1918 report recites the history of numerous cases taken up with the Federal Government, the Fosdick Commission, the Y. M. C. A. and other welfare organizations. An appeal was made to the patriotism and common sense of those who were at fault and attention directed to the wholehearted support given by our people to the Government at the front and in the home sector. The correspondence reprinted in that report shows the success which met the League's efforts during that difficult period.

Recent Developments

With the Armistice, the League entered upon a new phase of its activities. Whereas in the past it had gone on the theory that defamation was in the great majority of cases the result of ignorance and thoughtlessness, it now began to appear as though the defamation in the press and magazines was due to some other cause. In some instances the League was convinced that the defamatory utterances were the result of a concerted anti-Jewish propaganda. The reasons for the campaign of vilification in the Polish press of this country are given in Mr. Kraus' message to the Convention.

In its other aspects, the increased defamation of the Jew in this country could be traceable in part to the unprecedented wave of anti-Semitism that has been sweeping Europe for the past year. The Ukrainian pogroms, the reactionary White Terror in Hungary, the intensified oppression in Roumania, the economic boycott of Jews in Poland, the systematic solicitation of funds by reactionaries in Germany to drive the Jews from that country—all these were accompanied by organized propaganda work in Europe designed to justify the offenders in their course. All the ridiculous libels which have ever been invented against our people were revived and resuscitated and spread broadcast in accordance with modern publicity methods. The press of hitherto liberal countries, such as England and the Scandinavian states, was infected. Several of the leading English newspapers have in recent months become violently anti-Jewish in their editorial policy. Even the London ''Times'' seems to have abandoned its hitherto liberal policy in this regard. Some American papers and magazines have become particularly assidious in reprinting as much of the defamatory material from these and other European sources as they dared. Foreign correspondents of American papers, located in European hotbeds of anti-Semitism, were infected and filled their dispatches with the libelous stories with which the propagandists carefully fed them. Most of these stories had to do with Bolshevism, and the majority of them charged the Jews with being responsible for terroristic conditions in Russia. They stated that ninety per cent or more of the Jews in that country were Bolsheviks and that the Jews constituted the warp and woof of Communism, filling all the high official positions in the Bolshevik government, as well as constituting the most powerful element among its supporters. Public lecturers who had spent a few months in Europe came back filled with the same misinformation and passed on to their American audiences the stories prepared for them by anti-Semitic propagandists of Europe. The panic-stricken efforts of our National, State and municipal governments to prevent the spreading of radicalism in this country, and the consequent terror aroused in a large section of our people seemed to deprive a section of our press of its traditional fairness and saneness.

The piling up of insidious falsehoods anent Jewish participation in Russian Bolshevism had prepared the ground for fear of American Jews as spreaders of radicalism in this country. The identity of a few individuals of Jewish birth among the deportees unfortunately gave some basis for this belief and was taken full advantage of.

This condition still prevails. The League is straining every effort to counteract the injurious effect which has been produced. It was convinced that when the true facts were presented to the American public that our national fairness and common sense would reassert itself. A campaign of education was started. Public lecturers were challenged to show proof for the assertions which they were making. The total lack of any real evidence to support the charges made was called to the attention of newspaper and magazine editors. In this work the League was most fortunate in enlisting the aid of a man who had spent a year in Soviet Russia as a correspondent for the Chicago ''Daily News'', Mr. Isaac Don Levine. Mr. Levine is one of the most prominent of our newspaper correspondents. He is the man who discovered and brought back to America the famous ''Willy-Nicky'' letters and the letters from the Czarina to the Czar which were published simultaneously all over the world and created a universal sensation. He was primed with first-hand information as to conditions in Russia and was one of only three or four foreign correspondents who had succeeded in penetrating that country. He knew the facts and had the proof which the League needed so badly to counteract in a convincing manner the libels which had gone so long unanswered. He volunteered his services to address audiences which had heard the other side of the story, and in this way the League was able to counteract some of the pernicious influences at large. Transcripts of his speeches were made and sent to the leading newspapers of the country with a plea that they be published. The editor of every American newspaper having a circulation of 10,000 or over has been commnuicated with and proof submitted of the falsity of the charges which are being made against our people. The Administrative Committee believes that the crisis has passed and that the steps now being taken and which are already showing some effect will gradually cause conditions to return to normal. Constant vigilance is being maintained, however, and the League's clipping service daily presents cases requiring attention.

Conclusion

It has been possible in this report to touch upon only a few of the more serious situations which have confronted the League. The Executive Office has become a clearing house for cases of every description. Since resuming my duties last December, and up to April 1st of this year, 130 cases have been submitted to the weekly meetings of the Administrative Committee for action. The Committee has given careful attention to each of these, and in addition has conferred at length on the larger matters of policy which are always coming before it. Most of the cases fall within the categories already discussed. A few of more than usual interest are reported in the appendix.

It is impossible to mention in this report the names of all those who have aided the Administrative Committee in its task. The members of the Executive Committee, scattered from coast to coast and from Canada to the Gulf, have given largely of their time and have labored conscientiously and enthusiastically. The Administrative Committee has directed me to extend to the members of the Executive Committee its deep appreciation of the loyal and earnest support which they have tendered to it and without which but little could have been accomplished.

In conclusion, I wish to express my gratification at the confidence placed in me by the President of the Order and by the Chairman and members of the Executive and Administrative Committees during the past seven years. My association with them and with the members of the Executive Committee will always be a source of pride and satisfaction. It is my earnest hope that I may continue to deserve the trust that has been placed in me.

Respectfully submitted,
LEON L. LEWIS,
Executive Secretary.

I. O. B. B. Secrecy Abolished

It had to come. "The old order changeth, giving place to new," applies with special fitness to the Order B'nai B'rith.

At its Grand Lodge Convention in Cleveland, the obsolete and harmful element of secrecy was ordered abolished.

This is good. It proves that the Order is progressive. It indicates that, like the Jewish people and their faith, they can dispense with outworn things which contain no vital principles.

Secrecy, if it ever was a need in the B'nai B'rith, has long outlived its purpose. It had become a mockery. It was more than an empty form. It gave a handle to the hating bigot who professed to see, behind the secrecy, some evil reason.

The enlightened members of the B'nai B'rith have fought long for this now accomplished object of eliminating secrecy.

So stubborn is fixed custom and established habit that it took till now to win the victory.

"The Modern View," which, long ago, "publicly voiced the objections to secrecy, and its editor as a Ben B'rith who also opposed it, rejoices in the decision of the Grand Lodge. It redounds to the credit of the Order and will benefit its future. The abolition of secrecy removes a serious obstacle that prevented many good men from joining the B'nai B'rith.

We believe that of the good work done by the Grand Lodge in its Cleveland session, the abolishment of secrecy stands easily the first and best.

It marks a new era of progress and will be followed by still further, broader, betterment.—The Modern View (St. Louis).

World Zionist Conference

London, June 23.—Public ownership of land, a co-operative commonwealth, and equal rights for all, were advocated here today as the three leading principles in the social program American Zionists desire incorporated in the Jewish Homeland in Palestine, by Jacob de Haas, Executive Secretary of the Zionist Organization of America.

Mr. deHaas arrived in London today with U. S. Supreme Court Justice Louis D. Brandeis, Honorary President of the Zionist Organization of America; Judge Julian W. Mack, president; Nathan Strauss, Mrs. Mary Fels, Prof. Felix Frankfurter, Captain Abraham Tulin, David Rosenbloom and Louis Lipsky, organization secretary—the advance guard of the 39 delegates of American Zionists to the World Zionist Conference, convening in London July fourth.

American Zionists will make a united effort to have the Pittsburgh Program, which they adopted in 1918 as the guiding social principles for the Jewish Homeland, approved by the World Conference, in the program it will formulate for the policy to be carried out in Palestine. Mr. deHaas in the statement he gave out on the eve of the conference stressed the tenets of the Pittsburgh Program, declaring:

"The Zionists are not going to be satisfied with a Palestine, or Land of Israel, which will be a mere duplicate of the numerous small states of Europe or South America. They believe that the 2,000 years of suffering and martyrdom of the wandering Jew has given to our race a wealth of experience which, added to the ancient heritage of the Jew, can be made fruitful in the creation of a model settlement in the land of our forefathers. This is not a mere empty boast of a group of chauvinists.

"History shows the Jew with a major characteristic that is easily recognized. It is the Hebraic passion for justice. And this translates itself into the modern phrase, social justice. It is therefore altogether proper that when the Zionist ideal is transformed from an old-time dream of the ghetto into a matter for concrete accomplishment the program for actual achievement in Palestine should reflect this passion for social justice.

"The Pittsburgh Platform may be summarized in the following three 'battle-cries of freedom': (1) Public Ownership of Land; (2) the Co-operative Commonwealth; (3) Equal Rights. The first is expressed in the phrase that the land of Palestine 'shall be owned or controlled for the benefit of the people of Palestine as a whole.' The Zionists of America have resolved that the benefits which come through increasing land values will not go into the pockets of land speculators, but will always remain 'community values,' which will go into the public treasury. This is merely the modern interpretation of the phrase: 'The land is mine,' saith the Lord, 'and ye are my tenants.'

"The second principle indicates that the Zionists of America are resolved to encourage co-operative enterprise to the largest extent possible, so that a co-operative commonwealth may be gradually evolved, without, however, crushing individual initiative. There is no simple formula by which the co-operative commonwealth can be achieved—it must be a development through struggle and experimentation. In any event, we have set the goal!

"The third principle is one with which all Americans are familiar—at least in theory, though we may fall short in actual practice. Whereas, however, we confine our program of 'equal rights' to the narrow field of politics, the Zionists of America would apply it all to all of Palestinian life—to politics and economics, to law and industry, to man and woman, to every sect and every creed. They seek to apply the principle 'there shall be one law for you and the stranger in the land.'

"However," he concluded, "the job is not that of formulating principles. Manifestos and declarations interest me little, the real task is the sane application of these ideas as opportunity presents itself. Evolution requires both judgment and patience."

The Lodz authorities, according to a dispatch from Paris, have issued an order forbidding Hebrew instruction in the public schools. Jewish deputies in the Seim who intervened in the matter were informed by the Minister of Education that the Polish government considers Hebrew a superfluous subject. The Minister added that if the Jewish community will pay the teachers he may be disposed to reconsider the matter.

Ernest Spady, a Jewish student, was killed because of his protests at being excluded from the Budapest University. Six other Jewish bodies were found with every evidence to show that they have been brutally killed.

We are informed from Berlin that the Bavarian government, acting on the request of the Jewish community, closed a number of anti-Semitic periodicals in Munich for their pogrom agitations.

The Paris correspondent of the J. C. B. telegraphs that according to information he has received on the best authority, France will not recognize the sovereignty of Feisul, nor is there any inclination on the part of French statesmen to make the Syrian leader any concessions.

Judge Fisher in Soviet Russia

American Jewish relief workers have finally penetrated into Soviet Russia to organize and carry on palliative and reconstructive measures for the Jewish war sufferers of this vast territory, opened for the first time to outside aid since the outbreak of hostilities in 1914.

Judge Harry M. Fisher, Chicago, and Max Pine, New York, are the first American relief workers to reach the heart of Russia. Judge Fisher has just arrived in Petrograd and Mr. Pine in Moscow, according to cabled reports they sent the Joint Distribution Committee.

Plans have been worked out, they reported, for sending relief materials direct to the suffering Jewish people of Russia without any interruption or interference, through an agreement entered into with the Esthonian government. M. Tennison, Premier of Esthonia, has promised the co-operation of his government in shipping supplies across Esthonia, while the Jewish National Council of Esthonia has assumed all responsibility for the transportation and delivery of supples to the destitute of Russia.

Permission for American Jewish Relief workers to enter Soviet Russia was granted by the U. S. State Department, with the specific reservations that no relief supplies be sent there for destitute Jewish men, women and children which could be converted to military use.

In a recent letter Judge Fisher reported:

"Thirty-seven per cent of those above the age of 35, afflicted with typhus in the Ukraine, die. This strikes at the fathers and mothers and leaves behind helpless orphans."

"The death rate seems to be about one per cent for patients under 20 and 11 per cent for those between 20 and 35," the report continues. "A short stay in this part of the world impresses one with the feeling that all the forces of destruction and misery have been let loose upon these unfortunate people. For months typhus has been raging throughout this territory, and particularly in the larger centers, taking more victims than the war and pogroms combined.

"Lack of nourishment and overstrained nerves have lessened the resisting power of the popultioan. There is hardly a house to be found that did not suffer from the disease. The most dreadful thing about this disease is that it attacks most violently those who are engaged in the service of combating it. Out of 32 physicians in the County of Proskurow, 10 already have succumbed to it. The sight of the women with their hair shorn clean to the scalp is a most depressing thing. This is the emblem of having successfully overcome the disease. There are no nurses to be had, and in many of the towns the women who have already recovered and feel immune are taking turns at nursing. The hospitals are without beds and linens. There are no disinfectants."

Perhaps a more grave problem, the official report points out, is the fact that those who do recover from typhus are left in such a weakened condition that they are subject to other diseases incident to hunger, filth and exposure. Tuberculosis, scrofula among the children, pneumonia and other diseases are spreading in appaling proportions and the physicians predict an epidemic of cholera, the report declares.

Reports received from Warsaw state that Polish soldiers have again taken up their work of attacking Jews wherever they find them on the streets and in railroad stations. The victims are beaten and generally subjected to all the forms of abuse to which Polish Jewry has become accustomed.

Jerusalem Daily Mail

Founded as the result of a wager less than a year ago, with a capital of 70 pounds, all the money its eight backers could raise, the Daily "Mail", Jerusalem's new Hebrew daily, now has a weekly English edition, is planning a similar weekly Arabic edition and has a steadily growing circulation which has already passed the 3,000 mark.

Miss Rivka Aaronsohn, member of the famous family whose name is linked with Jewish settlements since the first pioneer colonists established themselves in Palestine 38 years ago, and one of the founders of this unique journalistic enterprise, is now visiting in New York to secure modern equipment and print paper for the newspaper.

No successful newspaper has probably ever had such a strange line-up of editors and has been managed as is the "Doar Hayom," or "Daily Mail." None of the board of eight editors is a newspaperman, one is a lawyer, another works with the English Occupied Territory Administration, the rest are in business in Jerusalem, while Miss Aaronsohn is a colonist in the famous settlement of Zichron Jacob, celebrated by the notable agricultural experiments carried on there by her late brother, Aaron Aaronsohn.

"Each evening after their regular duties are ended, the board meets at the newspaper office and gets out the next morning's edition," Miss Aaronsohn related. "Most of the men stay on the job until two and three o'clock in the morning. We have never missed a day yet, although sometimes we barely had enough paper to print the edition and many times Ittamar Ben Avi just got back from Egypt in time with a supply of paper or with enough advertisements sold to continue operations."

The newspaper has now become so prosperous that the families of its 40 employees are living comfortably off it, according to Miss Aaronsohn. It is operated entirely on a co-operative basis, but the earnings received by the board of editors are placed back in the treasury so that more modern equipment may be purchased.

The strange beginnings of this little paper were told by Miss Aaronsohn as follows:

"For many years the pioneer Jewish colonists of Palestine had been dissatisfied with the one Hebrew daily in Jerusalem. We wanted freedom of expression in our press, we wanted a paper with a broad policy looking to the future welfare of all Palestine. We wanted good feeling between all the various classes in Palestine. But we couldn't express our views in the paper. Its editors wouldn't permit it.

"One day less than a year ago, Asher Saphir, a young Jewish colonist, who fought four years with the French, complained to one of the backers of the paper about its policy. 'Start another paper, why don't you,' retorted the editor. 'We will,' answered Saphir. 'Ten pounds you can't,' rejoined the editor. Saphir took the bet, called us seven together, we combined our capital of 70 pounds, and on the additional credit we were able to get, together with 700 pounds on advance payments of advertisements we secured in Egypt and Palestine, had the paper running in a month."

Ittamar Ben Avi, one of the editors of "Doar Hayom" is one of the most distinguished and brilliant of the young Jews of the new Palestine. With an international reputation as a journalist, through his articles in leading French papers, unmasking German ambitions before the outbreak of war, he is now backing the new journalistic experiment of Jerusalem with the same daring and ability that caused him to laugh during the war while the frantic Turks placed a price upon his head and tried in every possible way to end his activities against them in Palestine.

Ben Avi is now in England, getting financial support for the paper by selling stock at 10 pounds a share. Baron James de Rothschild has purchased one thousand shares, according to Miss Aaronsohn.

"Anyone in Palestine can contribute to the paper", Miss Aaronsohn contined. "No one is barred because his views differ from the editors. We are working for the future upbuilding of Palestine and that can only be accomplished by freedom of expression. We started the English edition because there are so many English in Palestine now. We will start the Arabic edition so that all races and creeds will be brought closer together."

Miss Aaronsohn claims that their paper, founded at first merely as a volunteer bit of work for the good of Jewish settlements in Palestine, bids fair to be one of the best paying enterprises in the Holy Land. Their greatest handicap, she explained, was in securing news-print paper, and she was greatly surprised to learn that the shortage is just as acute in America, although there is no Egypt close at hand here, where an editor can run and bring back enough for the next day's edition.

Cable News from Europe

The Budapest corespondent of the "Manchester Guardian" gives an account of new anti-Jewish atrocities and declares that the situation instead of improving is growing worse. The correspondent adds that Count Andressy is now openly accusing the government of being responsible for the "White Terror."

The editor of the Warsaw Jewish Daily "Haint" who was recently arrested by the Polish government for publishing disquieting reports from the front, has now been released.

Chancellor Fehrenbach, speaking of the new government's program, declared that the government would do all in its power to fight anti-Semitism. In political circles this is considered of the utmost signifiance since anti-Semitism has been made an important factor by all parties who are playing any part in Germany's political struggles.

Grabski, the new Polish Premier, has a long standing record of anti-Semitic activities. When a member of the Austrian Parliment, he often distinguished himself by his rabid anti-Jewish attacks. Despite the fact that the new Premier has but a slight majority to support him, he refuses to negotiate with the Jewish Deputies of the Polish Seim.

Cables from Budapest advise that the boycot is only agravating the situation of the local Jews. The "Awakening Hungarians" are making it their excuse for fresh pogroms and during the early part of the week two Jews were killed and scores were wounded. The Minister for War Soos, at the session of the Deputies on June 23d, demanded the immediate passage of the Anti-Semitic measures, which the "Awakening Hungarians" have planned. Many members feared that that was dangerous and the session broke up in great excitement and confusion.

Max Liebermann, one of Germany's greatest and most celebrated Jewish artists, has been elected president of the Berlin Art Academy. Liebermann is particularly noted as the originator of certain modern tendencies in German art and is known to Jews the world over for a number of famous pictures depicting Jewish life.

Strong rumors are current in Jerusalem indicating that local Arabs are organizing for fresh anti-Jewish demonstrations. These will probably not be manifested before the arrival of Sir Herbert Samuel, the British High Commissioner for Palestine. Samuel is due to arrive in Jerusalem on June 30. General Bols and staff being out of sympathy with the Jewish national movement have arranged to leave headquarters on June 29, thus adding to the difficulties of the new High Commissioner.

From Warsaw the report comes that the Jewish Deputy Hirshorn has revealed a secret document which the Polish government sent out to its various departments instructing them not to admit Jews into any military office, and that every excuse should be utilized for getting rid of such Jews as are already in the service. When Deputy Hirshorn charged the government with this fact in the Seim, the Minister of War replied that in so far as the Peace Treaty was concerned the government was in no way obliged to appoint men whom it could not trust.

We are informed that a number of the Warsaw gymnasiums refuse to admit Jewish students.

Information just received from Kovel states that on the previous Saturday, while the Jewish community was holding service, the synagogue was attacked by a number of uniformed men who interrupted the service, cut and tore a number of beards, beat up many members of the congregation and tore a number of Sopher Torahs. Ten Jews were severely injured.

Films have been introduced into the evidence of the investigation now being conducted into the recent Jerusalem disturbances. The films were taken during the Arab demonstrations and the actual disturbances, and clearly indicate that members of the Arab police participated in the riots. As a result of these films a number of fresh arrests are expected.

The New Land

Elma Ehrlich Levinger, the gifted wife of Rabbi Lee J. Levinger, of New York City, has written a new book of short stories bearing the above title. This collection, which is written for the Jewish youth of America, depicts striking incidents and adventures in American history in which Jews have had a part.

They are written in Mrs. Levinger's simple and charming style and vividly reproduce aspects of Jewish patriotism. Following are the titles of the stories:

In the Night Watches. The three who came with Columbus.

When Katrina Lost Her Way. A tale of the first Jewish settlers of New Amsterdam.

A Place of Refuge. How the wanderer came to Rhode Island.

"Down with King George". How Isaac Franks of the American Army first heard the Declaration of Independence.

The Last Service. The story of a Rabbi who lived in New York when it was captured by the British in 1776.

The Generous Giver. The story of a Jewish money-lender of the Revolution.

Across the Waters. A story of the City of Refuge planned by Mordecai Noah.

Three at Grace. The story of the first Jewish settler in Alabama.

The Lucky Stone. The adventures of Uriah P. Levy, the first naval officer of his day.

The Princess of Philadelphia. The story of Rebecca Gratz and Washington Irving.

A Present for Mr. Lincoln. How President Lincoln set out for Washington and how he returned.

The Land Columbus Found. The story of the tablet placed upon the Statue of Liberty in New York Harbor.

The book is published by the Bloch Publishing Company.

we recommend that owing to the disturbed status of Turkey in Europe, that the whole matter of assistance to these schools in Constantinople, be left in the hands of the incoming Executive Committee to deal with according to their best judgment.

6. Religious liberty and the right of individual opinion in creed and practice being secured to every American citizen by the Constitution of the United States and by that of the States of the Union, and being of the opinion that Bible reading, in whole or in part, in the public schools of the country, is an encroachment on such constitutional right:

Be it resolved, That the I. O. B. B. declares itself as opposed to such practice as being unjust and un-American and hereby tenders its support in opposing any effort to introduce or maintain such Bible reading in the public schools of this beloved country of ours.

7. The following resolution emanating from District No. 4 has been referred to your Committee:

"Resolved, That the Constitution Lodge, I. O. B. B., appoint a special committee consisting of........members to be known as the Committee on Dissemination of Jewish Classics, to cooperate with the Jewish Publication Society of America in such a way as to facilitate its present work in the publication of the Jewish Classics Series projected by it and, if necessary, to so enlarge its plans as to give it a wider popularity and usefulness and a greater circulation by the publication of popular priced exclusively English edition".

"Resolved further, That said Committee shall report its recommendations to the Executive Committee of this body which shall have full power and authority to approve or modify and provide for the carrying out of said recommendations so approved or modified or to disapprove the same".

Your Committee highly commends the work of the Jewish Publication Society in general and the projected issuance of the Hebrew Classics in pocket form in particular, and your Committee feels that the Executive Committee should, in its own judgment, devise such action as may be consistent, proper and judicious.

8. The matter of financial assistance to the projected Jewish academy in Roumania has also been referred to this Committee. Your Committee has no recommendation to make upon this matter.

Within a few days during June more than three thousand Galician Jews were deported by the Hungarian authorities. Continual fresh arrests are being made.

Two thousand Jewish ex-officers of the Austrian army have decided to give their services to the Jewish people of Palestine and will proceed there with the object of enrolling in whatever form of state defense the new administration may organize.

The Budapest correspondent of the "Manchester Guardian" telepraghs that the Hungarian Parliament met in closed session to discuss ways and means of putting a stop to the terror at present prevailing in the country. Discussions were very heated. A number of speakers accusing the government of negligence placed the burden of responsibility upon its members. The Minister of War promised to remove those military detachments which are known to be responsible for the terror. The correspondent, however, adds that no particular faith need be placed in the Minister's promise.

B'nai B'rith Activities in Germany

By Our Special Correspondent,
DR. ALFRED GOLDSCHMIDT

As has been announced in one of our previous reports, there has been inaugurated on a large scale throughout Germany an inter-denominational movement designed to check so far as lies within our means the shocking misery of the children of Vienna. The Jewish community and especially our beloved Order has been taking an active part in this work of benevolence. It should not be inferred from such a movement on our part, however, that economic conditions in Germany itself are entirely satisfactory. On the contrary, the misery here is indeed great. The middle class especially, which can adjust itself but slowly to prevailing economic conditions, is now in a grave situation.

But the distress in Austria is even more serious than ours and has prompted us to aid from our scanty means those who suffer more than we ourselves. Conceived at first on a large scale, the movement, by force of circumstances and difficulties at home, has had to be reduced to modest measures.

Only a small part of the Austrian children will find asylum in Western Germany; in fact, so far as we are concerned, the problem of finding shelter for the children in order to improve them physically, has perforce been reduced to one of mere financial aid. The Grand Lodge of Germany, acting in conjunction with the Hilfsverein der Deutschen Juden, has sent 100,000 marks for the benefit of the Vienna children and 35,000 marks for aiding the middle classes. The funds so appropriated are to be expended in placing and supporting the children in a home to be known as "The Charity of German Jews".

Another problem which has reached large proportions recently and is causing great concern to the Jewish public is that of taking care of refugees. Owing to the distressing conditions in the ceded Polish provinces and to the economic misery in Galicia and Roumania, thousands of Eastern Jews are seeking refuge in Germany. The scarcity of suitable lodgings and the want of sufficient food throughout Germany has placed us in a grave predicament and is creating a most unhealthy situation. The Anti-Semitic wave to which we are exposed directs its telling blows mainly at these unfortunates and through them at all native Jews.

The impending election of the Reichstag has made this serious situation even more acute. Unfortunately, some of these refugees have been forced by the alternative of starvation to engage in questionable practices. The situation of the others and even of the native Jews on that account becomes even more critical. Prompt action is required if dire calamity is to be prevented.

Our labor bureau was enlarged and reorganized and is now operating under the name of the "Labor Bureau of the Jewish Organizations of Germany". All the large organizations are co-operating in the effort to procure employment for these unfortunates and to mitigate their hardships. At the same time, the Bureau is striving to weed out such obnoxious elements as may exist and which continue a menace to the others. What we can do in this manner is, after all, a palliative and not a cure. Permanent relief can only be secured when the Entente powers will have exercised their influence upon Poland and Roumania to enact more humane laws and to apply them more equitably toward their Jewish inhabitants.

It would be a very meritorious achievement of the American brethren if they could exert their influence in such a manner that conditions in the above-named countries are improved, thus preventing further emigration and making it possible for the refugees to return to and re-establish themselves in their native land. But it would be a still greater help if America would open its portals to the homeless ones. It must be admitted that the German Government in spite of the shortage of food and supplies and in spite of the strong Anti-Semitic sentiment which is expressing itself daily is maintaining a humane attitude. The Labor Bureau has the full co-operation of the Government in its work.

Another matter which is agitating the Jewish public is the problem of the so-called "United Organizations of German Jews". The new state constitution makes it possible for the Jewish communities to consolidate their interests and to obtain a recognized representation in the entity of the state. Formerly, the Jewish Community was merely tolerated. Now it is placed in a position whereby amalgamating its forces and interests, it can receive recognized representation. To accomplish this end, a combination of the various groups must be effected and diverging viewpoints must be reconciled.

After many deliberations, a tentative constitution has been adopted which aims to be just to the interests of all factions. At the various conferences, the Orthodox and Zionist factions voiced their especial claims. It is to be hoped that success will crown the united organizations so that the differences between various forces in German Jewry will be finally adjusted and united representation realized.

The Jewish Chaplain

Since the fifteenth of last October, Chicago has had a Jewish Chaplain. The Chaplaincy was established and is being maintained by the Chicago Federation of Synagogues.

The work of the Chaplain consists in visiting and ministering as Rabbi in public institutions where there is a Jewish population, but where no other provision exists for Jewish religious ministration and instruction. Jewish social welfare work has, for many years, been conducted in hospitals and in penal institutions in and near Chicago. The Bureau of Personal Service has been notably active in many of them, chiefly in the prisons. The Jewish Consumptive Relief Society has done excellently in the public sanitaria for the tubercular. In the County Infirmary at Oak Forest—aptly called by a prominent Jewish friend of the Jewish inmates a "house of many troubles"—welfare work on an admirable scale is being carried on by the Aid Society for Incurable Orthodox Jews. The Society is about to dedicate, on the Infirmary grounds, a welfare building erected at a cost of over $30,000—the building to house a synagogue, a Jewish library, a rest room, Jewish caretakers' appartments and arrangements for supplying with strictly kosher food and eating facilities the hundred or more Jewish wards of the county residing at the place. At the penitentiary in Joliet, the Jewish inmates are favored from time to time by the attentions of their co-religionists residing in that city itself.

Jewish religious service and instruction at the several public institutions, however, has largely been the volunteer work of various Chicago Rabbis and lay persons. The scope of Jewish institutional work has become so large, however, that the Rabbis who have attempted institutional visiting in addition to their regular duties have come to wish for the service of one man who could give his entire time to this line of endeavor. The desire arose among the Rabbis to make institutional visiting regular and systematic by obtaining one of their number in Chicago, as there are several in New York who could "specialize" in this field. The Chicago Federation of Synagogues and other Jewish organizations such as Jewish Women's Clubs and B'nai B'rith lodges seconded the proposals. Funds were raised and a Chaplain elected. The Bureau of Personal Service, the Jewish Consumptives Relief Society, the Aid Society for Incurable Orthodox and other organizations duly welcomed the new religious work upon his assumption of duties and accorded valuable support, encouragement and assistance.

There are 23 institutions at present on the Chaplain's visiting list. The Chaplain visits eight of them once a week and thirteen of them once a fortnight. One institution, the Chicago Home for Girls, having a Jewish population of only two, is visited once a month, while the Girls' Parental School has, for the last two months, been fortunately devoid of any Jewish population to visit.

While the Chaplain is said to "conduct service" at these places, the nature of the work is much more intricate. At six of the institutions visited, the Chaplain ministers to bed-ridden persons. He seeks to do for the sick and the dying that which any Rabbi would do for the sick and the dying. Companionship and comfort, cheer and hope are offered. When circumstances permit, there is conversation about the eternal things and sometimes there is even prayer, in spite of the Jewish hesitation to pray informally.

Not rarely does the Chaplain have to act as the protagonist of Judaism against the aggression of proselytizing missionaries who, with their written and spoken propaganda, hover about the Jewish sick and delinquent in some of the public institutions. The missionary sometimes professes to be himself a Jew, re-iterating with much emphasis and explicitness that he always has been and always will be a Jew, only a Jew who has found salvation in "Jesus Christ". The missionary frequently talks Yiddish, quotes Hebrew and alludes to Orthodox Jewish Customs. One of the most disagreeable phases of the Jewish Chaplain's work is that of having occasionally to combat the suspicion that he is himself a missionary wearing the Jewish disguise. The Chaplain has met missionaries who flatly deny that they have any intent to proselytize. "Winning a soul to Christ" is not proselytizing; it is only serving the cause of truth.

The Union of American Hebrew Congregations through its Department of Synagogue and School Extension liberally supplies the Chaplain with its educational publications. Excepting the Union Bulletin, however, all of this printed matter is suited only to Juveniles. Aside from Jewish periodicals furnished him both by publishers and by readers, the Chaplain has, at his disposal, very little printed matter intended for adults. The only Yiddish books at his disposal are Yiddish secular volumes loaned by the Chicago Public Library. When it comes to printed matter, the proselytizing missionary has the advantage. Were funds available, the Chaplain would himself issue publications to supplement those at present obtainable for use in his work. In penal institutions and in sanitaria, where there are Jewish persons who are not bed-ridden, the Chaplain conducts a Jewish assembly. The conventions of the Synagogue, whether Orthodox or Reform, are adapted only in a small measure, if at all adapted, to the needs and atmosphere of most of these places. Prayer, to be impressive among those little accustomed to prayer, must be brief and usually spontaneous. A sermon is less effective than a heart-to-heart talk, preferably a conversation. A Chaplain often serves best not by talking to people but by listening to them. In work with children and youth, the Chaplain has at hand the imperishable beauties and inspirations of the Bible stories. Even adults will sometimes enjoy the charm of a Biblical incident. On and near Purim recently, the Chaplain had not an audience young or old that failed to laugh heartily at the discomfiture of Haman. At the Oak Forest Infirmary, where the Jewish inmates have their own Orthodox service, the Chaplain simply attends the service and then, after a few social amenities, briefly translates and expounds a few sentences from the old Hebrew Prayer Book, always inviting and usually receiving assistance of considerable mutual benefit from some of the old men who are versed in the lore.

But the Chaplain's work is not restricted to public institutions. The sick and the imprisoned frequently request him to communicate with relatives and friends in their behalf. A great deal of letter writing and telephoning thus devolves upon the Chaplain and his wife. In numerous instances, the Chaplain finds it advisable to call personally on relatives and friends. Between Jan. 8 and May 2, fifty-seven of such visits were paid.

The view point by which the Chaplain is guided is that the essential thing about Judaism lies not in the rituals, ceremonials and customs which most Jews cannot keep or will not keep, but in those ethical and spiritual inspirations of Judaism which can be potent at all times and under all circumstances. For the hospital or prison inmate who deplores that Passover must come and go without the sacredly enjoined Passover food, the Chaplain has the message that Passover, like everything else in Judaism is ultimately not a thing of the stomach but a thing of the heart, not a performance of the body but an aspiration of the soul. For the Jew who has discarded Judaism and decries it as something effete, meaningless and stupid the Chaplain has the plea that the effete, meaningless and stupid represent accretions that are not Judaism but rather a hinderance to Judaism. Brotherhood and hope, humanity and forbearance and self-surrender to the Divine Will, are the chief burden of the Chaplain's urgings.

The present incumbent of the Chaplaincy is Rabbi Abraham Cronbach.

The police at Lublin are reported as having placed thirteen Jews under arrest charging them with implication in a ritual murder. A later dispatch says that some of the arrested have been released on bail.

A new publication has made its appearance and is understood to be Paderewski's official organ. The first number is bitterly anti-Semitic. One of its items relates that the Jews of Berditchev shot at the Polish soldiery when the latter made their appearance in town.

The authorities of Subalki and Kunto in Poland forbade the opening of the Jewish schools on Sundays. At the intervention of Jewish members of the Seim, the Minister of Education promised to annul this restriction.

What Our Lodges Are Doing

Boston, Mass.

A social acquaintance meeting was held by Amos Lodge No. 121 on June 28th.

The activities committee made up of all of the chairmen of all standing committee of the lodge meet weekly at the Boston City Club. All members are invited to attend and respond quite generously. According to a report just received, great good has resulted from this plan. The committee acts as a clearing house for lodge matters, increases enthusiasm, and cements the bonds that bind us together.

A goodly number of the members are doing splendid Big Brotherhood work in co-operation with the Federation of Jewish Charities, full credit being given to the B'nai B'rith as an organization. It is reported by the Federation that the B'nai B'rith work excels all other organizations, both in numbers and results.

The social service committee of the lodge is in close touch with the Lyman School and Shirley School for Boys, as well as the Juvenile Court, from whom they receive notice of delinquents and to which they make ready response and have accomplished very gratifying results. The lodge expects to put into operation a system whereby those members of the lodge employers of labor, either in factories or commercial organizations, will be willing and ready to give employment to such as are found worthy.

About a year ago the lodge increased its dues, in consequence of which it has been able to make arrangements with the Beth Israel Hospital for a B'nai B'rith Bed at a cost of $1,000. The lodge also makes annual contributions to the Home for Convalescent Women, Home for Aged Men and Women, Baby Milk Fund, Federation of Jewish Charities and numerous contributions during the year to various other organizations, local and national.

On May 26th, Amos Lodge dedicated its new meeting rooms with specially designed new equipment. The four pedestals are most artistically designed, bearing on the front panel the Menorah raised and in gold, each branch a perfect reproduction of a flaming light. Bro. Rabbi Harry Levi delivered an address to the candidates and Bro. Col. Nathan Horowitz, commander at Fort Strong, also spoke.

Amos Lodge now has a membership of over 400 and expects to increase this total to 500 by July 1st.

Nineteen members of Amos Lodge visited Brockton Lodge on May 20th and initiated a large class of candidates.

El Paso, Texas

El Paso Lodge gave its annual picnic for the Jewish children of El Paso on May 30th. Baseball games and races of all descriptions for men, women and children were some of the features of the day. The kiddies all had a wonderful time and shouted for another picnic to be held in the near future.

Wynne, Ark.

A new lodge was instituted at Wynne on June 21st, with a charter membership of thirty-four. The new lodge includes members from Augusta, Earl, Parkin, and McCrory.

Bro. Louis Cohen, of Ft. Smith, member of the General Committee of District No. 7, assisted by the members of Barnett Lodge, conducted the installation ceremonies. Practically the entire membership of Barnet Lodge attended the ceremony.

The new lodge is already active and has planned a picnic for its members to be held early in July.

Seattle, Wash.

Ranier Lodge No. 627 and Hildesheimer Lodge No. 503 of Seattle held a joint meeting with the Daughters of the Covenant on June 1st. The meeting was addressed by Bro. L. L. Mendelsohn, of Fresno, Cal., President of District Grand Lodge No. 4, and Barnet E. Marks, of Phoenix, Ariz. The meeting was one of the largest ever held by the Order in Seattle.

Mr. Mendelsohn reviewed the activities of the Order in Europe, such as the establishment of labor bureaus, schools, asylums and homes for children for Jewish people in Germany. He said more than 500,000 meals a year were being distributed to the Jews in Poland, that 12,000 persons were being cared for in Jaffa and that in Galicia twenty-nine refugee camps had been established, as well as orphanages and hospitals for the civil population, many of whom had broken down from wartime sufferings.

The speaker said there were more than 10,000 Jewish orphans in Switzerland under the care of the Order. Conditions in Rumania have been greatly improved. He said equal opportunity for all was the religious belief of all the B'nai B'rith lodges in Europe and that this belief explained the good will displayed toward them by President Wilson and his cabinet.

Mr. Marks said the biggest work of the lodges was to keep alive the spark of Jewish life in the small communities. He said the resolution recently adopted at the convention in Cleveland, which abolished all secrecy as to its obligations, was first practiced in this district.

An impressive initiation ceremony was conducted, thirty members being initiated as a class on honor of the distinguished visitors.

Calgary, Alta.

The secretary of Calgary Lodge sends us the following letter with reference to the recent visit to that lodge by Bro. Dr. Harry A. Kraus, President of District Grand Lodge No. 6, and Bro. Henry Monsky, of Omaha.

"These two officers were slated to pay us an official visit and only expected to stay one day. Well, they stayed three days, each day being filled with accomplishments for the good of our beloved Order.

The first day they initiated five candidates into our Order, after which they addressed an open meeting of our Jewish community. Before the meeting was half an hour old, they had won the hearts of every one that was fortunate enough to hear them. People who came to scoff remained to listen and learn the message that these two brothers brought. After the meeting, moving pictures of the various institutions, supported by the B'nai B'rith, were shown so that everyone might see what our Order was doing for the good of Judaism.

The rest of the time was taken up in showing our worthy officers our town and having them meet our members and getting acquainted with various problems that confront us. The help they have given the officers and members of our lodge in solving these problems is immeasurable.

Calgary Lodge No. 816 is a much better lodge today on account of the visit of these two officers. Any time the District Grand Lodge can send us any more men of their caliber, we can assure you they will be more than welcome".

Abraham Kolinsky, former president of Cleveland Lodge No. 16, desires to notify his brethren in the Order that he has had his name legally changed to Abraham Kollin.

Huntington, W. Va.

An unusually large audience attended the June 6th meeting of the Huntington Lodge. A committee was appointed to solicit funds for the B'nai B'rith Orphanage at Erie, Pa., and a campaign commenced to collect funds to provide education for the poor Jewish children of Switzerland.

Oil City, Pa.

A new lodge was instituted at Oil City on June 6th, fifty charter members being initiated, including a few residents from Franklin and Titusville. It is expected that the lodge will in the very near future have a membership of at least seventy-five.

The work of institution, initiation and installation of officers was conducted by Grand Lodge officers of District No. 3, headed by Past President Bro. Marcus Feuchtwanger. The Jewish residents of Titusville who had planned originally to affiliate with the Oil City Lodge have become so enthused that an effort is now being made to form a separate lodge there.

A Community Meeting House

serve as the place where this thought may be studied, expressed, discussed. Let there be no teacher or set of teachers unless the whole community has a voice in electing them. Nor must these teachers have any proprietary right in the rostrum which they occupy. It must be everybody's. Every man and woman that has something to say, let them say it from there. If the socialist Jew wishes to expound his doctrines, let him be free to do so. If the believer wishes to be heard, let him be given a hearing. There must be no attempt at indoctrination. A debate may be preferable to a one-sided discourse. Let the meeting-house serve as the community's clearing-house, where Jewish thought may be clarified. Let a man talk in any language he knows best, provided the others who listen will understand him. Let the house be the rallying point of the Jewry of a community in times when, through woe or joy, a Jew feels himself attached to his brother Jews more than at other times, when an emergency arises when corporate expression becomes a necessity of the heart, not morally for the purpose of demonstration which now are so inadequately served by processions or mass-meetings. Whomsoever and wheresoever Jews are assembled to give utterances to the deepest stirrings of the Jewish mind, there is worship of the God of Israel. It is a larger view of what the times call for that is here attempted. Would that the counsel were heeded and out of this suggestion, humbly submitted to the thoughtful, to rabbis and laymen, to believers and unbelievers, to old-fashioned and modernists, there come in this large Jewish center or another, the communal meeting-house—the visible expression of the oneness of Jewish thought and Jewish hope amidst all the variety of formulas in which they clothe themselves. But it must not be a gift to the people unless it is by the people themselves, rich and poor alike, though naturally each should tax himself according to his means. It must be a corporate institution vested in the whole Jewish community, represented through the mass of large and small contributors who thus designate themselves children of the community.

Samuel's Report Published

A White book just issued by the British government containing the report of Sir Stuart Samuel, head of the British Commission which investigated Jewish conditions in Poland places the entire guilt of the pogroms upon the Polish government. Samuel's report shows that three hundred and forty-eight were proven to have been killed in pogroms while a far larger number were wounded. The report proves that in most cases the military organized the pogroms, with or without the knowledge of the government, which took no steps to stop excesses or to prevent repetitions by punishing offenders. In the case of the Pinsk pogrom, the government admitted knowing that it was organized by senior officers, but all it did was to remove them from their posts. The report also confirms that Polish Jews are constantly subjected to all manner of persecution, such as beard-cutting, flogging and being thrown out of fast running trains. The report brings shocking details of the brutality displayed by the soldiers in punishing the Jewish population and brings evidence of numerous cases where Jewish women were stripped naked and flogged mercilessly. Generally the report traces the excesses to the Polish Field Gendarmeria and particularly to the forces of General Haller, who were directly responsible for a number of pogroms in Poland and Lithuania. No compensation was paid out even in cases where claims were established to the satisfaction of the authorities. On the whole, the damage was very considerable.

Captain Wright, another member of Samuel's Commission, says in his report that the Polish masses still believe that Jews require the blood of Christian children for ritual purposes. Wright admits that the Polish Jews are somewhat Germanized, but emphasizes that they are not at all pro-German. Wright sees difficulties in the way of granting the demands of Polish Jewry with regard to national rights, as that would mean setting up another state in Poland. It is his opinion that when peace has been concluded with Russia Jewish masses of Poland will emigrate to that country in large numbers.

A report on the situation of Polish Jewry has also been submitted to the government by Sir Horace Rumbold, the British representative at Warsaw. Rumbold admits most of the charges brought.

What Our Lodges Are Doing

San Jose, Cal.

Preliminary plans for the formation of an organization to be known as San Jose Lodge, I. O. B. B., were considered on Saturday evening, May 22nd., in that city at the Masonic Temple, and successfully launched, at which time forty-five Jewish residents of that city signified their intentions by signing the register. Over forty members of Oakland Lodge and their ladies were in attendance to stand sponsor for the newest lodge in the state of California.

Mr. Lionel Wachs, president of Oakland Lodge, and Sydney J. Silverstein, vice-president, accompanied the delegation. Mr. Matt Wahrhaftig was the principal speaker of the evening and the topic was, ''Accomplishments of B'nai B'rith in both America and Europe''.

A dinner-dance was enjoyed by all and the ample entertainment furnished the evening's enjoyment. San Jose gives promise of developing an excellent lodge as soon as its charter is procured, at which time Oakland Lodge's initiatory team will act as the installing officers for the occasion, which will happen some time in July.

Oakland, Cal.

There was much ''snap'' and ''pep'' shown at the indoor picnic given by Oakland Lodge No. 252, I. O. B. B., on May 18th at the new Shrine club rooms, where over five hundred people from Oakland and the neighboring cities enjoyed the hospitality of that fraternity.

The hall was turned into an ''alfresco scene,'' which gave a very rustic atmosphere.

The guests were served with baskets containing a dainty luncheon, which was relished by the members and their friends.

Throughout the evening there was not a dull moment and the members of the arrangement committee, headed by Leo Marymont and Harry Chelemsky, used their assistance and were most chivalrous in receiving the guests.

The affair was a most gratifying success to the committee that had the picnic in charge. Dancing was a feature of the evening's program.

Fargo, N. Dak.

A meeting of John Hay Lodge No. 634 was held on June 13, 1920. On account of the hot weather, the number of members present was small and consequently the meeting was short.

It was decided that the lodge should give several open air picnics during the summer. President Max Goldberg instructed the entertainment committee to take charge of the arrangements for the picnics.

At the regular meeting of John Hay Lodge No. 634, held May 16th, the intellectual advancement committee gave a literary program and smoker.

Mr. Harry Stern addressed the members on ''War and Anti-Semitism'', and Mr. Tobias Naftalin on ''In What Way Does Judaism Pertain to Bolshevism''? Both addresses were well received by the audience.

Denver, Colo.

Denver Lodge No. 171 held a flag day celebration on June 13th, at which reports from the delegates to the Constitution Grand Lodge convention were made by Bro. S. R. Zwetow. Bro. Max S. Scheyer made his report as delegate of the lodge to the District Grand Lodge convention held at Dayton, Ohio.

Detroit, Mich.

Another record class initiation was staged by Pisgah Lodge No. 34 at the Elks' Temple on June 7th. Several hundred members were sworn in at the ''stag'' initiation.

Pisgah Lodge now stands as the second largest B'nai B'rith Lodge in the world, with a paid membership of 1,585. Ramah Lodge, with a paid membership of 1,861, still holds its position as the largest lodge in the organization, but recent progress made by the Detroit brethren, if continued, should soon place her in first rank unless the Chicago lodge gets busy.

Bro. Nathan E. Rosenberg, to whose excellent management the success of the previous monster initiation was due, headed the entertainment committee. During the banquet which followed, an initiation conductor's baton was presented to Bro. I. Leonard Braun, organizer and conductor of the Pisgah Lodge Glee Club in appreciation of his zeal and untiring efforts, on behalf of the Glee Club, which has come to be recognized as one of the most popular musical organizations in the city.

Mr. Braun plans to devote a considerable part of each summer in establishing similar glee clubs in other cities.

Jointly with Toledo Lodge, Pisgah Lodge will give its second annual excursion at Sugar Island on June 28th. One of the large steamers of the White Star Line has been chartered and an elaborate program has been outlined. Dancing, ball games and other field games are a few of the promised features.

Chicago, Ill.

Ramah Lodge No. 33 held its last meeting of the season on June 14th at the Covenant Club. A large audience listened with great interest to the address delivered by Col. Abel Davis. Col. Davis, who commanded one of the Illinois Infantry regiments in France, and who was decorated by General Pershing with a distinguished service cross, chose as his subject, ''The Rights and Duties of American Citizenship''. The balance of the program consisted of vocal selections by Miss Francis Paperte, mezzo-soprano, of the Chicago Grand Opera Company, and violin selections by Miss Beulah Ladon.

Election of officers was held and a large class of candidates initiated, after which an informal reception was given to Col. Davis and the new members. Refreshments were served.

New Haven, Conn.

Horeb Lodge at its last meeting had a remarkable seven-hour session that started at 8 p. m. last night and finished at 3 o'clock this morning. Horeb Lodge heard one of the most able addresses of the year when Attorney Jacob B. Klein, of Bridgeport, addressed an audience that packed the hall to the doors at midnight, in a speech that aroused to enthusiasm all the members to such an extent that the entire body rose to their feet and cheered the speaker continuously for fully five minutes.

Attorney Klein urged the members to co-operate in every activity of Horeb Lodge and called their attention to the remarkable progress of the B'nai B'rith in world affairs.

Horeb Lodge had a distinguished guest at its May 23rd meeting in Honorable Abraham I. Elkus, of New York, Judge of the New York Court of Appeals and president of the Free Synagogue. Judge Elkus told several interesting incidents of his career as Ambassador to Turkey and paid splendid tribute to American endeavor in the near East.

Brooklyn, N. Y.

Brooklyn Lodge celebrated its sixth anniversary on June 17th. The principal speaker of the evening was Hon. Abraham I. Elkus, former United States Ambassador to Turkey and Judge of the Court of Appeals of New York.

Brooklyn Lodge points with just pride to the results of its social service work which has received much favorable comment throughout the District. Embraced in this range of activities are the direction of the Jewish Big Brother movement in the Brooklyn Club, leadership in the Hebrew educational school, work at the Hebrew Orphan Asylum and work among the blind.

The lodge at the present time is gathering a fund to maintain a B'nai B'rith Children's Court in Brooklyn.

Toronto, Canada

The officers of Toronto Lodge are proud of the results achieved by the lodge in establishing a true Jewish community spirit in that city. Until the B'nai B'rith came to Toronto, the Jewish community was not organized.

The following editorial reprinted from a local newspaper is interesting in this connection:

Answer the Appeal

''Toronto Hebrews should be encouraged and assisted to finance a $400,000 share of a movement to feed the hungry among their co-religionists in Europe.

Von Humboldt, the great traveler, was credited with saying:

'I have found one sound the same in all languages and in all countries—the laughter of children at evening time.'

Toronto Hebrews lead in the preparation of a response, not to the universality of happiness, but to the universality of hunger, not to the appeal of children's laughter, but to the appeal of their mothers' sorrow. The privilege of contributing to that response should not be restricted to local members of the household of Israel.

An authority respected by Hebrew and Christian alike speaks in words that might be accepted as a lamp to Toronto's path and a guide to Toronto's feet is this city's dealing with the appeal of the present campaign:

'He that shutteth his ear to the cry of the poor and needy shall cry himself and not be heard' ''.

Forrest City, Ark.

Barnett Lodge No. 754 recently held a special meeting in the Elk's Hall in Brinkley, Ark., and succeeded thereby in initiating eleven new members; members from adjoining towns attended the meeting and Bro. Dan Daniels, of Little Rock, assisted in the initiation of candidates. It was in every respect an inspirational I. O. B. B. meeting and all enjoyed the interesting remarks delivered by the newly initiated Brinkley members.

Barnett Lodge is looked upon as one of the most active lodges in District No. 7. Forrest City has a Jewish population of ten families, yet, by active propaganda, with L. Barnett, secretary, as chairman, the committee has built up a membership of seventy located in Wayne, Marianna, Forrest City, Parkin, Earl, Harrisburg, Augusta, Newport, Wittsburg, Cotton Plant, McCrory, Brinkley, Piggott, Louisville, Ky., Baltimore, Md. and New York, N. Y.

The lodge is now arranging the seventh annual picnic celebration, which is one of the interesting events of the year and is always well attended by the members, their families and friends from adjoining towns within a radius of one hundred miles.

Bridgeport, Conn.

The regular meeting of Harmony Lodge No. 711 was held on June 8th. Bro. Charles H. Shapiro, who represented the lodge as a deligate to the convention of the Constitution Grand Lodge, at Cleveland, read his report.

An interesting program was held.

Knoxville, Tenn.

Knoxville Lodge No. 791 is actively engaged in carrying on the good work of the Order. The new president of the lodge, Bro. I. B. Finkelstein, who is only twenty-four years old, is perhaps one of the youngest presidents in the Order.

District Grand Lodge No. 6

An official visit was made during the past month to the Canadian lodges of District Grand Lodge No. 6 by Bro. Dr. Harry A. Kraus, President of the District, and Bro. Henry Monsky, Second Vice-President of the District.

The following extracts from the official account of the visit will, no doubt, be interesting to our readers:

''We found on the whole a thorough Jewish spirit in these communities, and in some of them active B'nai B'rith lodges, while in others, because of differences in opinion on Jewish questions, because of so-called class distinctions, and, in some cases, even personal enmities and quarrels, the B'nai B'rith lodge was not progressing as it should. We endeavored in every instance to reconcile such differences and to outline a program for future activities of the lodge, which we believe will result in building up such lodges and must necessarily inure to the benefit of the Order.

The big question which B'nai B'rith leaders have had to face in all Canadian communities is that of its attitude regarding the Zionist program. Due to misapprehension and some wrongful agitation, a feeling has grown up among the Zionists that the B'nai B'rith was opposed to the program. We endeavored to make clear the necessity for the B'nai B'rith remaining officially true to its principles of uniting Israelites and to show that the B'nai B'rith program is not inconsistent with, but, on the contrary, in its preservation of the Jewish name, in its ministration to the wants of our people and in the solution of immediate and increasing Jewish problems, it is an essential ally to the cause. Many in the Canadian communities heretofore disinterested in the work of the Order have expressed their desire to come into its ranks. Request was made by several of the lodges for speakers at more frequent intervals and they expressed themselves in accord with the plan suggested by Rabbi Meyerberg, chairman of the Intellectual Advancement Committee, the lodges being willing to share or assume the expense incident to the arrangement of a series of lectures.

We found for the most part well organized Jewish communities, in some of which the B'nai B'rith lodge has been the leading and most potent factor in all things.

This communal leadership by the B'nai B'rith lodge, doing its full duty, pursuant to the program of the Grand Lodge, should not only be permitted, but encouraged to take active and earnest interest in all Jewish questions and problems which confront the local community in which such lodge exists''.

Visits were made to the lodges in the following cities: Winnipeg, Regina, Saskatoon, Edmonton and Calgary.

An Editorial

By the Editor in Chief

TO CHICAGO, while a political convention was in progress, came recently, e satellites of a certain mid-western anufacturer, and fitted up elaborate mpaign headquarters in a hotel. It as their purpose to procure for their incipal a presidential nomination.

As political parties go, the organization hich had the nomination to bestow was ot of great importance. But the manucturer had he secured the nomination ould have acquired a prestige he could ot otherwise have obtained.

For a day or two, the cause of the manucturer's retainers prospered. Their suite as crowded with visitors; they sang their ndidate's virtues to attentive ears. n the corridor outside, many delegates old each other that he was the logical an.

Yet the manufacturer was not nomiated. In the night, his supporters vaated their costly suite and started home; or the manufacturer had transgressed a ardinal principle of good citizenship. n the balance of probity, dignity, and isdom, he was weighed and found wanting. And in the resultant defeat of his mbition there are two lessons—one for hose who ignore the rights of others; ne for those whose rights are ruthlessly ut aside.

Specific statutes provide when, where nd in what circumstances a citizen may ast his ballot. Specific laws punish, too, he illicit acquisition of property. Antirust and other legislation exists to dissolve onfederations against public policy; while , breach of the peace in a public assemlage is an open offense, with which the olice are empowered to deal.

Immoderate public speech, in times of eace, is surrounded by no restrictions uite as definite as the foregoing. If the spionage act be left out of consideration, ne may say in public what one pleases o long as one does not incite to riot or ecome obscene. But immoderate speech as an inherent safeguard; the effect of it s largely localized. It requires a great mount of oratory to do a great amount f harm.

Not so circumscribed, however, is the nfluence of a man who depends on a rinting press, rather than the power of is voice, to circulate his views. Through he postal service, he may address the our corners of the globe. He can inrude where his presence is not desired; arry long after he had begun to offend. None can controvert him—at least not t once; and meanwhile he will have had an pportunity to say many other things which, perhaps, require disputation.

Nor is he required to reveal himself in erson—to meet his audience face to face hat they may judge of his sincerity by inspection. He may assume a cloak he does not possess, or conceal his identity altogether, if he wills. And, while he keeps within the libel laws, which in the United States serve principally to protect the repute of individuals and business concerns, he may scatter his opinions wherever fancy directs.

Therefore, it seems to us that the press and its custodians are especially imposed with an obligation to be just, to be circumspect, and to tell the truth.

The middle-western manufacturer owns a weekly publication. The manufacturer is very rich, so rich that he does not print his weekly for profit. In one sense, it is a toy, created because he likes to express his views, and to have other people read them, regardless of whom he borrowed them or how silly they may be.

It is plain that many of the readers of his paper are not concerned with the quality or character of the manufacturer's learning for he has publicly professed indifference to history and the lessons it has to teach. Some, perchance, pay homage to the power of his wealth. It does not matter greatly. The point is that his weekly circulates and is read.

Recently, he was convinced by his advisors that Jews were engaged in an attempt to achieve world dominion, and he launched forthwith in his publication an attack upon all members of the Jewish faith.

The manufacturer's attacks upon the Jewish faith were brought to the attention of the delegates from whom he sought the nomination. "If the charge that these articles were printed is true," said one of his partisans, who professed to doubt the fact, "my distinguished friend cannot, of course, be nominated." The charge was true. And the nomination went elsewhere.

Happiness, of which there is little enough in the world, has its foundation in peace. To stir up bitterness and strife, without warrant, is to strike at the best there is in human intercourse.

The delegates, who passed upon the manufacturer's qualifications, realized the truth of those premises—realized that no man is fit to lead a great nation, who does not acclaim its unity as the cornerstone of its strength. So much of lesson may be taken to heart by all who seek to advance themselves upon the prostrated rights of their fellow citizens.

For those who have been wronged, the inference, though, is not that tolerance is a virtue, intolerance a vice; nor that the consequences of either relentlessly accrue to their practitioners. It is that neither can be invoked without leaving to itself a memorial of some kind in the minds of everyone involved.

A large brotherhood toasts its absent ones with the petition that their sins be written in the sands and their deeds of honor on imperishable rock. I wish it could be so; but life is not so mutable. We may repent, or forgive, but we can never undo. To repair represents the ultimate of legitimate ambition.

Let us hope that not all who read the manufacturer's slanders credit them. It is safe to assume that they do not. Yet it is equally certain that some, reading the articles week after week, are convinced. And the convictions are not to be uprooted with a gesture of apology, even if the manufacturer cared to make one at this late juncture.

Between the two extreme positions of belief and disbelief, there is, however, a great middle ground. It is peopled by average, kindly folk, who would rather believe good than evil, for that is what they have been taught to do.

It must be understood that their capacity for independent thought is limited; to concern them greatly a problem must be brought closely to their own lives. Even so, they think no more clearly as a rule. To progress, they take long and circuitous routes—the prey of demagogues and charlatans. When peacefully engaged, we call them anonymously "the people"; when their passions have been made to surmount their reason, we describe them as "the mob."

We are ready to credit an assertion that the manufacturer and his weekly are doing harm. He is fertilizing the minds of previously neutral persons with anti-Semitism. And what would a number of similar publishers and their weeklies be able to do? We are not alarmists, but the time to fight fire, it appears to us, is when it smoulders.

Other faiths have been afflicted with traducers. It will be profitable perhaps to scrutinize briefly the experience of one of them. Many years ago an oath was published in the United States, attributed to a large secret non-Jewish religious fraternity. It purported to pledge political adherence to the head of the church instead of the nation, and specified revolting cruelties which the taker offered to inflict upon the women and children of non-conformists.

The oath was, beyond peradventure, the product of an unsound mind, but the paper that printed it attained a paid-in-advance circulation of more than 1,000,000 copies a week; and today hatred of a Christian sect has been implanted in the breasts of an incomputable number of other Christians as a result.

The fraternity did not remain at ease, waiting for a favorable wind to blow the odium away. It spent much time and money to defeat the canard. Yet all that it was able to do was not enough. Facsimiles of the alleged "oath" exist today. Printed copies of it, when last they came to our attention, could be obtained for a few cents. Since then the printing of it may have stopped. We hope so. The existing edition was, nevertheless, sufficient to supply the apparent demand for some time to come.

The point is that if others have become alive to the danger of such slanders, why should not we? If one falsehood admittedly can do so much damage to another faith, what reason shall we advance to show that the many falsehoods uttered at our expense are innocuous? If others bestir themselves to combat their traducers, what excuse shall we present for remaining passive?

Seven years ago, the Anti-Defamation League returned an answer to all these questions when it set out to uphold the good name of the Jew. Financed privately by the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith, it remains the only agency which, by experience and familiarity with the problem, is in a position now to deal with it efficiently.

To detail fully the league's achievements—its crusades against vicious books, handbills and tracts, against defamation on the stage and on the screen; against discrimination in certain summer resort hotels; against objectionable advertising, to stop which laws have been passed, at the league's behest, in several states is unnecessary as they are known to our readers.

As increased demands have been made upon it, the league has extended its activities until they are many, complex and expensive. In consequence it is no longer possible for the Order to bear the burden alone, and it is faced with the alternative of restricting the league's functions, or appealing for liberal contributions from our coreligionists.

We believe that non-Jews, whose sense of fairness overruns the limits of creed will join in furthering the ends of the league, realizing that peace in a house is an equal boon to all who dwell therein.

The press is free in this land. We would be the last to advocate restrictions. Yet, it is obvious that safeguards must be placed around it. An enlightened public consciousness will serve such purpose. Let us by all means take up that weapon; let us defend our good name by telling the truth about ourselves, rather than remaining silent while we are assailed with lies. And let us act with the utmost vigor and the widest scope, in order that the task may soon be done, and reason for the league's existence vanish.

Joint Meeting of Representatives of Central Conference American Rabbis, Council of Jewish Women, Anti-Defamation League and Independent Order of B'nai B'rith

An all day meeting attended by representatives of the Central Conference of American Rabbis, the Council of Jewish Women, the Executive Committee of the B'nai B'rith and the Governing Board of the Anti-Defamation League was held in Chicago, Sunday, September 5, lasting until 11 p. m. The Central Conference of American Rabbis was represented by Drs. Leo M. Franklin, Felix A. Levy and Joseph Stolz. Mrs. M. L. Purvin represented the Council of Jewish Women. The following members of the Executive Committee of the B'nai B'rith and of the Governing Board of the Anti-Defamation League were in attendance: Adolf Kraus, Judge Samuel Rosenfeld, Professor Gotthard Deutsch, Rabbi Eugene Mannheimer, Sigmund Livingston, Judge Philip Stein, Julius H. Meyer, Dr. Gerson B. Levi, Dr. A. D. Weiner, A. B. Seelenfreund, Leon L. Lewis, Dr. Harry A. Kraus, Henry Monsky, Gustavus Loevinger, and Hiram D. Frankel.

A complete report showing the present status of Anti-Semitism in European countries and in the United States was presented by the Secretary of the league, together with a statement in detail of the various steps already taken to counteract the effect of the vicious anti-Jewish propaganda now being carried on in this country. A program designed to mitigate so far as possible the efforts of those who are endeavoring to stir up racial animosity was adopted and the various steps already taken by the Executive of the League were approved. The committee had before it for examination the Dearborn Independent articles, as well as articles from other magazines and newspapers of a similar nature, several anti-Semitic books recently published, one containing nearly five hundred pages, written by an eminent historian, in which the Jew is blamed for the failures of the Peace Conference, another being a new version of "The Protocols" designed for American consumption and containing one hundred and fifty pages of garbled quotations from Jewish authors intended to demonstrate the authenticity of the document, numerous magazines, articles and newspaper clippings. A complete set of the material emanating from the English anti-Semitic Bureau as published in The New Witness, National Review, The London Times, Morning Chronicle, The Spectator and other English publications, and as reprinted in the American and Canadian press, was presented to the committee for examination.

The following resolution was adopted:

Whereas, It has been ascertained that a publication known as "The Protocols" containing a vicious hoax, intended to arouse hatred and prejudice against the Jew in the United States, has been given wide distribution in this country as well as in European countries; and

Whereas, We have learned that copies of that publication have been sent to public libraries, newspaper offices, members of Congress, governors of states, mayors of cities and other public officials throughout the United States; and,

Whereas, Such literature may, if left unanswered, create a condition entirely unfair and unjust to three million patriotic, law-abiding, Jewish citizens of the United States, in spite of the obvious fictitiousness of the attack and the general reputation of American public officials for intelligence and fairness;

Therefore, Be it Resolved, That we, the duly appointed and authorized representatives of the Anti-Defamation League, Council of Jewish Women, Central Conference of American Rabbis, and the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith do hereby express our sorrow at the unprecedented movement now in progress, a movement so un-American that we are loath to believe that it emanates from American sources, or that it can weaken to any great extent the religions and racial tolerance of our fellow-Americans. Nevertheless, we believe that the efficient propaganda methods used by the enemies of Judaism in this country, who are apparently backed by large capital, may give an entirely false and erroneous impression of the true standing of the Jew in the United States, and that it is our duty to take all proper measures to answer in as efficient a manner as lies within our power, the slanderous charges now being circulated; and

Be it Further Resolved, That the anti-Defamation League, which for seven years has been dealing effectively with all exhibitions of Anti-Jewish discrimination in this country, and which by its conservative procedure has secured the confidence of American Jewry in its ability and power to handle tactfully and courageously every situation which has arisen be assisted in the steps to be taken in off-setting the defamatory propaganda of our enemies; and

Be it Further Resolved, That the League continue its activities by giving the widest possible publicity to the truth concerning the Jew and that as one of the means to this end, articles by leading historians and educators demonstrating to the non-Jew the slanderous character of the propaganda now being carried on by our defamers and the base motives of those who are attempting to create anti-Semitism in the United States, be sent to those who are receiving the anti-Semitic literature.

Thereupon, Professor Gotthard Deutsch of the Hebrew Union College was authorized to select a committee, of which he shall be Chairman, composed of men of recognized authority regardless of religious creed, to answer the false charges emanating from the anti-Semitic clique and to publish the same from time to time in pamphlet form. Professor Deutsch thereupon on behalf of the Anti-Defamation League presented an article prepared by him exposing the hoax which is being foisted on the American public in a book known as "The Protocols." It was ordered that the article be published and distributed at once. It was also decided that when the series of articles is complete that they be published in book form.

THE WORK OF THE ANTI-DEFAMATION LEAGUE..

The Anti-Defamation League of the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith is attempting a tremendous task, which, if carried to fruition will bring much good to Jewish posterity. It is well that this tremendous organization has taken upon itself, through the united effort of Jews throughout the country, to protect the fair name of Judaism from the slander and the libel and to forestall a condition which may bring sorrow and distress to all American citizens.

No sane person may believe that any amount of anti-Semitic propaganda fostered by ignorant idealists or others who seek to defame the Jewish character and name can ever bring about a condition of hate on the part of the non-Jew for his fellow-citizen, the Jew. But as firmly as we believe that anti-Semitism as a movement can never spring to life in America we must admit that if the charges and libelous accusations of anti-Semites such as Henry Ford are allowed to go unanswered, much harm will befall the Jewry of America.

The campaign of the Anti-Defamation League must not be of such nature that they shall deal out tit for tat, or even that they should persecute the scandalmongers and the libelers. Their duty and their tremendous opportunity lies not in combat, but in a program of thorough American education.

We must, in order to overcome the pernicious articles appearing in a rich man's personal sheet, state the truth about the Jew. We must let the American citizens in every walk of life know that American citizens of Jewish faith are loyal and true—that they have at heart the welfare of America as true as any other citizens—that they do not dream of a supreme power in which the Jew shall be supreme, but they have a prophetic vision of the day which shall see all men dwelling together as brothers—when the nations shall learn the art of war no more—when the lion of power shall lie peacefully beside the lamb of progress.

The Jew through educational processes must show the non-Jew that his genius is now as it ever has been a religious genius and not a talent for politics or commerce or anything else. The Jew must still show that as the eternal Priest people his supreme mission is to teach the word of God to all men of all races in every land—that his prime concern is to bring about justice and peace through the length and breadth of the world—that the world may be made safe for mankind.

If the anti-Defamation League of the B'nai Brith can in a measure spread this gospel of truth we need not fear the result of anti-Jewish articles, for when the truth shines into the hearts of our fellow-citizens of non-Jewish faith, they will understand the Jew and they will not longer malign him.—[Detroit Jewish Chronicle.

HE PAID HIS DUES.

The bulletin of an Eastern B'nai B'rith Lodge contains the following story, which is good enough to reprint:

"Rebbe" Isaac Goldzwicker was an active member of his "school" and the secretary of Akiba Lodge, I. O. B. B. As an ardent Ben B'rith and secretary, it was his duty to look after the lodge dues from members, which worried him a great deal. Particularly delinquent was Jacob Quellwasser, one of the well-to-do men in the community

One day "Rebbe" Goldzwicker met Jacob Quellwasser's son, Schmul, and addressed him as follows: "I will ask you a question, and if you cannot answer it, ask your father. Why did Abel kill Cain?"

Schmul could not answer, and reported this to his father. The latter soon met the "Rebbe" and said: "Rebbe, bin ich meshugge, oder bist du meshugge. Abel did not kill—"

"Aha, aha," said the "Rebbe," "it's already over 3,000 years since Cain killed Abel and you have not forgotten it, but that you owe for last year's dues to the lodge, you have forgotten."

THE JEWISH SITUATION IN POLAND.

Warsaw dispatches inform us that the official persecution of the Jews in Poland is now more marked than it has been even in the past few weeks. Everywhere Jews live in fear of pogroms. The Jewish press is being strictly censored and conditions outside of the capital can only be guessed at. The Jewish Deputies are in daily consultation with various Ministers of the Cabinet and we are informed that Dashinsky has promised to call a special meeting of the Cabinet with the Jewish Deputies in attendance in order to consider the Jewish situation.

THE HEBREW BIBLE.

What a wonderful providence it was that the Bible was written not in Egyptian hieroglyphics; not in the seven or eight hundred different cuneiform characters in which the literature of Babylon and Persia was locked up and buried for so many centuries; not in the 537 letters of the Hindu alphabet, or in the 247 letters of the Tamil tongue; not in the 248 characters of the languages of Abyssinia; not in the thousands of ideographs that have imprisoned the thoughts after Christ, but in the twenty-two letters of the Hebrew alphabet which in their simplicity have held their place in successive generations.—[The Baptist.

Report of the Inauguration of the Timendorfer Jubilee Lodge, Berlin

An imposing celebration united the brothers of Berlin and of some out-of-town lodges in the clubhouse of the Berlin lodges, Sunday, March 7, 1920. The splendidly illuminated temple to which the social rooms were added were filled to their utmost capacity. A new Berlin lodge was to be inaugurated, and by unanimous resolution of the Committee of Inauguration, it was to be called Timendorfer Jubilee Lodge, for it is the fiftieth lodge established during the term of office of the beloved District President. Thirty lodges of the German District, representing so many different cities, were represented. In addition thereto, the two lodges of Switzerland also sent representatives.

President Timendorfer opened the meeting with a short address. He said among other things: "If I look upon the list of the delegates from out of town, I feel that they came, not merely to be present at the installation of a new lodge, but also to express the personal sentiment of their hearty desire of cooperation. In the same sense I greet all the dear brothers who have come to us, whether they came from east or west, from south or north. I greet with special delight the two representatives from Switzerland. I also greet with a feeling of attachment the brothers who have come from places whose political affiliation is still contested, and I hope that they will remain with us in the future, not merely ours in sentiment, but also in geographic union.

Brother Silberstein, the Chairman of the Committee on Inauguration, then introduced the ninety-three new candidates of the Timendorfer Jubilee Lodge. In a few words he declared that the inauguration of this Lodge named for the District President was an expression of the high regard in which the veteran leader is held. The District President officially declared that the District Grand Lodge was happy to grant the request for a charter, and it also consented to have the name of the new lodge called Timendorfer Jubilee Lodge.

Five weeks after he entered upon his office, March 27, 1898, the first of the fifty lodges inaugurated under his auspices, the Frankel Lodge of Wuerzburg, was inaugurated as the thirty-fourth lodge of the German District. Today the eighty-third lodge of this district is being inaugurated. He might, therefore, be permitted to state what he thought of various questions bearing upon the principles of the Order. There is a wide chasm between the time when he entered upon his office twenty-two years ago and the present age. During this period a war which lasted five and a half years had revolutionized all conditions. We cannot afford to remain behind the times. Yet our answer to the question proposed to us then, is the same today; for we may state that we always held fast to immortal ideals. The speaker then dilated on the principles of a lodge and said that a lodge comprising as it does so many different aims and various methods of realizing them, was more than a mere social club. Our aim is to improve mind and heart by teaching, as far as teaching can obtain such a result. The most important ideal in human life is love. Love must be continuous, just as the heart of a living organism may never cease to beat, though head and arms may rest. Brotherly love shall unite the brothers. But one must not forget that friendship is a treasure which has to be acquired once and must be continuously maintained, and that the will to friendship means energetic action and requires sacrifice. Under such conditions the meetings of the lodge mean rest and recreation from the hurry and the buzz of daily avocation. Our union is the loudest protest against the religious indifference, leading to desertion from our ranks. It is a foundation stone of loyalty to the Jewish community and to the Jewish religion. We shall work for the maintenance of the congregations threatened by the present conditions. The number fifty has a high meaning in Jewish religion. It recalls the Jubilee Year, which was celebrated every fiftieth year. One of the requirements of this year was that every one shall return to his inheritance and to his family. We may interpret this law in the sense that every one shall return to his spiritual heritage and to the Jewish community. While loyal to our country, we welcome every man regardless of his political views as long as he is willing to assist in realizing the aims of our Order.

In this endeavor we do not act aggressively, although this has been occasionally demanded of us. Controversies with outside organizations is not the aim of our lodges. Our activity is devoted to self education by a pure life, and in this way we endeavor to destroy the pretext for hatred against us. We follow these principles because we believe in a moral order of the Universe. The bravery of the Jews has been sufficiently proven in the world war, in spite of all attacks and slander. We have been called an element of disintegration. We are willing to accept this reproach as a distinction because we indeed endeavored to fight national conceit and its corollary, the contempt for everything foreign, including that which is good We fully endorse the interpretation of German nationalism as expressed in Section 148 of the new German constitution. This definition means moral culture, patriotism, domestic and professional virtues, not merely for the benefit of German nationality, but also in the sense of international conciliation. Our connection with America is a natural consequence of our belief in this ideal. A fiftieth anniversary is usually called a golden jubilee. This suggests that encouragement of the hope in a golden age, or an age of universal brotherhood which may appropriately be expressed on the occasion of our jubilee. May this be a beacon light for the new lodge. If it shall succeed in its progress to such a goal, the speaker will be happy to have his name connected with this new lodge and the Order. The address was received with cordial applause.

Vice-President Brother Kuznitzky then proceeded to explain the signs and signals, and his interpretation of the symbolic meaning of the ceremonies of the Order made a profound impression on the new brothers. Upon the close of his address, the new officers were installed by Brother Dr. Cohen of Desau.

Brother Dr. Cohen delivered an address in which he said that in the present age when hatred and envy surround us, this moment inspires us with love, love for our universally respected veteran leader, whom everybody desires to honor. Our principles are those of democracy. This means that we must learn to obey just as to command. Our highest object, however, is to train characters, characters both as patriots and as Jews. Character means that we shall not falter in our love for our country and our religion.

Brother Timendorfer then handed the charter to the President of the new lodge, Brother Max Stein, with the admonition that he appreciate the importance of winning the young generation and especially the sons of the older brothers.

Brother Deutschland, Ex-President of the Berthold Auerbach Lodge, then greeted, in the name of the four Berlin lodges, the youngest sister lodge.

Brother Max Bollag of Zurich expressed the congratulations of August in Keller and of Basel Lodges. He referred to the fact that Augustin Keller Lodge was established eleven years ago in the presence of Brother Kraus, the President of the Order, while Brother Timendorfer presided at the installation. The Swiss lodges had an important task to fulfil at this time, which is a period of transition. They will not divide on the ground of national differences. In the words of Frau Stauffacher in Schiller's Wilhelm Tell, they will not look behind but ahead. Then the President of the new lodge, Brother Max Stein, delivered an address in which he expressed his gratitude to the noble men who have been instrumental in the establishment of the new lodge, mentioning especially the District President, Brother George Silberstein. The new lodge, he said, was a shelter for all noble endeavors of the Order. It must continue the work which the Order did in war and in peace.

Brother Timendorfer then thanked all speakers for their kind words of appreciation and added that the greater part of the acknowledgment of his activity should be credited to the brothers in the Executive Committee and to the Secretaries, to whom he was obliged for their kind cooperation.

Brother Paul Goldschmidt handed to the new lodge the sum of ten thousand marks as the first contribution to the fund

Current Events

By Gotthard Deutsch

THE outstanding event in Zionist affairs and surely, to a certain extent an important event in the Jewish history of our age, was the arrival of Sir Herbert Samuel, newly appointed High Commissioner of the British Government in Palestine Sir Herbert read with the pomp calculated to impress the emotional oriental mind, the ' most gracious message of his majesty," to the people of Palestine on July 7. After speaking of the economic and civic improvements which the mandatory power is planning, he repeated in substance the now historic statement of Mr. Balfour, that "the measures designed to promote the establishment of the Jewish national home will greatly assist that (economic) development." The same phrase of the establishment of a national home for the Jewish people appeared in the "most gracious message of his majesty" also. The other points in the program of the new administration were the guarantee of religious liberty, the control of sacred places by the respective churches, the employment of local people for the administrative offices, although higher offices shall be reserved to Englishmen, regulation of immigration by economic conditions and preservation of order. There is no need of emphasizing the full confidence in the sincerity of these promises.

The new Nehemiah did not arrive in the style in which the Prophet Zachariah announced the new king of Jerusalem. He did not come "lowly and riding on an ass, namely, an ass' colt," nor did he enter the Holy City like Godfrey of Bouillon, on a white steed, but he came in a prosaic automobile. But he comes with all the backing of British power and with the purpose of compromise between imperialism, imposing its rule on the natives, and the desire to allow the latter a limited measure of local autonomy. He had no objection to the Zionist flag displayed in the colonies which he visited in the beginning of the vintage season. The rejoicing has spread to London to such an extent that Christians, living in the neighborhood of the Zionist headquarters, complained to the County Council of London that the rejoicing of the Zionists disturbed their sleep. It seems that other people are suffering from insomnia for the same cause. There were several interpellations in the House of Commons, and lately the brother of Lord Northcliffe said in a London weekly that the government should withdraw from the whole mandate. Mr. Lloyd George stated on one occasion in the House of Commons that Sir Herbert Samuel shall be responsible to the central government directly, which evidently means that the military authorities shall not have any right to meddle with questions of administration. A debate in the House of Lords (June 29) showed a distinct hostility to the whole scheme. Lord Sydenham attacked very strongly the government's policy and especially the appointment of Samuel as irritating to the native Arabs. Lord Curzon in reply reiterated the stand of the government that it claims no dispossession of the native, and at the same time he praised Samuel's ability. On his way to Palestine Samuel called on the Pope who received him in audience (June 25) but according to the practice, not yet altered in spite of the promises that secret diplomacy shall be a thing of the past, no details of this interview have been published. It is at all events interesting to notice the difference between the era of the crusades and our own, which is emphasized in the fact that a Jew deals with the Pope on questions connected with the Holy Sepulchre. The religious authorities of Jerusalem responded enthusiastically to the new arrangement by declaring the 15th of Tammuz, the day of Sir Herbert's arrival in Jerusalem, as a semiholiday on which penitential prayers (Tachanun) are to be omitted, a custom observed for years by American non-Zionists and special divine blessing (Mishebĕrach) on Eliezer Ben Menahem, the Hebrew name of the High Commissioner was invoked.

Echoes in Europe.

The London Zionists celebrated the event with an enthusiastic meeting on July 12, at which the Hon. Arthur Balfour, the first official to recognize the Jewish homeland, made a speech which naturally was received with great enthusiasm. From an American point of view it is especially interesting to record that one of the most enthusiastically received speakers next to Max Nordau and Nahum Sokolow was Rabbi Abba H. Silver of Cleveland. It was hardly anticipated in the beginning of the reform movement of America, with its slogan "America is our Palestine," that a rabbi of a radical reform congregation in the United States would take prominent part in such a meeting. Shortly afterwards, the International Zionist Congress was held in London (July 7-22). It is impossible within the space of this review to give a satisfactory outline of a week's debate, and so we have to limit ourselves to a very few most interesting points. The liviliest debate centered on the question of the nationalization of land, on which the radical and the more conservative elements clashed. The latter made this concession, that they accepted the platform which declared itself in favor of nationalization without making it compulsory. Another important fact was a message from Lloyd George, who congratulated the Jewish people on "their restoration to their national home" and expressed the hope that "Jewish genius and wisdom and toleration would make once more a great contribution to human progress." We might also record a message of congratulation of the Japanese minister of foreign affairs, and also the absence of such a message on the part of the United States government. From a humanitarian point of view it is gratifying to notice that German delegates were present and spoke in German during the deliberation without any objection even on the part of the Jingo press.

FRAU ANITTE MUELLER
The Ministering Angel to the poor children of Vienna

The liberation of Lieutenant Jabotinski and the other prisoners convicted with him for organizing a self-protection during the Jerusalem riots of April 4 was one of the first acts of the new commissioner. The enthusiasm prevailing in Zionist circles is demonstrated in the act of Mrs. Nathan Straus, who sold her jewelry for the benefit of the Zionist cause. Still more important perhaps is the fact that David Yelin, the noted pedagogue and communal worker of Jerusalem, succeeded in placing municipal bonds in the London market. The picture has its dark sides also. The governor of Haifa resigned, declaring that he could not assume the responsibility for the consequences of the San Remo resolution, that he felt it would cause bloodshed and civil war. Indeed, reports from Galilee continue to bring us discouraging news of Arab assaults on the lives and the property of the colonists. Nor is the position of Emir Feisal clear. Once he expresses his hope in a peaceful cooperation of the Zionists, and at another time he is quoted as having called the natives to a holy war. Judging from experiences in northern Africa, the native population, racially and religiously so strongly divided from their foreign rulers will not accept foreign rule, whether it calls itself mandate or protectorate, unless it has to. From all appearances, bombing from airplanes, tanks, heavy artillery and cruisers will take care of their political ambition for some time to come. The discontent of the Arab population may be inferred from an assault on the Jews, which was without details reported from Aden in Arabia, in a London cable of July 14.

Decided gains to the Zionist cause will have to be admitted by the most determined anti-Zionists. In America, the latter seem to emphasize in their continued objection to the Jewish homeland, that their position is limited to "political Zionism." The declaration of adhesion to the Zionist cause by General Monash, the first Jew to attain this rank in the British army is surely a gain to the cause. The Talmud is once more right when it says (Baba Batra, 110a) that nephews follow in the footsteps of their uncles. General Monash is a nephew of the Jewish historian Graetz, who was a Zionist before Zionism was officially organized as a movement. Another gain is in the indorsement of Zionism by such communal organizations which always proclaimed the principle of the exclusive religious definition of Judaism. The British Board of Deputies and the German Centralverein endorsed the Jewish homeland, although they at the same time declared themselves politically, culturally and nationally parts of the country of their birth. A similar stand was taken by the Congress of Italian Congregations held in Rome, June 15 to 16, at which a delegate from Trieste by the interesting name of Goldschmiedt declared that "we consider ourselves first Italians and afterwards Jews." (Prima di essere ebrei ci sentiamo sinceramente Italiani.)

A letter written by Dr. A. Mibashan, of Java, dated June 10 and published in the Vienna Morgenzeitung (July 1), gives a dismal picture of which we quote the rather strong statement that conditions both spiritually and economically are worse than they were under the Turkish administration of Dgemal. It must, however, not be overlooked that this letter which declared the "economic conditions of Palestine and the whole Orient intolerable" was written before Sir Herbert Samuel's arrival. The internal difficulty is seen in the stand taken by the socialists of the party, Poale Zion, who held their meeting in Vienna and declared that they are unwilling to cooperate with the official representatives of the movement. They received an encouraging endorsement of their policy from the English labor party, while on the other hand the Jewish socialist leader, Claudio Treves of Italy ridicules the Zionists, who instead of following the example of the prophets who denounced tyrrany, prostrate themselves before a new Pontius Pilate. In such a mooted question the reviewer believes to have given and certainly did attempt to give, an impartial presentation of both sides.

They That Dwelt in the Shadow of Death.

The situation in Russia is at this very moment in considerable doubt. At any rate it is worth noticing that the situation of the Jews in the old realm of the Czar, which six years ago seemed absolutely hopeless is now the most satisfactory in all of eastern Europe. In the Jewish Old World Conference held in Carlsbad, Mr. Sliosberg, one of the most noted communant workers in Russia, and who—it must be stated right here—is a representative of the bourgeois views, said (August 14) that as soon as order will be restored in Russia "not a single Jew will be desirous of emigrating." The same view is taken by Judge Harry Fisher of Chicago who just returned from his relief mission in Soviet Russia, and who also cannot be suspected of sympathy with Bolshevist political ideas. Judge Fisher, as well as his companion, the socialist publicist, Max Pine, declared that the political situation of the Jews in Russia at this moment leaves nothing to be desired. Judge Fisher, on his part, qualifies his statement by the admission that from an economic and a cultural point of view this situation is not very gratifying. The Jew, being to a great extent a trader has no economic place under the modern system in Russia. Thirty per cent of the population who are mechanics find easily their place in the new order of things, but the seventy per cent, being largely merchants and to some extent intellectuals are in a very uncomfortable condition. Equally unpleasant is the spiritual situation, because the Jewish sympathizers of the Soviet are most bitterly opposed to religious institutions and Jewish education.

Mr. Max Pine had a conversation with Max Goldberg, at present holding a prominent position in the war department and at the outbreak of the revolution mayor of Berdwczew his native place, and a member of the Ukrainian National Council, who disclaimed any hostility to Jewish Cultural life. As a proof he pointed to the fact that Moscow had a Yiddish theater which Mr. Pine attended and found excellent from an artistic point of view. Mr. Goldberg also said that the Soviet had no objection to Yiddish schools but strongly objected to Hebrew education which he thought was merely a ruse employed by the Jewish bourgeois to control the unthinking masses of the proletariat.

Somewhat different from this view was the opinion of the delegates to the above mentioned Poale Zion conference in Vien-

These delegates also declared that politically there is no Jewish question in Russia, but economically, ninety per cent of the Jews are without occupation except hard menial labor for which most of them are not fitted.

From all this it would appear that while individually Jews are prominent in the Soviet administration, the masses of the Jewish people can hardly be in sympathy with it, and it therefore is undoubtedly an anti-Semitic ruse when the London Times (August 12) publishes a report from its correspondent in Vilna, that the Jews of that city greeted the arrival of the Bolshevists in an enthusiastic manner. The same tendency, though in an opposite direction seems to be underlying a report in the same paper that Trotzky had said to a Russian priest who asked him to assist the clergy in the precarious condition, caused by the new government, that he was willing to do so but that an appeal to him as a Jew which the priest had made meant nothing to him. He was only a Jew by descent, which he regretted as an unfortunate fact, but he hated the Jews because he knew them too well. Somewhat in contradiction with this anti-Jewish attitude of the Soviet government is the report that the paper money issued by it bears among others also a Yiddish text.

Reports of pogroms coming from the Crimea and from the territory of the Kuban Cossacks are not sufficiently clear. With due reserve the reviewer is inclined to connect them with the encouragement given to General von Wrangel by France and indirectly by the United States. It is quite possible that this military leader who is an agent of the Czarist government might expect success from reviving the old Czarist policy that in every crisis it was a good scheme to hold the Jews responsible.

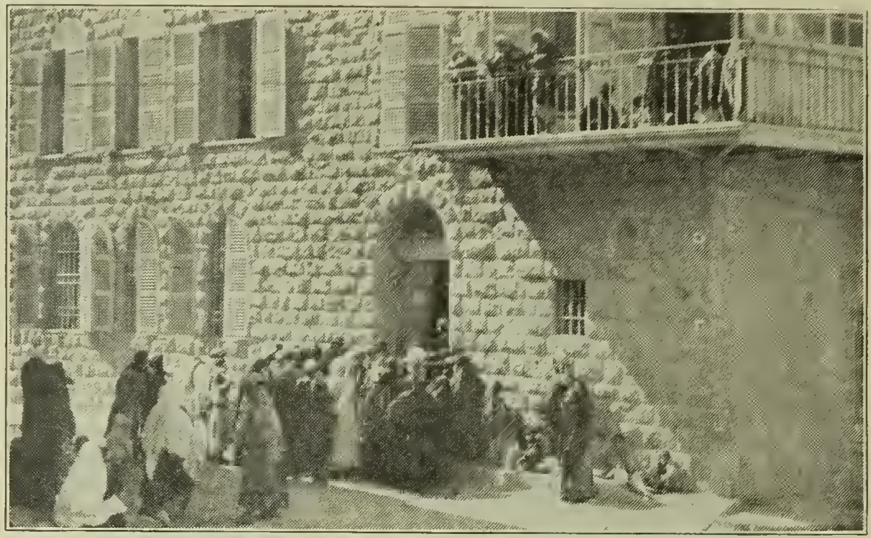
Other disconnected reports of pogroms like one reported to have taken place in Rzeshitza, government of Minsk, July 14, cannot be fully interpreted. They may be due to local conditions or to retiring Polish soldiers, who, defeated in their fighting against Russia, tried to win laurels by attacking helpless Jews and looting Jewish stores and homes. Equally uncertain are the reports from the former Russian territories of Lithuania and Latvia. In the former country it is said that the Jews are not permitted to speak Russian, but are permitted to address the Parliament in Yiddish. It is also stated that the diet passed a law which restricted land awards to those who were not previously engaged in agriculture. This particularly excludes the Jews, who under the old Russian law were not permitted to hold land in rural districts nor even—generally speaking—permitted to reside there. At the same time, it is possible that the law is merely intended to prevent land speculation. From Latvia it is again reported that the Jews in the Diet threaten the government to join the anti-government parties, the socialists, Germans and other nationals if the anti-Semitic agitation encouraged by the government will not cease. At any rate, the situation of the Jews, quite numerous in cities like Riga and Libau and also in the cities and towns of Lithuania where they often form the majority, is not quite clear and probably may lead to complications.

How Art Thou Fallen From Heaven?

One who would have predicted forty years ago, when continental anti-Semitism was at its height, that England, the country of fair play, would follow suit, would have been ridiculed. Now it is a fact that England has such a movement, that it is steadily growing and that it possesses all the features which characterized the agitation of Stoecker and Drumont. "The Britons," evidently a society on the lines of our American Legion, issued a leaflet in which the Jews are attacked as having "skulked at home while you were fighting," as having "spied for Germany, made rotten machines for our armies," etc. It is just exactly the feature which made the prelude of the Dreyfus case.

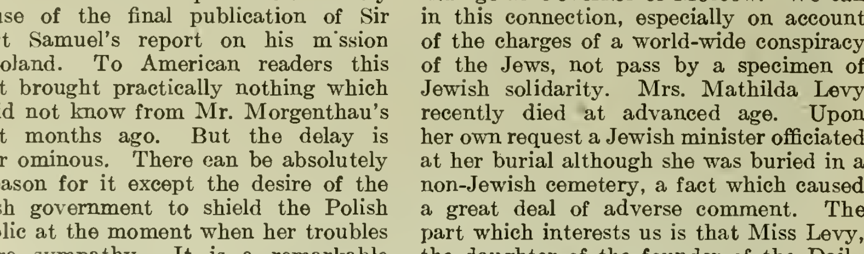
The Spectator (June 5) published two articles, one called "Disraeli on the Secret Societies and the Jews" and the second entitled "A Task for British Freemasonry." These articles demand investigation whether Jews dominate the masonic order as the pamphlet "The Jewish Peril" of which we shall have presently more to say, [illegible] [illegible] is the idea underlying the [illegible] of the last two volumes of [illegible] Biography in the London Times, with the side remark that the great statesman belonged to a race among whose many fine qualities good taste is scarcely ever included.

We can fully understand that the holders of such a prejudice do all they can to prevent a possibility of having to revise their opinion. So the most venomous attacks are made against Edwin S. Montagu the secretary for India, and his cousin, Sir Herbert Samuel. The appointment of Mr. Montagu was severley criticized in the House of Commons, and even the Times (July 12) admitted that the debate "was not free from racial prejudice which characterized the anti-Dreyfus controversy." Mr. Lloyd George manfully refused to receive a committee which asked for the retirement of the Jewish statesman. A still greater bitterness characterizes the agitation against Sir Herbert Samuel in The Morning Post (June 14) and in The Spectator (June 19). The latter declares this appointment an outrage and makes sneering remarks about "the enormously wealthy aud powerful family which under the pseudonym of Montagu occupies this, that and other positions." Mr. Loyd George in spite of this agitation made Sir Matthew Nathan who has occupied various prominent posts under the colonial department Commissioner of Queensland.



Dispensary in Jerusalem Busy Place

"The powerful family" evidently provoked the Northcliffe press considerably because of the final publication of Sir Stuart Samuel's report on his mission to Poland. To American readers this report brought practically nothing which we did not know from Mr. Morgenthau's report months ago. But the delay is rather ominous. There can be absolutely no reason for it except the desire of the British government to shield the Polish republic at the moment when her troubles require sympathy. It is a remarkable analogy to the case of Mr. Morgenthau, that as his report was criticized by his two associates, so Captain Wright, the associate of Samuel, found it necessary to submit a comment on the report of the head of the commission which repeated the old story that the Jews are Bolshoviks, and for this reason the otherwise broad-minded and kind-hearted Popolskis were provoked beyond endurance. The same reason for discrediting Samuel's finding is evident in an interpellation introduced by Frederick Hall in the House of Commons to which he added that the Jews are pro-German and Captain Wright even vaguely hinted at ritual murder. The Morning Post improved on this text claiming (August 6) that the Bolshevist army is making for Warsaw because the leaders know that among the Jewish population of the Polish capital they will find a fertile soil for propaganda. Both leading Northcliffe papers, The Times and Morning Post see in the Jews the only cause for the world's unrest and especially for the declaration of the labor party against war, which evidently causes Mr. Lloyd George considerable worry. The British labor party let this challenge rest and came out with strong protests against the trick of the Northcliffe press to discredit labor as being under the control of the Jews, or—to use the anti-Semitic's phraseology—under the control of the secret International Jewish Council. The appointment of Jews to prominent offices has been noted, before, but it may be added that among the first women appointed as magistrates there are two Jews, Miss Nettie Adler, daughter of the late Chief Rabbi and Miss Lillie Montagu, sister of the much attacked Secretary for India. So far the official government has not taken any cognizance of the movement but there can be no doubt that inferior officers, imbued with anti-Semitic sentiment, are catering to popular prejudice. The case of a Russian tailor, a very respectable man who was arrested under some technical charge and ordered to be deported, reads like one of the stories of the nocturnal raids in which the late lamented Grandduke Sergius used to indulge as Governor of Moscow. We can in this connection, especially on account of the charges of a world-wide conspiracy of the Jews, not pass by a specimen of Jewish solidarity. Mrs. Mathilda Levy recently died at advanced age. Upon her own request a Jewish minister officiated at her burial although she was buried in a non-Jewish cemetery, a fact which caused a great deal of adverse comment. The part which interests us is that Miss Levy, the daughter of the founder of the Daily Telegraph, and the sister of the late Lord Burnham, was the last Jewish member of the family. If in any form the Jews could control the politics of the world it would be in journalism, and yet we see in England the family which introduced the first daily paper at a popular price, after two generations completely dropped out of Judaism.



Bronx World War Hero to be a Farmer: Abraham Krotoshinsky

The Indelible Leopard Spots.

The reactionary parties of Germany have created a network of organizations all over the empire consisting of branches of a society called Schutz und Trutz-bund. The object is to create sentiment for the reactionary aims of the militarists in the German National People's Party. In an address, delivered at one of these meetings in Munich (July 16) the speaker declared that Germany had been surrounded by the cobweb of the electric trust managed by the Jew Rathenau, and he advised to tear this cobweb. From the audience came the cry; Why not rather kill the spider? This party of extreme reactionaries very slyly refused to take part in the new government, in this way dodging responsibility and reserving to itself the chance of criticizing their opponents. The same policy was pursued by the socialists, so that the present government consists of the representatives of three minority parties and is headed by Constantine Fehrenbach, a Catholic. The latter, announcing the program of his government in the Reichstag (June 28), refrained from mentioning the anti-Semitic agitation but included in his program the opposition to all class and race hatred and to all social and religious persecution. It might in this connection be interesting to give a picture of the religious configuration of the new Reichstag. Of its 418 members, 173 are Protestants, 105 are Catholics, only 5 are Jews, but 133 are unchurched, while one declares himself an atheist and one simply is not baptized. It is not known how many Jews may be among the 133 who do not profess any religion, but they can surely not be numerous. Contrary to a statement found in the Yiddish press it seems certain that no Jew occupies a position in the new cabinet contrary to all precedence since the establishment of the republic.

The anti-Semitic agitation both in Germany and in England inspired by the above-mentioned anti-Semitic pamphlet, is directed against the Jews in secret societies. One clerical paper, the "Voelkischer Beobachter," had used the I. O. B. B. as a target, but the President of the German District Grand Lodge instituted action for criminal libel and obtained a verdict by which the editor of the anti-Semitic paper was fined 500 marks. We have a number of similar instances of anti-Semitic agitation in the Catholic press, and a camouflaged book written by the priest Robert Klimsch under the title "The Jews as Evidence of the Divinity of Jesus," is equally anti-Semitic. A school law issued for Bavaria, August 1, 1919, which declared primary schools nondenominational but Christian was ruled unconstitutional by the federal courts. It was perhaps not directly inspired by anti-Semitics but rather by clerical tendencies which wish all schools to be Christian and therefore are willing to support strictly Jewish schools from state funds. The diet of Bavaria went even so far as to propose a subsidy to the rabbis whose income has been greatly reduced by the present conditions. On the other hand the anti-Semitic, including the clerical press got excited over supposed Jewish rule, because strictly observant Jews are allowed kosher milk, although this is by no means an exception from the ration allowed to others.

It would lead too far to record all instances of anti-Semitic agitation, but a few facts cannot be entirely suppressed if we wish to obtain an insight into the German "Volksseele." Miss Anna von Gierke, daughter of a prominent professor of law at the University of Berlin, was a member of the first parliament of the republic, the German National Assembly, and belonged to the reactionary German National People's Party. At the election to the first Reichstag her nomination was refused on the ground that her mother was a Jewess. Most important is a systematic anti-Jewish agitation in the universities, reminding us very strongly of conditions prevailing after Waterloo. All through Germany resolutions are passed in student meetings demanding limitation of the admission of Jewish students and the exclusion of Jewish professors. This sentiment naturally affects high school boys and the most striking case, only recently come to our notice, was that of a Jewish high school boy in Neustettin, a notorious center of anti-Semitism, whose leg was broken in a sleigh ride with his class. The teacher asked other boys to take him home but they replied they would not haul a Jew, some good illustration of the effect of the supposed superior morality of the New Testament and of the story of the Good Samaritan. Academic anti-Semitism seems to have gone mad on the racial prejudice. Albrecht Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, professor of law at the University of Wuerzburg, left for Hamburg because of the anti-Semitic agitation. Unfortunately the report is incomplete. It is well known that this professor who is a descendant of the famous Jewish philosopher, Moses Mendelssohn must be a Christian at least in the third generation.

for the last Jewish descendant of the philosopher, his grandson, Alexander, died in 1871 in advanced years.

The worse case of academic anti-Semitism, however, is the pamphlet written by the assyriologist Friedrich Delitzsch, entitled "The Great Fraud" (Eine Grosse Taeuschung), which claims that the Jewish religion is the most immoral principle that was ever devised by a selfish unprincipled race, and has absolutely nothing to do with Christianity. The present writer gave a more exhaustive survey of this prostitution of all science and of this prevarication of actual facts in the American Israelite (July 29).
